conception of the Universe, who avert their eyes from everything not capable of precise knowledge, thus acquiring the habit of leaving out of account all larger considerations in every problem, on the ground that they are vague. This habit of never suffering the mind to dwell on anything great, he says, produces often an atheism of the most pitiable and helpless kind. Then there is the atheism of conventionalism, where the profession of belief survives the belief itself. The common characteristic of these minds is feebleness, which is but another name for Atheism. As opposed to this, energy "is the universal characteristic of theology." Science is possessed of energy; it therefore is not Atheistic. The nature of the God believed in is of less importance, he thinks, than the belief in a God. We confess that here our author's reasoning does not seem to us convincing. He argues that "it is not the benevolence of his deity which gives so much energy and confidence to the convinced Theist; it is rather the assurance that he has the secret of propitiating his Deity. It was not because Jupiter or Mars were benevolent beings that the Roman went to battle, confiding in their protection. It was because all sacrifices had been performed which the Pontiffs or the Sibylline Books prescribed." It seems to us that it was just because the Roman believed that his Deity was capable of benevolent feelings towards himself, and that he, on his part, had secured such feelings that he had confidence. The Deity believed in may not be benevolent all round, but to the believer he is, and that is greatly the secret of his faith, and energy, and zeal. When, therefore, we read that "just of the same kind is the theistic vigour which we see in modern science," that "it does not believe that Nature is benevolent, and yet it has all the confidence of Mohammedans or Crusaders," and this because "it believes that it understands the laws of Nature, and that it knows how to deal so that Nature shall favour its operations," we feel bound to protest against a confusion of thought, based on mistaken premises. There is really no similarity between the two sorts of energy or confidence. And, practically, this is admitted in the next sentence by our author, when he says, "Not by the Sibylline Books, but by experiment—not by supplications, but by scientific precautions and operations it discovers and propitiates the mind of its Deity." The very fact that Science regards what is here called "its Deity" so differently, shows that it is a sheer misuse of words to speak of propitiation in such a sense as this. We may agree, and in fact do agree, that the advance of science is by no means equivalent to the advance of Atheism; but it is not because we regard the enthusiasm of the man of science as on a par with the feeling entertained by a devout Theist towards God. Were it not for passages such as that we are about to quote, we should almost be tempted to suppose that our author entirely failed to see the immense difference there is between the theistic and the non-theistic scientific view.

Of Atheism (he says), that demoralising palsy of human nature, which consists in the inability to discern in the Universe any law by which human life may be guided, there is in the present age less danger than ever, and it is daily made more and more impossible by science itself. Of revolt against the Christian law of Fraternity there is also less than ever in this age, and that redemption of the poor, and that pacification of nations which Christianity first suggested, are more prominent than ever among the aspirations of mankind. At the same time, the organisation of the Church seems ill-adapted to the age, and seems to expose it to the greatest danger; and, what is far more serious, the old elevating communion with God, which Christianity introduced, seems threatened by the new scientific theology, which, while presenting to us deeper views than ever of His infinite and awful greatness, and more fascinating views than ever of His eternal beauty and glory, denies for the present to Him that human tenderness, justice and benevolence which Christ taught us to see in Him.

It is evident from the definition of Atheism given above that science and it are not identical, and that a sort of theology is left even when Supernaturalism is set aside and science allowed to take its place, viz., the conception of God in Nature. It seems equally clear that theology such as this and religion are not the same thing. To most of us it is far more important to consider whether religion is affected by the cancellation of Supernaturalism than whether a theology, however simple, is left untouched. On this point the argument of our author is very interesting. Starting with the statement that there are two sorts of knowledge which are required to make complete knowledge, i.e., theoretic or scientific knowledge, and practical, familiar or imaginative knowledge, he points out that there is great difficulty in getting these two kinds of knowledge not to interfere with each other. The second kind, which usually precedes the other, realises more, and often carries a man further than accurate scientific knowledge. It is, too, more attractive, and has a more powerful influence on those who possess it. But it has its mischievous side, because it tends to fill the mind with prejudices and hasty misconceptions degenerating into superstitions, and above all, to close the mind against sounder scientific knowledge. To a mind so possessed the approach of science heralds a contest, in which, truth prevailing, superstition is driven out. In this contest the mind has had to place great restraint on imagination and feeling, turning away from Nature the sensitive side, and receiving "the shock upon the adamant shield of the sceptical reason." Thus one imperfect kind of knowledge is simply substituted for another. Instead of realising the mind now analyses, and this produces sore discomfort to those who care little for testing knowledge, but appreciate largely its realisation. Of course the great object to be attained is complete or satisfactory knowledge, and that is only to be done by combining scientific and imaginative knowledge.

Now applying this to the knowledge of God, it may be said that the scientific or theoretic knowledge is theology, and the imaginative or practical knowledge is religion. As our author says:—"By theology the nature of God is ascertained and false views of it eradicated from the understanding; by religion the truths thus obtained are turned over in the mind and assimilated by the imagination and the feelings." But some say that the knowledge of God is impossible to man, and therefore theology is not truly science. Is this so? Is it not a fact that every sort of theology agrees that the laws of nature are the laws of God? And if so, do not we, in knowing nature, to that extent at least know God? "Regarded in this way, we may say of God that so far from being beyond knowledge, He is the one object of knowledge, and that everything that we can know, every proposition that we can frame, relates to Him." In reply to those who would denounce this as Pantheism and "practically not distinguishable from Atheism," our author maintains that whether God be the Ruler of the World, or the Pantheistic view prevail, the laws of Nature are the laws by which He rules the world, or they are the very manifestations of the Divine Nature. "In any case the knowledge of Nature, if only it be properly sifted from the corrupting mixture of mere opinion, is the knowledge of God."

Of course much depends upon the meaning which is attached to the term Nature. In one sense it may mean the Universe as opposed to man, in another it may have a far wider and deeper signification. It is this latter which our author gives to it. He says, "We use it as a name comprehending all the uniform laws of the Universe as known in our experience, and excluding such laws as are inferred from experiences so exceptional and isolated as to be difficult of verification." In other words, excluding the supernatural, but including humanity, and all the pity that belongs to the whole human family, "and all the pity they have accumulated, and, as it were, capitalised in institutions, political, social, and ecclesiastical, through countless generations." This, it may be observed, is not what is usually understood by the term Nature, and which seems so pitiless, cold and harsh. Though the abandonment of the supernatural might deprive us of much that many of us deeply value, still Nature, including and not excluding Humanity, would be our God. And here we quote a passage to illustrate this thought:—

Let us take one of the principal doctrines of the supernatural theology, and observe how it is modified by the rejection of supernaturalism. The eternal happiness reserved for the just is one of these doctrines. No natural evidence can establish it, nor even the future life involved in it. Even when the Psalmist, speaking merely of the present life, wrote, "I have been young, and now am old, and yet saw I never the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread," he perhaps thought of supernatural interpositions by which evil was averted from the just man. Suppose now that we repudiate all such beliefs, and confine ourselves strictly to the facts of Nature as we discover them from uniform experience. Let us suppose that the ordinary laws of Nature govern the lot of the just man, and that no exemptions are made in his favour. Do we find that these laws take no account of his justice, and that his prospects are in no respect different from those of the unjust man? Is Nature, as distinguished from the supernatural, regardless of the distinction between virtue and vice? No doubt Nature is not a perfectly just judge. The just man has misfortunes like the unjust; he may suffer from accident or disease. His justice may be denied; he may suffer the penalties of injustice. All this may happen in particular cases, and yet no one doubts that on the whole the just man reaps a reward for his justice. A very simple law operates to reward him. By his justice he benefits the community, and the community, partly out of gratitude, partly out of an interested calculation, repay him for the service he has done. This law fails of its effect in a good number of cases, but in the majority of cases it does not fail. And when it does fail, it seldom fails altogether. There is generally some reward for justice, if not always an adequate reward. Accordingly, not only Christians, or those who believe in something more than Nature, but those whose only God is Nature, and even those whose knowledge of Nature is very superficial, fully recognise that virtue is rewarded. "Honesty is the best policy," has become to be a proverb, and hypocrites have come into existence hoping to secure the reward without deserving it. We see, then, that those who believe in Nature only may be said to believe not only in a God, but in some sense a personal God. Their God, at least, has so much of personality that He takes account of the distinction of virtue and vice, that He punishes crime, and that He relieves distress.

We can scarcely suppose that those who have hitherto believed in the existence of a God who intervenes in a miraculous manner in the affairs of human life will be content with such "a personal God" as is here depicted. Indeed, they may be disposed to say that if this is all that is left the all is not worth the having. It does not seem to us that our author is altogether happy in his illustration. As we understand him, the natural result which the just man or the good man ought to expect, if all supernatural intervention is excluded, is gratitude from those whom he has benefited. But this natural result fails "in a good number of cases," not exceptionally. Obedience to a law, then, does not meet with what we are taught we have a right to expect from such obedience. This may arise from the fact that those who ought to be grateful, in other words, ought to obey laws which are as binding on them as on the just and good man, are either wilfully or ignorantly ungrateful or disobedient. In this case the obedient man suffers; where is his reward? Supernaturalism says, "In the eternal happiness reserved for the just;" but the other school knows nothing of this. We are not now saying which is the true theory; all we wish to point out is that our author's attempt to reconcile the two views is hardly likely to prove acceptable to the holders of one of them.

MR. G. P. MARSH.—Mr. G. Perkins Marsh, for many years the United States Minister at the Italian Court, died on Sunday at Vallombrosa. He was senior member of the Diplomatic Corps, and enjoyed in a very special degree the high consideration of this Court, of his countrymen, of the diplomatic circle, and of society at large. The Italian Government have expressed their commiseration with the widow of the deceased, and have also telegraphed to the Legation at Washington the desire to convey to the United States Government the sympathy of the Italian nation. Mr. Marsh was well-known by his two works, the "Origin and History of the English Language," and the "Earth as Modified by Human Action."

Occasional Notes.

We desire to call attention to Mrs. Rossiter's letter in last week's issue, and to thank her on behalf of many little ones who will, we hope, be enabled to reap the benefit of her kind suggestion. This is philanthropic work which the churches might well take up, better, indeed, than many of the "causes" that they are from time to time called upon to do. We observe that the young people connected with a New York Presbyterian Church have for several years past every summer raised a fund for sending poor children to country homes for two weeks each. Last year between two and three hundred children received the benefit of this thoughtful charity. The whiff of fresh air and the delight of country scenes are as good as the cup of cold water.

MRS. R. H. DANA recently purchased in Paris the fine portrait of her father, Longfellow, by the artist Healy, which has for years been the chief ornament of that painter's studio. It was painted in Rome, during Mr. Longfellow's visit there; and in it Mrs. Dana appears a bright-eyed little maiden with golden tresses, peeping over her father's shoulder.

A VENERABLE and highly esteemed correspondent, writing to us respecting the recent discussions in the columns of the Inquirer on the decline in attendance in public worship, writes:—"Perhaps it is not so certain that there has been a decline in villages and country towns. All my long life almost I have been thinking that preaching might be made more interesting, and therefore more useful, if the everyday events of life were to be commonly adopted as subjects for discourse. Mr. Froude, some time ago, in addressing the students of a Scotch University, said that he had for thirty years been hearing sermons upon all manner of difficult subjects, but notwithstanding the dishonesty and frauds all around us, he never so much as heard a single sermon upon common honesty. In the memoirs of Miss Caroline Fox she mentions that she greatly enjoyed some minister's preaching because he almost always referred to some passing event of the day as a topic to illustrate and improve upon. How is it that whilst there are such hundreds of most beautiful texts, pointing in exquisite language to the conduct of life, they are, however, usually passed by in favour of passages which no doubt were plain enough in the age in which they were written, but now only puzzle the preachers themselves, whilst their hearers are in despair for want of more common sense and straightforwardness."

It was somewhat cynically remarked in our presence the other day, by a member of the Church of England, that the reason why the Church extended its patronage to the Salvation Army was due to the fact that it seemed to have such little difficulty in raising funds for anything it wanted. We do not pretend to account for the fact or to endorse the reason just given. One thing is quite clear, that it continues to receive attention from the secular and the religious press, the pulpit, and the Courts of Law. In the latter, indeed, its success seems to run all along the line. Canon Farrar, the Rev. J. G. Rogers, the Rev. Harry Jones, and Mr. Spurgeon, have all been having their say about it. All these men while recognising the possibility of good being effected by the Army concur in pointing out the mischievous results likely to arise from its methods. Mr. Rogers compared the work of the Apostles with that of the Army, not quite to the advantage of the latter. Mr. Jones pointed out that the glaring defect of the Army was its want of spirituality. The Salvationists were intensely materialistic with their chemical hell and their verbally dictatorial inspiration, and there was great danger of their becoming intolerant, and persecuting instead of being persecuted. That this is no vain suspicion is, we think, evidenced by the speech of the Salisbury "captain," who declared that "but for the grace of God" he would "pull the noses" of "the bobbies, magistrates, or mayor of that city." It is not a great step from this to imagine that what some soldiers of the Army may mistake for the spirit of God may induce them actually to carry out their designs upon the noses or other prominent features of the constituted authorities. Mr. Spurgeon made some sensible remarks. He said:—"It seems to be the fancy of some that the Great Spirit works in brass bands, and that peradventure men will be saved by a regiment of soldiers if they cannot be saved by simple apostolic teaching. So the tendency of the time is to parade and show, as if such were power, and would accomplish what gentler agencies will not do. But it is not so. Then they say we must have an eloquent preacher. Crash goes the orator—wind, and the Lord was not in it. Now shall come one, say they, who pleads with vehemence, all on fire—fireworks, and the Lord does not work by that kind of fire. God is in the voice of gentle silence. In bringing the soul to decision, God continually uses something soft, tender, gentle, quiet, calm, peaceful. Often so gentle is His mode of working, that it is almost unperceived by the man who is the subject of it, and who cannot afterwards exactly tell when it came and when it went, like a gentle zephyr, which refreshes the fevered brow, and yet is scarcely known to have passed through the sick chamber—like the soft gentle breath of spring, which dissolves the iceberg, and melts the glacier. When frost had taken every rivulet by the throat, the soft south wind blows, and all is freedom. So it is with the Spirit of God in the soul when He comes to set the sinner free." It will be seen that none of these gentlemen are greatly enamoured with what has not been inaptly called "The Gospel of Hubbub."

THE students at Girton College have decided in their Debating Society, by a majority of 27 to 14, that the House of Lords ought to be abolished. The Lords sat the day after this resolution was advertised, evidently in depressed spirits.

ON Tuesday, last week, the anniversary of the death of Dean Stanley, the afternoon service at Westminster Abbey had special reference to the memory of the Dean. The attendance was very large, and a large proportion of those present were in mourning. There was no sermon, but appropriate Lessons were read by the Dean and Canon Duckworth, and the anthems, &c., had special reference to the departed. The Dead March in Saul was impressively played on the organ by Dr. Bridge after the service. Great numbers visited the grave of Dean Stanley during the day, and, in addition to marks of affectionate memory from his friends, two wreaths from the Queen and the Princess Beatrice were sent from Windsor, and laid upon the grave.

AN American Evangelical newspaper is frightened at the fact that the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," by Dr. Holmes, is one of the books recommended to be read in the Chautauqua course. Said paper regards Dr. Holmes as one of the most dangerous "of the whole school of agnostics." Whereupon the Christian Register remarks: "We wonder if the Methodist would exclude all Unitarian authors from the Chautauqua course. If so, they might as well drop the department of American literature at once. With Holmes, Longfellow, Emerson, Lowell, Motley, Bryant, Irving, Bancroft, Prescott, Channing, Curtis, and a score more of Unitarians left out, how much of standard American literature would there be left?"

ANOTHER American paper, published in the State of Illinois, offers its thanks to "Dr." Russell Lant Carpenter, of Bridport, England, for his able lecture on tobacco, and expresses a wish that all the doctors would read this and answer it if they can: Our valued friend is not "Doctor" yet, although he deserves to be made one.

THE Bishop of Manchester, referring, on Sunday, to the spread of "Freethinking" literature, while admitting the difficulties of Christianity, said that "There was sufficient light for a man to walk by who did not deliberately choose darkness, and he was not going to try to escape from those small difficulties by plunging into and accepting the infinitely greater difficulties and perplexities of the creed of Atheism. To call upon him to believe that this wonderful universe, with its varied courses and wonderful controlling mechanism, these worlds upon worlds in space, until he was lost and his mind and brain became dazed in the contemplation of them—to ask him to believe that all those things came by chance, and that he himself, with all the wonderful faculties with which God had endowed every human being, was developed by protoplasm from a germ without any designing providence of God governing him, was asking him to believe what to his mind was absurd and impossible."

ONE of the noted persons who attended some of the recent meetings of the Western Unitarian Conference, at Cleveland, Ohio, was Mrs. Lucretia Garfield, the widow of the late President. The Rev. C. G. Ames, who preached before the Conference, and Mrs. Garfield were schoolmates in their youthful days.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed the Hon. and Rev. William Henry Fremantle, M.A., Rector of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, St. Marylebone, to the Canony Residuary in Canterbury Cathedral, vacant by the death of the Rev. James Craigie Robertson, M.A. Mr. Fremantle resigns his Marylebone Rectory, to which he was appointed by the late Earl Russell in 1865. Mr. Fremantle was educated at Eton and Balliol; obtained a first class in classics in 1853, gained the English Prize Essay in the following year, and was Fellow of All Souls' from 1855 to 1863. His sympathies are with Broad Church views. The new canon was Select Preacher in the University of Oxford in 1878-80, and has this year been appointed Bampton Lecturer. He has been an Examining Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury since 1862. Mr. Fremantle is the second son of Lord Cottesloe, and was born in 1831. The Canony is worth £1,000 a year with a residence. Mr. Fremantle is a prominent member of the Church Reform Society, and has more than once attended meetings in connection with the Liberal Social Union and other unsectarian societies.

THE annual Synod of the Walloon Churches has just been held at Rotterdam, and, in view of the rapidity with which these Churches, once so numerous in Holland, are disappearing, the Synod has appointed a committee to collect materials for a history of them since their foundation by the Walloons, who sought refuge in Holland at the time of the Reformation. These refugees gradually gathered around them many of the Dutch who understood the French language, and their numbers were considerably reinforced after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. These Churches retained their distinct characteristics, and, though Walloon by origin, they were French as regarded their language and doctrine; but of late years the use of French has been dying out, and of the seventeen Walloon Churches still in existence only those at Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and the Hague seem to possess the elements of prolonged vitality. It will be remembered that M. Athanase Coquere père was minister of the Walloon Church at Rotterdam before he went to the Oratoire in Paris, and that M. Albert Réville, of Dieppe, subsequently occupied the same pulpit.

THE Liberal of Calcutta, conducted by Keshub Chunder Sen and his friends, has the following "Note," which we give entire, partly as an indication of opinion among our Brahmo Somaj friends, and partly to enable Mr. Channing to give the desired explanation either in our own columns or in those of our Indian contemporary:—

At a meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Dr. W. B. Carpenter moved the following resolution:—

"That this Council, meeting on the day of the funeral of the illustrious Darwin, desire to record their profound regret at the loss of that eminent naturalist, whose unsurpassed ability, whose single-minded devotion to truth, and whose patience and unwearied investigations in various departments of science, mark a new epoch in its history, and throw fresh light on the immutable laws of divine government and the progress of humanity."

Mr. Channing, who seconded this, said, as a theologian, that so far from tending to Atheism or Pantheism Darwin's views tended more and more to bring men to Christ and Christianity. With all respect for the learned speakers, we confess we do not understand this. Darwinism may not be hostile to the existence of God, as many eminent writers think and say; but does it not give at best, to use Carlyle's words, "an absentee God sitting idle ever since the first Sabbath, at the outside of his universe, and seeing it go?" We should like to have some light thrown upon this question. Mr. Channing is a devout Christian, whose opinions carry a deal of weight, and when he says that he has been led by Darwin's doctrines more and more to Christ and Christianity, we should like to know in what sense this is true.

M. DE FREYCINET, attending on Sunday the unveiling of a statue of Rouget de Lisle, at Choisy-le-Roi, said the composer of the "Marseillaise" had embodied in an immortal song the patriotic sentiment. The "Marseillaise," written to excite volunteers to a prodigiously unequal struggle, was at once warlike and religious. He said religious because patriotism was a religion. M. Michelet had called the "Marseillaise" a sacred hymn. It had been rightly chosen as the national air, but it was no longer a war song, because the Republic, respecting the rights of all, was a government of concord and goodwill. The France of to-day had nothing to fear from tyranny either at home or abroad. The standard she held was not a bloody standard, but one of progress, civilisation, and liberty. This is a remarkable change from the time of Napoleon III., when any one playing or singing the "Marseillaise" in the streets was arrested for sedition. It is not true in France or elsewhere that "the former times were better than these."

THOSE of our readers in London and elsewhere who were acquainted with the late admirable Russell Scott will read with deepest personal interest the full report we have given elsewhere of the opening of a handsome new school-building at Denton in Cheshire. Over one of the entrances is engraved in stone the inscription "In Remembrance of Russell Scott, 1882, erected for the furtherance of education in this town." The building, which has cost some thousands of pounds, is a worthy monument to the memory of one of the best of men, whose widow and sons are now residents in or near the thriving manufacturing town of which they are among the foremost benefactors. One of the speakers on occasion of the opening said that it generally fell to the lot of the Secretary to tell the cost of the building, how it had been raised, or what remained owing, and how it was proposed to meet the deficiency; the munificence of Mrs. Scott, however, had entirely deprived him of those duties. And another speaker, an inhabitant of the place, well reminded the meeting that an unspeakable debt of gratitude was due to the Scott family for their provision for the children of Denton. The spirit in which it was offered, and the spirit which seemed to actuate the promoters of that school, was under the circumstances of the most valuable kind that could be offered to Denton. In the very felicitous words of the same speaker, we may add the expression of the hope and confidence that the people of Denton will look upon that building, and upon the name over its door, with the same feeling, the same wide generous love of mankind, the same desire to improve humanity in every stage and under all circumstance, that had prompted the founder of the school, her children, and her noble husband who had gone before.

Outlines of Primitive Belief among the Indo-European Races. By Charles Francis Keary, M.A. London: Longmans, Green and Co. 1882.

The title of this book is not well chosen to express its object. It errs both by excess and defect. In the first place, though it begins with tree and mountain fetiches, it includes a number of beliefs which can in no sense be called primitive, such as the adopted worship of Isis or Serapis in Rome, and it even carries on the story through St. Patrick's Purgatory to Dante's Divine Comedy. And, secondly, though some of the chief deities of India, of Greece, and of Germany, are described and discussed, many other nations of the great Indo-European group receive scarcely any attention at all. It is, in fact, somewhat difficult to infer what are the principles which have guided the writer in the selection of his materials. If he quits India when the Vedic hymns are completed, why does he linger in Greece over the decay of the Homeric religion, in order to introduce his readers to Neoplatonism? Indeed, it is quite plain that neither the Vedic hymns nor the Homeric poems can be said with any strictness to represent primitive belief. One singer moralises over the seeming parricide of Agin in devouring the parent sticks out of which he is begotten; another vigorously replies to those who say "there is no Indra." Here we have plainly the later stages of the worship of these deities; and they are themselves by no means the earliest in the growth of Aryan thought.

We must not, however, press the author's term 'primitive' too closely. He has himself well remarked that "phases of belief are not to be measured by the mere lapse of time, no more than geological strata are to be measured by their distance from the centre earth. Some primitive formation may lie quite near the surface, side by side with another formation which is of yesterday. Therefore, along with quite modern notions on religious matters, we may trace the forms of primitive belief" (p. 49). This is perfectly true; our complaint is, that the writer does not always sufficiently carefully discriminate. Thus he passes from the mysteries of Demeter to the Bethlehem drama of St. Francis (p. 235), observing that "all the 'mystics' in the modern purely religious sense . . . have turned to such dramatic pictures as the Greeks rejoiced in at Eleusis." But he fails to establish any real connection between the two; and the suggested link of mysteries and mysticism cannot be carried through the history of modern mysticism at any rate without snapping altogether.

Passing, however, to the author's main theme, we find ourselves in sincere sympathy with much of his general thought. He starts with a chapter on the nature of belief, which contains many just remarks on the psychological conditions of primitive thought; though he has failed, we think, to bring out the exact character of what seems to be the earliest view of the objects of nature (e.g., trees, rivers, &c.) as spontaneous agents. With his plea for the genesis of belief in a primitive fetishism, as opposed to Mr. Herbert Spencer's theory of its sole root in the worship of ancestors, we entirely concur. His illustrations of the survivals of worship originally connected with trees, rivers, and mountains, are often very happy: we may note, in particular, his ingenious remarks on the significance of serpent worship as the symbols of rivers. From the traces of an original fetishism our author proceeds to the stage of nature worship, from which the next step is to anthropomorphism. Not that these can always be clearly distinguished from each other, as his subsequent chapters prove; but they suffice to indicate a line of advance, along which the growth of thought may be followed. We could wish that Mr. Keary had dealt more with the earlier, and less with the later, aspects of this development. Much has been written on the larger forms of Indian or Greek divinities; much remains to be done in putting together the scattered hints of language and rite for the investigation of the older thought. Thus, Mr. Keary is so anxious to avoid any form of Mr. Spencer's theory that all religious belief have sprung out of the worship of ancestors that he scarcely allows this great motive its due place in ancient theory. The whole doctrine of the rise of the notion of the other self receives, but scanty treatment; though some later elaborations of its future destiny are excellently set forth in two most interesting chapters (vi. and viii.) on the "Other World," and the "Shadow of Death." In the former of these the author offers an exceedingly interesting (and, so far as we remember, a new) interpretation of the Odyssey, as the great epic of the sea of death. One essential idea lies, in his view, at the bottom of the myth of the Odyssean voyages, viz., the idea of death and the next world. This is worked out with great skill, and is at all events refreshing after the frequent identification of it with the adventures of the sun. In dealing with this and some kindred departments of Greek mythology the writer seems to us to have too much neglected the possibility, and, indeed the probability of foreign influences. This is surely the case with the figure of Heracles, and perhaps of Apollo, to a greater extent than he is willing to allow. These were not pure products of Hellenic thought, still less of "proto-Aryan" belief. From the Semitic side, also, certain elements were infused, of which our author neglects to take account. But here his learning sometimes fails him, or he would not say that the word ashera "also signifies a grove" (p. 79), or describe Adonis as an earth god (p. 217). Slips like these sometimes throw doubt on our author's competence as a philologist and an interpreter, while the description of Dante as "assisting at the obsequies of a dead creed, and for its enshrinement preparing a costly and splendid tomb," makes one distrustful of his reading of the spiritual forces of thought and feeling. Still, when all abatements are made, this book remains interesting and suggestive. It cannot be called methodical or complete; but it contains a number of valuable illustrations of modes of belief which the historian of religion finds among the most intricate and difficult to understand. Every fresh attempt at exposition made with such earnestness and simplicity of purpose as Mr. Keary everywhere displays deserves a hearty welcome and sincere respect.

Commentary on the Book of Job. With translation by the late Dr. G. K. A. van Ewald. Translated from the German by J. Frederick Smith. Williams and Norgate. London: 1882.

The time is past when we could sit at the feet of Ewald and accept his expositions of Israelitish literature with the unquestioning faith they demand. He has founded no school and left no disciples. Yet he has done a work for Biblical criticism which may fairly be compared with the work done by Ruskin for the study of art in England. He has opened the way to a new world of thought, a new field of research. What he has written has proved intensely stimulating to the minds of others, and suggestive of endless further inquiry and elaboration. He has proved that his subject is one of deepest interest to scholars, and a very much wider circle, including all ministers of religion, have reason to be grateful for the results of his prodigious labours.

The Commentary on the Book of Job will be specially acceptable, because it deals with a work which to a large extent stands apart from the rest of the Bible, and may be considered independently of all questions of Jewish history. It is purely anonymous, and it is not important when it was written—even whether before or after the Captivity. It deals with a subject which has been of surpassing interest throughout almost the whole period of Israel's existence, and which has certainly lost none of this interest in these latter days. While the air is full of theories of pessimism and refutations of them, we may well be glad of an opportunity of studying, under ablest guidance, the earliest Hebrew attempt to grapple with the great problem of evil.

This opportunity is afforded by the work before us. In the first place, we have a sufficiently trustworthy translation, which, as almost everyone knows, we have not got in the Authorised Version. In the next place, we have the benefit of all Ewald's rare insight and sympathy, his marvellous powers of appreciation and of teaching others to appreciate, in which we think the essence of his genius consists. He makes us feel, as no other author has done, the intense earnestness and the depth of emotion with which Job deals with his mental difficulties. Our whole sympathies go out towards the man who was so sorely tried and so wrongly comforted; we learn to distrust our own powers of explaining the causes of other people's misfortunes, and realise the value of friendship which is content to do what it can to relieve suffering, without seizing the opportunity to urge unpalatable advice. We are shown how Job's confidence in his own integrity rises to meet the accusations which grow from gentle limits to direct calumny, and how this sense of a good conscience thus becomes a more and more dearly-cherished possession. We are helped to understand how all traditional explanations of suffering as the direct punishment for sin go utterly to pieces upon this rock of moral consciousness, and how in the strength of this direct testimony of conscience something like comparative peace is obtained, along with a renewed trust in God, and at least the first beginnings of the hope in a future life. Ewald is especially impressive in pointing out the various limits at a solution of the problem which are made in the book, and in showing that we cannot expect to find more than limits. We are admitted to the first inception of a great idea which it took centuries more to develop. Here are accumulated almost all the materials for the explanation of the mystery of evil, so far as the mind of man has explained it even to this day; the inestimable increase in the worth of virtue when it is proved capable of standing the test of affliction; the power of the soul to triumph over outward disasters while the conscience is clear; the supremacy of the verdict of the individual conscience, not to be disputed by all the wisdom of the ancients or any strength of popular clamour; the possibility of trusting God even when His ways cannot be understood, in spite of intense longing to understand them better, ay, even to alter them for what seems the better; the power of still believing that in some way or other the future is vast enough to make all right in the end—all these thoughts are not only present in the Book of Job, but vigorously enforced; and Ewald will do much to help us realise their presence and their power. At the same time we are left fully conscious that we are conducted only to the threshold of an explanation, and there we are left to enter in ourselves unto clearer light, or not, according to our individual conviction and temperament. If Ewald can show us all this we shall not be disposed to complain because sometimes he seems to read more into the words of the patriarch than we can ourselves find in them, or because his love of system-building leads him to ascribe more logical sequence and consistency to the argument than most other critics will admit. We are thankful to him for having interpreted to us so much that we can now understand and appreciate. When we cannot follow him, we need not oppose, but may simply pass on to questions of more permanent and vital import.

The name of the translator is a sufficient guarantee for the translation; and we would only add that in the present volume Mr. J. Frederick Smith's work will fully support the reputation he has already won.

Elements of Morality: in Easy Lessons for Home and School Teaching. By Mrs. Charles Bray. Longmans, 1882.

We gave a "short notice" of this charming little work a few weeks ago. But as it has now been adopted by the Sunday School Association, and is recommended for use in our Sunday-schools, we think we shall render a service to many of our friends and fellow-workers by reverting to it more at length, and pointing out how well it is adapted for both our schools and our families.

Mrs. Bray has unquestionably rendered a great service to the important work of home and school teaching by these "Easy Lessons"—embodying as they do, in fact, the great principles and the unselfish aims that must ever form the basis of a useful, happy, beautiful, Christian life. Her "Physiology for Schools" was an admirable contribution to the better knowledge of the laws and conditions on which health is dependent—a subject sadly neglected, as the early sufferings of so many testify—and it is to be feared that elementary physiology does not yet receive the attention, both in our public and private schools, which its great importance deserves. But in the sphere of morals, beyond the general duty of truthfulness, there is not much regular or systematic training. How few persons are duly alive to the radical and fatal vice of selfishness, or seek to check in themselves or in the young this dangerous tendency, which assumes so many forms and manifestations. Yet selfishness, in some shape, is at the root of most of our miseries and mishaps, whether personal or social; and much of the dignity and beauty, of the peace, the usefulness and the happiness of life depends on the spirit and the habit of unselfishness—not thinking too much of ourselves, our position, interests, or gratification; more pleased to give than to receive; ready to take the lowest place if others are to benefit, and finding the most genuine and lasting joy in doing good. To such as are seeking to make this spirit the pervading influence of the home or the school Mrs. Bray's book will be invaluable; it supplies a want that has been long felt, for the manuals, the sermons to children or the other aids we have had to convey easy moral lessons to our young people have not been sufficiently attractive; they have been prepared by men probably earnest and excellent, but not gifted with the peculiar sympathy or the spiritual genius fitted to interest and attract children. This tender childlike sympathetic quality we take to be the characteristic of the work before us, and hence its simple nameless charm. We have seen no treatise on morality, whether elementary or otherwise, that is charged with richer lessons of wisdom and goodness, all the more winning, because entirely without pretension; only easy lessons for the home and the school, and happy the young people whose lives and characters may be moulded by their teaching.

The book is divided into two parts, each part again consists of so many chapters, with the headings:—"We Cannot Exist Alone," "Life and Love," "Home and Love," "Home and Duty," "The Morning of Life," "Reverence," "Social Duty," "Honest Work," "Patriotism," "The Good that Conquers Evil," &c.

We give the third chapter, "Home and Love," that our readers may be able to judge for themselves:—

"Without hearts there is no home."

The world which the child first lives in is his home. Father, mother, brothers and sisters form the small community among which our minds first begin to grow. There the feelings first plant themselves, and there the habits are first formed which make us what we are for the rest of our lives.

The very name of home has a pleasant sound. If you go out into the streets the people pass by you, and do not notice you; they do not care to know who you are, nor where you are going. Therefore to be "turned out into the streets" is a terrible thing for a little child, it is worse than being left alone. But directly you enter the door of your own home, you are spoken to by your name; you are asked where you have been, perhaps food has been preparing for you, and somebody has been thinking of you while you were away. You are safe in the midst of others who care for you.

For, as it is natural for the mother to love her child, so it is natural for the members of a family to love one another. They all dwell together in one house and sleep under the same roof. If one of them is made happy all are glad, if one of them is sick or in trouble all are sad, and this union and sympathy in all things make them very dear to one another. Even if you could live alone you could not be happy alone. Think what makes the pleasure of every day. It is the talking together, the playing or walking together, the seeing things together, the eating together, the learning together. "Come and play with me," "come and talk to me," "come and sit by me," is the constant entreaty of a solitary child. Companionship is what all desire.

Sometimes, however, evil things enter into a house, which turn all the family union and pleasure into bitterness. Look at that pretty house, which stands in the midst of trees where little birds are chirping and feeding their young ones. That house ought to be a pleasant home for children. But it is haunted by an evil spirit called Selfishness, which has a brood of ugly offspring that darken the house by their presence.

One of this brood, called Idleness, has just been making mischief. The children rose late in the morning because they were idle. They were not too idle to eat their breakfast, but they were too idle to do any work. They refused to help their mother with her household affairs; they refused to do any lessons; they lounged about and yawned. If some of them tried to shake off the evil spirit, and to set about some useful work, the idle ones disturbed and interrupted them.

Then swiftly another of the selfish brood flew in among them, called Ill-temper, and the children began to quarrel. Through the open window you may hear the strife growing louder and hotter. "Don't do that!" "I shall!" "You shan't!" "You shan't have my picture book," cries a little voice. "I will," says a bigger one. Then comes Tyranny to help the big boy, who cuffs his little sister, snatches her book from her, and tears the leaves in the rough pull he gives it. Then the little girl cries, and in comes the mother to see what is the matter. "He has taken my book and torn it," sobs the little girl. "Never mind," says the mother, who is not a wise mother, "his father shall whip him for it when he comes home." "I didn't tear her book," shouts the big boy; "she tore it herself." For the two ugliest imps of all the book have just now mingled with the others, Falsehood and Cowardice.

Many other odious habits and dispositions are the offspring of selfishness. Greediness comes in at meal-times. Covetousness, which desires to take all, but to give nothing. Obstinacy, which will have its own way, whether the way is good or not. Revenge, which returns evil for evil, and so multiplies the evil; and all these selfish spirits are like infectious diseases, and spread from one child to another, so that the bad temper of one will sometimes make everybody in a household bad tempered. Not only are these diseases of the mind and temper infectious, but they grow apace if left to riot in the disposition unchecked; and as the child grows up into the man they will eat the heart out of the character as the worm eats the heart out of blossom and fruit.

Now let us chase away the spirit of Selfishness from that pretty house among the trees, and let the sweet spirit of love take possession, and there will be sunshine within, pleasanter and brighter even than the sunshine outside.

Short Notices.

A Discourse on Christian Unitarianism. By James Taplin.

The venerable minister of Kingswood Chapel, near Birmingham, after a ministry of sixty-five years, continues, and we hope will continue for some years more, to lift up his voice on behalf of the religious faith to which he has borne life-long testimony, and in emphatic protest against the unscriptural corruptions which obscure the worship of the only God. Affirmative preaching is no doubt the best mode of promoting the religious life of a congregation; but there are times when controversial and doctrinal preaching of the old type is needed, and will continue to be needed as long as ancient errors are preached in thousand of churches and chapels, as if they are unquestioned truths. Mr. Taplin's discourse is a clear and valuable argument, showing unfailing power of reasoning, and a wide range of Biblical and ecclesiastical reading. Most of our readers are very familiar with the controversy, but such sermons are still useful for the young, and especially for those who are inquiring or have lately joined our churches from other communions. An appendix contains the following interesting notes respecting two well-known Unitarians:—

Among my numerous publications, many of which are now out of print, I quote from one which appeared forty-five years ago, containing an account of several distinguished clergymen who seceded from the Episcopal Church, and embraced Unitarian Christianity from studying the New Testament in the Original Greek. Among these, a faithful and much endeared friend, now no more, the Rev. Robert Gibson, B.A., of Cambridge University, and subsequently of Fifield Rectory, Essex, where he lived for some years, much beloved by his parishioners for his piety and benevolence. On quitting the Church he retired to a small cottage, which is still to be seen, at Seaton, on the coast of Devonshire, where he devoted his days to the earnest study of the Greek Scriptures. He was introduced to me by a friend at his own request, and after a few hours' conversation on general theology he soon revealed himself by quoting the sentiment, "Veritas nihil veretur nisi abscondi," and assured me that he was constrained to abandon his orthodox opinions, and to avow with Paul, "To us there is but one God, even the Father," in which faith he lived, and died in peace and hope. But the most remarkable circumstance of this kind I experienced during my residence in Jersey.

Captain Edwards, a military officer, who had distinguished himself at the battle of Waterloo, when returning home with his troops, and entering Canterbury Barracks, his horse fell and threw him on the scabbard of his sword, injuring his spine. So serious was the accident that he was obliged to sell out and retire into private life. He took up his residence in Jersey, where his intellectual culture and social disposition drew around him a large circle of friends. Unable to walk, he devoted himself to the study of religion. By reading the New Testament, Griesbach's edition of the Greek original, and comparing it with the text of the Common Version and with the doctrines of the Common Prayer Book, he became a Christian Unitarian. Having these books daily on his table, a friend asked him what his theological opinions were. He replied that they were peculiar to himself, and declined to divulge them, which increased his friend's curiosity, and pressing him continually on the subject, he at last replied, "I find many defects in the common English version; and as to the Prayer Book, its creed could never have been taken from the New Testament, for we there read that Christ and his Apostles worshipped one God and one God only, whereas the Prayer Book bids us worship three, 'unity in trinity and the trinity in unity.' I have read the Scriptures most attentively, but I can find no such language there, or anything leading to it." His friend replied, "You are a Unitarian." "Are there any such people in existence?" said the captain. "Yes," replied his friend, "there is a Society of Unitarian Christians in the island, supported by Admiral Gifford." Having expressed a desire to see and converse with the admiral, an interview took place, and on the following day I accompanied him to call on Captain Edwards, and from that time till his death I visited him continually, reading with him from Griesbach, by the study of which he was confirmed in the faith of Christian Unitarianism, assuring me that if he had not learnt Christianity by a careful study of the Scriptures from Griesbach's text, he must have renounced it and died an unbeliever. "I now rejoice," he said, "that I can revere Christ as the author and finisher of my faith, and the teacher of the most precious hopes, inspiring me with comfort in my long affliction." I was at his bed-side when death came upon him. His end was peace. The few that were present joined me in saying, "The same shall be called great in the kingdom of Heaven."

The Magazines.

Good Words continues Mr. Charles Gibbon's spirited tale of Scotch life, "The Golden Shaft," and Mr. Anthony Trollope's "Kept in the Dark," which seems poor and thin. Mr. J. G. Bertram gives an illustrated account of "The Scottish Herring Fishery;" and Mr. C. Blatherwick, under the heading "Between Two Waters," describes an artist's holiday in the Pyrenees in a very lively style, with some amusing illustrations. The Rev. H. R. Haweis has an enthusiastic sketch of "Garibaldi" and his remarkable career, partly founded upon personal observation and impressions at Naples at the time of the flight of the King and the siege of Capua. "Farewell to Fuinary" is a most interesting account, by the editor, of his relative, Dr. John Macleod of Morven, a remarkable Highland minister, who died last May, after a ministry of fifty-eight years. The Rev. Harry Jones contributes some interesting "Notes on Ancient Egypt;" and the only other article of note is Professor Robertson Smith's, on "The Place of the Old Testament in the Christian Church." The following passage will serve to show the tone of this admirable paper:—

There are two ways in which one may conveniently realise for one's self in a concrete way what the Old Testament was to the Mediæval Church. One of these is to take up any of the received commentaries of these ages—say the Glossa Ordinaria, a sort of catena of Patristic exegesis, which was very largely used throughout the Western Church. The expositions are often ingenious, and sometimes display a vein of not unattractive fancy, but the general effect is one of hopeless confusion. There is no attempt to find any clear consecutive line of thought in the Old Testament books. Everything is fragmentary, and the expositor is habitually content to attach to each text some lesson coinciding with received theological doctrine, without asking himself whether he could have got the doctrine out of the text had he not known it before. . . . A more impressive view of the place of the Old Testament in the Mediæval Church may, however, be got in another way, by studying the choice of Old Testament lessons in the Service Books of the West. The allegorical interpretation, which in the exegetical works of the Patristic and Mediæval doctors so constantly repels us by its unreality and manifest want of scientific value, produces a very different impression when we meet it in the service of the Mass or the hymns of the Latin Church. If it is difficult to understand how it could ever have satisfied a sober intellect, it is easy to sympathise with the profound influence which it exerted on the devotional imagination, lifting the whole realm of religious contemplation far above the world of common reality into a magic wonderland, where the heavenly temple rose like some vast cathedral in whose darkened aisles and shadowy chapels every stone was carved with symbols full of meaning, and every window shone with pictures of divine beauty. All this, however, brought men no nearer to the true understanding of the Old Testament religion, which was, in fact, the very opposite of the fantastic thing which Mediæval imagination painted it, not a system of mysterious and half-comprehended types, but a plain and practical religion of daily life addressed to one of the most matter-of-fact nations that ever existed; it left no room for substantial progress in Biblical study, and so the Church went on, not approaching a better understanding of the pre-Christian dispensation as a whole, still using the Old Testament as a symbol or poetical picture of the Church in its Mediæval organisation, with its hierarchy and its magical sacraments, and so basing practical theories upon it, especially in the sphere of Church office and Church government, yet never, down to the time of the Reformation, getting rid of the two great fallacies of the allegorical interpretation and the doctrine of the new law.

The Journal of the National Indian Association opens with the recent valuable address of Mr. Roper Lethbridge, C.I.E., late Press Commissioner in India, on "High Education in India." This, with the discussion that followed, in which we observe our friend the Rev. C. H. A. Dall, of Calcutta, now on a visit to this country, took part, occupies the greater part of the present number, and leaves room only for the continuation of the story by Tekehand Thakur, illustrating Indian life, and an article entitled "An Englishman in Bombay," by Mr. E. J. Khory, a Parsi gentleman of Bombay. The essayist dwelt in the greater part of his paper on the less favourable features of the English character, but in concluding he took "a hasty review of the benefits which the natives of India have, up to this time, derived from the stay of an Englishman in India." He has suppressed suttee, infanticide, the Juggernaut sacrifices, the Thugs, and many other barbarities. He has almost succeeded in driving away ignorance; he has spread English education through the length and breadth of India. He has introduced railways, the telegraph, steam power, the press, and the gaslight. His stay has chased away anarchy and despotism from India. He has made ignorance, indolence and superstition slowly give way to education, energy, intellect and truth. He is patiently evolving the social and political regeneration of India. And yet (says Mr. Khory) "many self-constituted Indian patriots always come forward, raising an uproar that Englishmen have nothing to do with India, and that the people ought to be left alone to rule over their own country." It is pleasant to find that Mr. Khory is not one of these so-called patriots, and that he expresses his "extreme gratification that, notwithstanding all clamours for self-government, and cries for the redress of many imaginary grievances, a greater part of the educated, intelligent and sensible population of India has already begun to perceive in England, not the money-grubber, not the blood-sucker, not the tyrant, but the nourisher, the protector, and, above all, the benefactor."

The Sunday Review for the current quarter contains chiefly official reports of the excellent address by the President, Viscount Powerscourt, of the Second National Conference, held on the 17th of May, and the Seventh Annual Meeting of the Society, held on the 19th of May, and also of the Debate in the House of Commons on the proposed extension of Sunday opening. In the Conference we observe among the speakers the names of our friends Dr. W. B. Carpenter, Mr. G. Courtauld, M.P., the Rev. M. C. Gascoigne, of Deptford, and Mr. James Solly, J.P., of Tipton.

Cassell's Family Magazine [continues the two serial stories, "No Proof" and "Was it Wise to Change?" and among other articles of a bright and interesting character are, "Crawley Down and its Neighbourhood," a charming sketch of a retired nook in Sussex; "In an Old Oak Workshop," an illustrated account of old furniture; "A Stroll through the Parliamentary Lobby," a lively description of the people to be found there; "How to Choose a Pair of Spectacles," in which Dr. Litton Forbes gives information needed by most people past fifty; "Milk as a Curative Agent," in which "the Family Doctor" sings the praises of what some people style "the lacteal fluid"; "The Violin for Girls," who may handle it very gracefully; "How they make Beads," an instructive illustrated article; and "Reporters and their Work," a slight paper, from which we, at least, learn nothing.

The Magazine of Art has for its frontispiece the fine picture entitled "The Heir Presumptive," by an American artist, Mr. George Boughton, A.R.A., which was exhibited at the Academy. The first paper is a biographical account of Mr. Boughton, with a portrait and engraving of two of his works, by Alice Meynell. Among the other contributions, some containing admirable engravings of pictures in the Academy and Grosvenor of this year, are "Japanese and Chinese Bronzes," by George Wallis; "After the Herring," a lively account of a profitable trade, with good illustrations by Aaron Watson; "The Salon of 1882," by J. Forbes-Robertson; "Canterbury Cathedral," by the Rev. Professor Bonney, with six admirable drawings by G. L. Seymour; and "Van Dyck," with seven engravings of his etchings and studies.

The Sunday Magazine opens with a continuation of Mr. George Macdonald's serial tale "Weighed and Wanting." The ubiquitous and never-resting naturalist, the Rev. J. G. Wood, contributes one of his popular scientific articles on "Homes under the Sea." Among other papers are "The Childhood and Youth of a Slave," founded on the recent autobiography of Frederick Douglass; "Japan at Home and Church," an illustrated sketch of Eastern travel, by Ralli Stenning; "King Roy," a story for the young, by L. T. Meade; and the always excellent "Sunday Evenings with the Children," by the Rev. B. Waugh.

Literary Notes.

It is now stated that the authorised Life of Longfellow will be written by his brother, the Rev. Samuel Longfellow, who has resigned his pastoral charge in Germantown, Pennsylvania, and come to live with the poet's daughters.

An article on "Personal Recollections about Garibaldi," by Karl Blind, will appear in the next number of Fraser.

Mr. E. MAGNUSSEN, of the University Library, Cambridge, has nearly completed his long-expected edition of the "Saga of Thomas à Becket" in the Rolls Series, which will establish several points of great interest and novelty.

M. RENAN's book on the Ecclesiastes has been placed on the Index.

The journals kept by the late Mr. Nassau W. Senior during his residence in Egypt in the winter and spring 1855-56 will shortly be published. Although the events are past and the situation is changed, these journals may certainly be expected to add to our knowledge of individuals at a juncture which contributed much to the making of subsequent history.

Mr. FROUDE, one of the Honorary Fellows of the Royal Historical Society, has been selected by the Council for the new class of Emeritus Fellows, which is limited to two in each year.

Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, a kinsman of the late distinguished naturalist, has been appointed manager of the Yorkshire Post (published at Leeds); and Mr. Charles Pebody, of the Bristol Times and Mirror, who lately wrote a volume in "Cassell's Shilling Library" on "English Journalism, and the Men who have made It," has been appointed editor of the same important daily newspaper.

The Holy Synod of the Russian Church has recently adopted a resolution to authorise a translation of the Bible and of a portion of the liturgy into Livonian, and also into Esthonian. This resolve is said to be not unconnected with the sympathy that the Government has begun to show towards the nationalist or Finnish movement in the Baltic Provinces.

A NEWLY-DISCOVERED "Fourth of July Oration," delivered by Daniel Webster in 1802, when he was twenty years of age, has been published by Messrs. A. Villiers and Co., of Boston.

ENTOMOLOGISTS may be glad to know that Mr. Grote, president of the New York Entomological Club, has written an essay on the Noctuidæ of North America, with coloured illustrations of some forty-five species, which will be published in this country by Mr. Van Voorst.

An unfinished work of Kant, never before printed, is to appear in the Altpreussische Monatschrift.

The journals kept by the late Mr. Nassau W. Senior during his residence in Egypt in the winter and spring 1855-56 will shortly be published. Although the events are past and the situation is changed, these journals may certainly be expected to add to our knowledge of individuals at a juncture which contributed much to the making of subsequent history.

The August number of the Atlantic Monthly has a portrait of Emerson, engraved on steel, which is thought by the family to be the best.

M. RENAN will after his return from the East publish a translation of the Psalms.

The family of the late George Henry Lewes have presented the philosophical and scientific portions (over 2,000 volumes) of his library to Dr. Williams's Trustees in order that the books may be available to special students at the library in Grafton-street. The only condition attaching to the generous gift is that the books be arranged on distinct shelves, and that each volume bear some record that it formed a part of the "George Henry Lewes Library."

The British Museum has lately received from the neighbourhood of Babylon three beautiful boundary stones covered all over with inscriptions, hieroglyphs (those generally considered as zodiacal signs), and very nice human figures. The first stone bears the name of Meli-sikhu, King of Babylon (whose name is contained in the list of kings discovered by Mr. T. G. Pinches), who ruled about 1175 B.C. The second is dated in the fifth year of Nabu-kain-abli, King of Babylon, whose name has not yet been found either in the cuneiform documents or the classics, but by the style of writing his reign ought to be placed at the beginning of the seventeenth century B.C. On this stone are the image of the king and that of Ziria, to whom the estate was granted. The third stone is more interesting; it has been engraved with great care, and one side is entirely covered with the so-called zodiacal signs. We understand this care when we learn from the inscription that the stone was set up by order of Nebuchadnezzar, as a memorial of the taking back of a piece of land from the Elamites and its restoration to the country of Akkad.

KINGSWOOD, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—The anniversary school services were held in this ancient chapel on Sunday last, when two effective and appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. A. Chalmers, of Wakefield. The collection in the morning, when the attendance was not so good as usual on account of the rain, amounted to nearly £40. In the evening the chapel was crowded in every part, and the collection amounted to about £16. The singing of the children, to which part of the devotional services great attention is paid, was very effective.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—On Sunday last (July 23rd) a large party of members of the Sunday Society, by permission of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, visited Apsley House, and were shown the historical paintings and other works of art in the Waterloo Gallery, the museum, &c. Between 3,000 and 4,000 people visited the Royal Albert Hall during the afternoon. The last of the organ recitals arranged by the council of the Royal Albert Hall will take place on Sunday next, tickets for which may be had by sending stamped and addressed envelope to Mark H. Judge, 8, Park-place Villas, W.

Our Contemporaries.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

The Echo writes:—

The Dean of Wells has addressed a letter to the chief of the Salvation Army, with the evident design of promoting an Eirenicon between the Army and the Church. "General" Booth, in a brief but courteous reply, evades binding himself and his followers to any conditions. This might have been expected from the first. Eminent ecclesiastics are anxious to control the movement in the interests of the Church; the leaders of the Army are anxious to secure the sympathy which is sure to bring material aid. Each are anxious to use each. In this game of skill "General" Booth has, up to the present time, proved the more successful player. We can understand the solicitude of the bishops; they are profoundly impressed with the folly of the prelates of the last century who drove the Methodists out of the Church. But they fail to recognise the fact that the leaders of the Methodist revival of the eighteenth century were by birth and education loyal Churchmen, which the Salvation Army leaders are not. Whitfield and the Wesleys were Oxford men, and the latter, at least, never cast off altogether the teachings of their youth. "General" Booth and his family, on the other hand, grew up in the midst of a Democratic offshoot of the older Methodism. With them the sacerdotal assumptions of the clergy have far less weight than they had with the Wesleys, and by their less instructed followers such assumptions would not be tolerated for a moment. The sooner the dignitaries of the Church of England abandon the dream of absorbing the Salvation Army the better for their own comfort and usefulness. They may learn something from its mode of operation, they may with advantage to themselves recognise the good it is effecting, but absorption is almost impossible. Disestablishment being now an open question within the Church itself, there are really more points of agreement between the Church and the older Nonconformist bodies than between the Church and the Salvation Army. Fraternal feeling is desirable, but absorption is simply impossible.

AMERICAN D.D.'S.

The New York Christian Union (Henry Ward Beecher's paper) writes:—

Now is the season when college honours blossom, and men before unknown have greatness thrust upon them by high-schools and low-schools, chartered with the name of college in multitudinous country villages from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico. It is a worthy beneficence that founds colleges; it is a worthy enterprise that is ambitious to equip every State with collegiate institutions. But it would be a worthy self-restraint which should decline for them the privilege of granting honorary degrees. As it is, every college in the land—and there are, we believe, over three hundred—has this right, and most of them exercise it. As a consequence, Doctors of Divinity are almost as plenty in this Republic as colonels, and the one title means almost as little as the other. Degrees are created by the hundred every year: and to be without one is now rather more distinction than to possess one. No one knows where the degree comes from, or what its value, or what it cost. Ministers of not even a local reputation have been known to apply to their Alma Mater, much as a cross-road politician applies for a post-office, sending in a petition for the title with a list of indorsers who certify that he is worthy to receive it. It is currently, though we trust slanderously, reported that the degree is sometimes sold in open market. For this state of things there are three remedies possible. The most radical would be the best; it is therefore the least likely to be adopted. Abolish by common consent all honorary titles. Recognise no title that does not indicate an office. This is Republican, and it is also New Testament simplicity. We have abolished all titles from the State, why should they remain in the Church? Why D.D. when we have no Legion of Honour? The word Rabbi means Doctor; be ye not called Rabbi, means, be ye not called Doctors of Divinity. Why not read this precept literally and act upon it? But of course we shall not. The next best remedy would be to make our honours honourable. In England only universities can grant degrees; and there are but five universities. English degrees, therefore, mean something. If the American colleges would make common cause they could put an end to this multiplication of meaningless initials. If Harvard, Yale, Amherst, Princeton, and Ann Arbor would agree to appoint a commission of five scholarly men to grant all honorary degrees, or make nominations without which these colleges would not grant them, all other colleges would perforce have to join the combination; and degrees granted by one degree-granting body, acting for the whole body of American colleges, would really mean something. D.D. would not always have an interrogation mark written after it, if it were written by such a body. The last remedy is the poorest of all, and is, therefore, likely to be the one applied. D.D. is growing so common and so meaningless that it has almost ceased to be an honorary degree. When it ceases to be an honorary degree at all it will cease to be prized; and so this curious appetite for this harmless and useless initial will cure itself. Meanwhile, the remedy is a distressing one; and it is a pity that American scholars could not combine in applying a better one.

M. RENAN'S "ECCLESIASTES."

The Christian World, in an article on M. Renan's new translation of the book of Ecclesiastes (with a commentary), which has been placed in the "Index"—writes as follows:—

There is something amusing, if the subject admitted such a treatment, in the "cocksure" manner of M. Renan. He has as scant respect for the Ewalds and Hitzigs of German scholarship as for the old divines of the traditional school. He laughs at their compromises as much as at the dogmatic conclusions of the old school, and for plain people who do not profess to see by the inner light of subjective criticism the one conclusion is as good as the other. There is one remark, however, which M. Renan makes at the opening of his introduction, on which he throws a flood of light on the sceptical temper in general, and on his own case in particular. "If the writer," he observes, "has passed through a phase of scepticism without finally settling down into it, he bears at least the scars of this conflict to the end." "As for scepticism," he add, "as a settled state of mind, one is never converted out of it; one rather hardens into it even by the very efforts which we make to work ourselves clear of it. Even when we seem to be convalescent, it is only as a man recovers from an attack of fever, which admits of many relapses, and to the last never quite relaxes its hold of the sufferer." Was M. Renan, in describing thus the ideal Solomon, the author of Koheleth, thinking of himself? It certainly looks like it. Judge him as we may—and he certainly has some fine qualities—he has not escaped that Voltairean temper of persiflage which seems to haunt Frenchmen of the negative school. They have wit, and grace and polish, but we miss that grand seriousness, that earnestness to get to the bottom of the question, whatever it may lead to, which characterises German scholars even of the extreme Left. M. Renan compares the writer of Koheleth to a modern Jew of the type of Henri Heine, and the comparison is an apt one. But Heine, though German by birth, was French by adoption and sympathy, and we detect in M. Renan precisely this Heine temper of banter and trifling with serious subjects. "Vanity of vanities—all is vanity:" this is the key note of modern Pessimism, and ingenious critics like Mr. Sully have set down the author of Koheleth as the father of the school whose modern representatives are Leopardi, Schopenhauer, and Hartmann. This may be a true account of the philosophy of despair; it may be as old as the reputed Solomon, and the inquiry as Mr. Sully treats it, is well worthy of discussion. But the light and off-hand criticism of M. Renan rather repels us. He is as dogmatic in his negatives as the old school were in their affirmations, and with quite as little support on the solid ground of verified fact. He may smile at the fears of the Church of Rome, at her feeble way of putting down inquiry by placing a "sentinel on men's thoughts." The more excellent way is to attend to Milton's golden saying, that "truth is compared in Scripture to a streaming fountain: if her waters flow not in perpetual progression, they sink into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a heretic in the truth, and if he believes things only because his pastor says so, or the assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy." This is to put the question in its right light, and if we attend to this one canon of certitude we may stand between the "Index" and M. Renan as the Apostle did on Mars Hill, between Stoics and Epicureans.

PULPIT SERVICE.

The Liberal (Brahmo Somaj) has the following article, which is just as applicable to our own Churches as to the Brahmo Somaj:—

We must say we do not regret the practice of extempore service and sermon existing in the Brahmo Somaj. This is calculated to keep alive those devotional impulses without which divine service is likely to become dull and dead. But there is a word or two to be said on the subject of oral sermons. It is a most difficult thing to keep in a fixed state the attention of a large number of men by a long discourse when more than half the service is over. But the man who acts as minister ought surely to feel that he is responsible, so far as it lies in the manner and matter of his speech, for the devoutness of his congregation. This responsibility is best discharged by forgetting the manner in the matter. It is the pulpit that speaks, the minister is forgotten in his function. If it is the speech that attracts or obstructs the people that congregation is sure to melt away. If it is the substance that draws, the people so drawn will make a solid body upon whom the rain and storm of opposition will beat in vain. The best test of the character of a sermon is the minister himself. A true sermon benefiteth the speaker more than any body else in the congregation. When the minister descends from the pulpit with an empty unprofitable heart, he may rest assured that his flock returns home unfed and empty also. The minister must be able to place his theme most plainly and unmistakably before his congregation. His own subject, and every part of it, must be most clear to himself. When his own conviction is clear, and his object plain, impulse most undoubtedly comes from the spirit within to help him. But if his own mind is confounded, his discourse becomes a worse confusion. The minister should therefore seek guidance in prayer from God as to what he will say, and that his own faith may be ripe and clear. To conduct public service is one of the most solemn duties that a man can undertake. If he says anything that he ought not to say, all the people who hear him will be misled, and will one day call him to account. If he does not say anything that he ought to say, his omission will compromise the character of his church. The words, the voice, the bearing, the attitude will all go to form the character of the congregation. The sermon, therefore, which contains the pith of the whole service, ought to be taken care of above all things. The minister is the church embodied, all the principles of the congregation are for the time reflected upon him. His impulses scatter up among God's household, his words feed God's people. Let him, therefore, awake to the solemnity of his charge, and take heed of what he says. An extempore service is even a more serious thing than a written service. Because in that the words at least are another's. But when a man depends upon God for every word that he utters, his voice ought to be the breath of Him who calleth each man to his work, who rewardeth the faithful by giving an increased measure of spirit, and punisheth the unfaithful by taking away even the little they have.

EMERSON'S INFLUENCE.

The Nonconformist thinks that the positive side of Emerson's teaching, that which asserts the unity of all law and life, the universality of spiritual law, is much vaster and more enduring than the negative side of his influence:—

Here we think his influence has in many respects been valuable, even among those who do not follow him in repudiating a Gospel of facts and a Personal Ruler of the universe. For while the truth that God is personal is essential as a basis for revelation and theology, yet the tendency of Christian teachers has been to forget the impersonal aspect of Divine truth, and to resolve spiritual law into the expression of personal will. And it is too often supposed that those who realise and enforce the eternal and inherent power of great spiritual laws are falling into some bottomless quagmire of Emersonian mysticism, and will soon lose historic faith altogether. For our own part, we are at a loss to understand why a Christian teacher should not be profoundly transcendental and distinctly personal at the same time; why we should find it necessary to cast aside the characteristic affirmations of Christianity, in order to accept all the wealth of mystic wisdom that Emerson uttered. For Emerson had some of the best qualities of the mystics, and we have referred to the great mystic writers as his most cherished teachers. From them he learnt to see the divinity of man—he did not learn from Christianity to see the humanity of God. These two contrasted sides of one truth became antagonistic in his mind. It is for the Church of the future to bring them together in full-orbed reconciliation. Emerson's special teaching is the impersonality of God, and of the divine element in man and nature. We have said that this is a point of view that needs to be asserted. It is most systematically lost sight of when the obverse truth is crystallised into the Swedenborgian dogma that Jesus is the one Eternal, only God and Father. We prefer to retain the grand divine impersonality to which Emerson offered all the homage of his rapt, musing spirit—a luminous and vital essence pervading all things, and filling all nature, the home of all transcendental thought and speculation, the abysmal fountain of poetry and philosophy, while we retain all the homely simplicity of the story of Nazareth, and see the Eternal light of men clothed in human form. Some Orthodox admirers of Emerson were very anxious during the last years of his life to persuade themselves and others that Emerson had retreated from his negative position and recanted his scepticisms. It was not a wise suggestion. Emerson had his own thought to utter, and we would not have it unspoken, even though we must consent to accept it in its negative environments. The vessel of truth tacks; Emerson carried it to an extreme in one direction; the theological teachers around him carried it to an equal extreme in another direction. Meanwhile, the education of humanity is forwarded by both extremes, and wisdom is justified of her children.

DEISM AND THEISM.

The Liberal, the able organ of the Brahmo Somaj of India, has the following article, defining the essential distinction between these etymological synonymous words in a way which will, we hope, clear up a prevailing confusion of ideas:—

It cannot be denied that the most rationalistic movements may have church organisation. Even the followers of Augustus Comte have a so-called church. But the church of true Theism is a divinely-appointed body, headed and organised by the Spirit of God, and carried on by ministers and apostles who have received their commission from Heaven. Divine providence is daily present in that church, and guides all its functions, and directs all its operations. The constitution of such a church is developed out of its spiritual experiences, and formed along with its religion. The government of this church is carried on by the spirit of Divine justice and love. Every man's position is determined by his work, character and responsibility. The church of Deism is a society founded by the mutual consent of men on intellectual grounds. Kept up under the plea of usefulness, and governed by rules, votes, committees, and other such agencies as govern all commercial, social, literary, or political movements. Men feel no calling from above, but are appointed, educated, paid and directed in their work. The rationalistic church means nothing more than a local habitation of certain opinions and social proceedings which may be devotional or otherwise, according to the wish of the chief men.

Deism does not believe in inspiration. All duties and all devotions are the outcome of moral or intellectual reasoning combined with emotional excitement produced out of the ideas of propriety and impropriety previously acquired. Theism is the child of inspiration. It beholds God in spirit, and before his realised presence offers its devotions. It hears the voice of God in the soul in response to prayers, as well in the trials and duties of life. The theist walks by the direct and immediate commandment of God. Theism believes that God speaks to his servants as much as he used to do in ancient times. It does not trust to reasoning, but in matters of spiritual necessity waits in prayer upon the living God who resolves all difficulties, and points out the plain course of duty which, while it is faithfully discharged, means and opportunities arise which are felt to be divinely suggested.

Deism is negative, and delights in criticisms of the doctrines of other churches. It is destructive, and is always loud in declaring what it does not believe, because if it were to declare what it does believe, its catalogue of doctrines and number of following would be exceedingly small. Theism, on the other hand, does not find time to criticise and destroy other men's doctrines. It is occupied in stating and developing its own faith, in finding out the deep things of religion, of devotion, of character, faith, salvation, and holiness. It studies the doctrines of all religions with the object of gathering from them everything that is excellent. It is all inclusive, and finds treasures of truth in other dispensations which God from time to time sent unto the world for the regeneration of mankind. But Deism being critical, is exclusive. Because, whatever it cannot intellectually construe, it has to abandon. Theism, holding the equilibrium between reason, devotions, and faith, and being guided by the direct and living light of inspiration, discovers truth wherever it lies hidden. And, therefore, Theism enriches, and multiplies itself from the resources and lights of the whole world.

Theism being positive is also popular. Deism being rationalistic is necessarily abstract and unintelligible. Theism is popular because it has great personal centres in the prophets of the world. It can point to sainted and sanctified men as examples of faith and righteousness. Its principles are clearly discernible in unmistakable personalities that shine in the history of the world, and in the hearts of the faithful. Deism, weak in faith, hesitates to trust in the great souls whom God sends among men to lead them aright. It has and can refer to no personal centres. It therefore ceases to be popular, and though by borrowing from the outward observances of the church of God, it may make a temporary display, the spirit not being present in these externals, they soon cease to draw the popular mind, and Deism dies in its cold, lifeless intellectualism. But Theism, from its eternal simplicity, can appeal to men through, all things, through their minds, through their senses, through their imagination, feelings, and all the different departments of their nature. Sacraments and ceremonies can be used for temporary purposes in the theistic spirit. Signs and symbols can be used for a while in the genuine light of the eternal verities of faith. Theism can adapt itself to all understandings, to all conditions, to all trainings, tendencies, and tastes. Theism searches out all the resources, all the traditions, all the activities and aptitudes of human nature, and establishes its Kingdom on their foundation, while Deism operates upon the poor unaided intellect alone, and starves itself in its isolation.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, BRIGHTON.—II.

The Rev. Robert Ainslie [who commenced his ministry at Brighton in 1860, in succession to the Rev. J. P. Malleson] was, undoubtedly, in many respects, one of the most remarkable men that ever occupied the pulpit in Brighton; but, in order to form a just estimate of his career, it is necessary to take into account what he accomplished whilst in connection with orthodoxy; and whilst he was still in the full vigour of manhood. Mr. Ainslie held a very prominent position in London as a Congregational minister before he came to Brighton; he was Secretary of the Congregational Board of Education, and last, but by no means least, he was Secretary of the London City Mission for some years. During his connection with the Mission he made proposals for a very large distribution of the New Testament in London, and we believe that in consequence over a million volumes were despatched so as to be delivered upon one particular day in districts where such a consignment had in all probability never been made before; the then Bishop of London co-operated with Mr. Ainslie in this great work. Another enterprise in which Mr. Ainslie was engaged whilst associated with the City Mission is too remarkable to be passed over. Probably many persons may have heard of the annual saturnalia known as Fairlop Fair, although there can be but few in respectable circles who have the faintest conception of the scenes which not only the fair itself, but the roads leading to it presented of drunken revelry and violence of various kinds. Mr. Ainslie was so impressed with the terrible nature of this annual infestation, that he resolved to take a staff of Missionaries to the Fair with him upon one occasion, with a view of supplying evidence as to the evils resulting from the gathering. The agents of the City Mission were, however, unwilling to do the kind of work suggested, and Mr. Ainslie with that inflexible will which characterised him, resolved to go himself, and to find elsewhere men of similar temper to unite with him. The result was that Mr. Ainslie was successful in inducing the authorities, by the evidence he laid before them, to put an end to the holding of the Fair, which, but for his brave perseverance, might have continued to this day. There is something heroic in the story of the way in which Mr. Ainslie perilled his relations with the Congregational body, and because of which partly he ultimately left it—for it was through defending and protecting a gentleman who was a stranger to him, but whom he regarded as entirely innocent of a charge brought against him by some officials connected with the London Missionary Society. The gentleman in question was a returned missionary, and afterwards a minister in London, and Mr. Ainslie having once taken up the matter, carried it from court to court, paying all the expenses, which amounted to several thousand pounds. Facts such as these will serve to illustrate the strength of Mr. Ainslie's convictions and the sacrifices he made to carry them out.

As a student, the Rev. Robert Ainslie occupied a recognised and honourable position. His great work—a translation of Tischendorf's Greek Text of the New Testament—will always remain as a monument of his industry and learning. Whilst engaged in the prosecution of this arduous labour Mr. Ainslie was accustomed always to rise at four in the morning to commence study. As to the work itself, competent critics have pronounced a most favourable verdict upon it. Some reviewers declared the translation to be superior to Dean Alford's. The British Quarterly, in summing up a most flattering notice, said: "The work done is scholarly, honest, reverent and popular." Another important work from Mr. Ainslie's pen is "The Peacemaker; or, the Religion of Jesus Christ in His Own Words: Dedicated to all His Disciples"; in this volume every recorded word uttered by Jesus Christ is included, translated from Tischendorf's Greek Text of the eighth Critical Edition of the Gospels. Amongst other works by Mr. Ainslie may be noticed a volume of discourses (thirty-four in number) delivered at Christ Church, New-road, Brighton, dedicated to the Rev. Thomas Binney, and most favourably reviewed; two editions of "The Church Book," containing services, the offices, and a collection of hymns and anthems, amounting to 456, to which volume was prefixed an essay containing a condensed history of liturgies from the earliest times; innumerable pamphlets, separate sermons, &c.

The Rev. Mr. Ainslie, long before he came to Brighton, had been accustomed to controversy, and was an able and fearless debater. In his capacity as Secretary of the Congregational Board of Education he had been engaged in contests upon great public questions, and had had large experience as Secretary of the City Mission in dealing with and controlling men of very varying classes of mind; it was no wonder, therefore, that although worn not a little with the "heat and burden" of such a "day" as he had passed through, his arrival made a stir in the intellectual life of Brighton. He had still a fine presence and a face indicative of great intellectual power and energy. The rev. gentleman had not been long in Brighton before his influence was felt in the church, and in the town generally. How deep or strong his attachment to Unitarianism really was there is no means of accurately discovering; since, whilst in Brighton, Mr. Ainslie, whether from policy or from conviction, adopted a line of conduct which was somewhat puzzling, and even anomalous. Mr. Stevens says, "He was desirous of having everything connected with the chapel as ecclesiastical as possible, as I heard him once say, and it appeared that he wished to hide his Unitarianism, as he was once known to have denied it when charged with it." This must surely have been a misapprehension. Mr. Ainslie's preaching and teaching may convey an impression of his belief in Trinitarianism, but the writer is assured, by one who had exceptional opportunities for ascertaining, that the rev. gentleman held views similar to those of Dr. Channing, and none who were acquainted with Mr. Ainslie's character and career would lightly charge him with denying his religious opinions.

Be this as it may, on Mr. Ainslie's arrival in Brighton large congregations were soon attracted to the quiet and partly-filled chapel. The interior was improved and modernised; the comfort of the congregation being considerably enhanced thereby. A new name was adopted for the chapel, which henceforth, instead of Unitarian, became "Unsectarian." Great attention was paid to music and singing in the services. The "Church Book" already mentioned was introduced: some of the services in which, it may be remarked, are so closely modelled upon the Common Prayer Book that it is now laid aside. Sermons on popular subjects were freely advertised, and considerable interest excited amongst outsiders, by lectures especially upon controverted points. Mr. Ainslie, who was an able platform speaker, took an active part in public matters, and, although uninvited by them, claimed his right to take his place in public meetings with other Nonconformist ministers. Shrewd, active, and vigilant, Mr. Ainslie kept himself au courant with every political and sectarian movement, and was always ready as of old with voice or pen to contend for his views of what was right. In consequence of adopting the course indicated, Mr. Ainslie attracted a number of persons who probably had never attended a Unitarian, or possibly any other place of worship before: men of liberal minds admired the courage, tact, and public spirit he displayed, enjoyed the controversies he excelled in, and admired his talent, but when he resigned his position as minister of Christ Church they for the most part resigned their sittings too, and left a building to which they had been attracted by personal interest rather than by attachment to Unitarian doctrine.

It was in the summer of 1874 that Mr. Ainslie was compelled to announce his intention of resigning, in consequence of continued ill-health. The Sussex Daily News said at the time: "This decision, although it will be deeply regretted by all who have had the privilege of listening to those thoughtful and scholarly discourses which have distinguished Mr. Ainslie's ministry at Christ Church, will nevertheless be welcomed by those personal friends of the reverend gentleman who have known how much weariness and prostration a single service has lately entailed." In September, 1874, a presentation was made to Mr. Ainslie of a purse containing the sum of £286, which was "subscribed by his friends and congregation in affectionate appreciation of his work amongst them, and his earnest advocacy of liberal Christianity during the last fourteen years." On leaving Brighton Mr. Ainslie, we understand, went to reside in London, where he died about four years since.

After the Rev. Mr. Ainslie's resignation, as already intimated, the congregation was very much reduced, and other changes followed; one of the most important being that a number of the old church members came forward and were formed into a committee to carry on the affairs of the chapel—otherwise the building would have been closed. After having supplies for a time, the Rev. T. R. Dobson, the present minister, was chosen to fill the vacant pulpit. Mr. Stevens says it was because he was "a man of plain, outspoken views with regard to Unitarian doctrine, and not afraid to avow them," and he adds, "It was determined to start on a new basis of social and friendly intercourse, taking every advantage to encourage the feeling of good brotherhood, in which Mr. Dobson heartily joined." It was, however, we understand, rather Mr. Dobson who took the lead in this matter and succeeded in getting the congregation to unite with him in social gatherings, the inauguration of which marked a new era. So far as an outsider can judge, the policy indicated has been adhered to during the Rev. Mr. Dobson's occupation of the pulpit thus far. His position as a Unitarian minister has never been ambiguous, whilst great attention has been paid to the promotion and encouragement of sociality amongst the members, and apparently with considerable success. As in Mr. Ainslie's time, courses of lectures are from time to time given by Mr. Dobson, on doctrinal and popular subjects, these lectures always attracting large audiences. It may be remarked that Christ Church is not now called "Unsectarian," but "Free Christian."

A general impression of the appearance of Christ Church will have been gathered from the quotations already given, but a few details may be added. The building is on the west side of New-road, not far from Church-street; it stands in an enclosure at some little distance from the frontage of the rest of New-road; a circumstance, which while it adds effect to the building as viewed from the front, prevents it from being seen at a distance. The style of architecture, as already noticed, is Doric, the building is approached by a flight of stone steps, and the pediment is supported by four columns. On the frieze is incised, in Greek characters, a quotation from Romans xvi. 27, "To God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ." It is intended to fill up and thereby efface these letters; not because they are considered inappropriate, but the Rev. Mr. Dobson objects to any inscription of the kind upon the exterior of a building intended for public worship, and especially to one written in a language not generally understood. Most amusing mistakes have sometimes been made in consequence of the inscription, and only lately a cabman was heard informing an inquirer that the building was a synagogue, and that the letters were Hebrew. Upon a notice board, in the enclosure in front of the chapel, is written, "Jesus Christ said, One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." The front of the building is severely classic, it has no windows, and the door in the centre, if painted stone colour instead of being grained, might pass for the entrance to a tomb. In the lobby is a small terra cotta vase, which at first sight might be mistaken for a font; a second glance shows that it is covered with wire, and is for the reception of voluntary offerings. The interior of the building, although it strikes one as small, is light and elegant. There are four dome-topped windows of large size on the north and south sides of the chapel, filled with cathedral glass, and containing at the apex of each a crimson cross crosslet. There is a gallery at the east end of the chapel, whilst at the west is a neat and elegant pulpit with an entablature at the back, of classic design. The pulpit, which has an open ironwork front, is approached by a short flight of steps, at the foot of which there are doors leading to the vestry and schoolroom. The roof is coved, the seats are comparatively modern, but are still susceptible to improvement. The "table-pew," and the "visitors-pew," in front of the pulpit, have especially an old-fashioned air about them. The lighting at night is effective, although the fittings are most simple and inexpensive, consisting of a hoop of iron tube depending from the roof and two triple branched standards on each side of the pulpit. The front of the gallery is painted white, and it has a text of Scripture upon it in large letters of red and gold. Upon the centre panel of the entablature, behind the pulpit, there is inscribed, in gilt letters, the Lord's Prayer; on the side panels are the Beatitudes, whilst in the pediment there is the sacred monogram I.H.S., in red and gold. On the table in front of the pulpit there is always placed on Sundays an epergne of flowers, whilst an edging of flowers, on the occasion of a recent visit, decorated the pulpit itself. The organ, an instrument of fair size and capacity, with gilt and coloured metal pipes, has recently been removed from the gallery, and now occupies the south-west angle of the ground floor.

The vestry at the rear of the chapel is a comfortable apartment. A small bust of Robertson will be noticed in the room occupying a position of honour. The service at Christ Church is not at the present time of an elaborate character. The "Church Book," compiled by the Rev. T. R. Dobson, contains some nine or ten short services for Sunday morning and evening, with additional psalms and prayers. The number of the service selected is announced at the commencement. The prayers are for the most part read by the minister, the responses are given, and the psalms chanted by the choir and congregation. During the time Mr. Bridge, who succeeded Mr. Devin, presided at the organ, the musical portion of the service was a much more prominent feature than is at present the case. Music of a high character was introduced, and occasionally the services of instrumentalists and first rate professional singers were secured, as was the case during Mr. Ainslie's ministry, but a much more homely style of singing has lately been adopted. The "Church Book" is pervaded by a calm and reverent spirit; expressions of adoration occupying a considerable space in the volume. Each service is enlivened by the singing of several hymns. Many of these are old favourites in orthodox churches; in some cases slightly, in other cases materially altered. An index of alterations of first lines is given, which occupies several pages, and it may be said almost to constitute a literary and theological curiosity. The volume is compiled by Dr. Martineau; the list of authors laid under contribution is a copious one, but the editorial function, already alluded to, has harmonised the productions of writers of widely differing views. The volume, as it stands, is poetic and rich in ascriptions of praise, rather than in those statements of doctrine which, just because they happen to be put into verse, so often pass for hymns. When reading the Scriptures, Mr. Dobson interposes a few remarks occasionally, in the way of exposition.

Visitors to Christ Church will meet with the greatest attention and courtesy; they can hardly fail to notice the quiet and reverent tone which marks the services; the singing is congregational and hearty, the preaching intelligent and refined, its doctrinal characteristics may be gathered from what has already been remarked, and from the abstract of a sermon appended to this sketch.

Foremost amongst the institutions connected with Christ Church the Sunday-school deserves mention. The establishment of this was frequently talked of during the Rev. Mr. Ainslie's ministry, but no practical steps were taken in the matter. The Rev. Mr. Dobson being from the first anxious to build a School and Lecture-room upon a portion of the vacant ground surrounding the chapel, set aside a legacy of £200 left to the church by Miss Mocatta, a member of the congregation, as the nucleus of a building fund; liberal subscriptions came in and the balance of the required sum was more than made up by a very successful bazaar at the Royal Pavilion. The total cost of erecting and furnishing the room was about £600. The lecture-room adjoins the chapel at the south-west angle; it is of convenient size, and comfortably furnished. There is a Sunday-school held in it with an average attendance of thirty children. There are five or six teachers, the school is open on Sunday afternoons only, and the teachers occasionally relieve each other in the work of imparting instruction. The view taken by Unitarians of the importance of Sunday-school work is strikingly shown in the report of the Forty-eighth Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Association, recently held at the Freemasons' Tavern, published in The Inquirer for June 3rd, 1882. An extract would scarcely do justice; it may be remarked that the value of the Bible as the great text-book for teachers was repeatedly urged.

A Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society holds meetings in the lecture-room, in connection with which entertainments and lectures are given during the autumn and winter. There are at present only about twenty members of the society, several of its most active supporters having lately left Brighton.

The lady members of the congregation at Christ Church have formed a Ladies' Social Society, which meets on one evening a week in the lecture-room for music and conversation. This society, which appears to be a very flourishing one, has purchased a piano-forte for use at its meetings. Once a month invitations are issued to members of the congregation and other friends, when most enjoyable réunions take place. There is a Benevolent Society in connection with the church, and it appears from a circular that "the relief given to the sick and indigent is given without any reference to, or inquiry concerning the religious opinions of the recipients, their need of help being all that is considered." The subscription is four shillings a year, in two half-yearly payments; and the relief is principally given in kind. There are at present no poor persons belonging to the congregation, so that the benefits of the society are realised by outsiders.

A similar spirit of unsectarianism pervades Unitarian charities and institutions, since Unitarians are totally opposed to religious tests, and alike to persecution, or the offering of premiums on account of religious doctrines. There is, in consequence, no inquisitorial inquiries into the religious views entertained by others, and, therefore, the wide variety of doctrines, alluded to in our opening remarks as existing amongst Unitarians, is found practically to interpose no barriers in the way either of harmonious work or worship.

Of Mr. Dobson's antecedents we are able to say but little. We learn that, like several Unitarian ministers, he received an orthodox training, becoming Unitarian in after years. Mr. Dobson, like his predecessor, Mr. Ainslie, was in early life an Independent or Congregationalist, but entered the Unitarian ministry about twenty years since.

Previously to coming to Brighton he was minister of Friar Gate Unitarian Chapel, Derby, in which town he was well known and highly respected. But his health giving way he was compelled to leave Derby. Before doing so, however, he received from his friends and admirers in that place a testimonial consisting of a handsome timepiece, a purse of gold, and an illuminated address, which we have seen, and in which Mr. Dobson is spoken of in terms of the most affectionate regard.

In preaching the Rev. Mr. Dobson, who wears a Genevan gown, makes considerable use of a manuscript, his delivery is quiet, but natural and earnest, and a strong infusion of the poetic element marks his finest passages.

This interesting historical sketch with a full abstract of an excellent sermon delivered by Mr. Dobson in the ordinary course of his ministry on "Blessed are the pure in heart."

AGNOSTIC SERVICES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Absence from home, where your paper did not follow me, prevented me from seeing until now Mr. Dalby's reply the week before last to my question with regard to Mr. Moncreux Conway's services in Unitarian chapels, of which Mr. Dalby wrote approvingly. I asked whether in the services referred to Mr. Conway engaged in prayer or any act of worship recognising the existence of God. This surely was a question which admitted of a plain answer. Your readers will have observed, however, that Mr. Dalby entirely evades it. Instead of saying yes or no, he tells me to go to South-place Chapel some Sunday morning and judge for myself. Now it is because I and several friends have at different times been there and observed that prayer and the worship of God are discarded and Agnostic doctrine is preached, that I was induced to inquire how Mr. Conway could possibly minister to a Unitarian congregation at Preston or elsewhere. Mr. Dalby says he discovers no substantial difference between the present South-place services and those conducted there by Mr. W. J. Fox thirty or forty years ago. Mr. Dalby's discernment in theological matters is surely wanting here. I was a frequent and admiring hearer of Mr. Fox for several years, from 1837 onwards, and my experience is just the opposite. Mr. Fox was a firm believer in God and in the immortality of the soul, while in prayer and worship he was most devout. When there ceases to be a substantial difference between yea and nay, between belief in God and the rejection of that belief, then Mr. Dalby's statement may hold good, but not till then.

Agnostics have as much right to their opinions and to the expression of them as I have to mine; all I now urge is that things should be called by their right names, and that it is misleading to speak of a lecture and reading, minus prayer and worship, as a Unitarian service. Another correspondent in the same number of your paper, who signs himself "An Agnostic," is consistent and honest when along with his admiration of Mr. Conway he holds up prayer to contempt and derision. As it is not wholesome for any of us to play fast and loose with words, I shall continue to insist that Unitarianism is one thing and Agnosticism another.

THE BRIGHTON CHAPEL.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am able fully to confirm the account which appears in last week's Inquirer of the building of the Brighton Chapel and its opening in 1820. It might have been added that the following inscription was placed on the portico:—

Θεοῦ μονοῦ δια Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ δοξα.

It was said that an unlearned person, staring at this from the opposite side of the street, inquired of a better informed individual, who happened to be passing, if he could tell him the meaning of the words, which were translated to him thus:—

"The only place of worship in Brighton where you can worship God gratis."

Mr. Belsham performed the opening service. ONE WHO WAS PRESENT.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUSTEES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the account given, in your last number, of Russell Scott, Esq., as one of Dr. Williams's Trustees, I am represented as stating that the Reformatory established by Mary Carpenter at Kingswood was in a house erected by John Morley for his own occupation. The house was John Wesley's, and for this reason was especially interesting.

T. SADLER.

THE new building of the City of London School, on the Thames Embankment, has been erected at an expense (including the value of the land) of nearly £200,000.

DENTON: OPENING OF THE RUSSELL SCOTT MEMORIAL SCHOOLS.

On Saturday last the above schools were opened by Richard Peacock, Esq., J.P., of Gorton Hall, among those present being Mrs. Scott, the Misses Scott, Mr. R. Scott, Mr. C. P. Scott; the Revs. L. Scott (Denton), P. M. Higginson, M.A. (Styal), G. Ride (Chorley), W. Harrison (Glossop), H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), Dendy Agate, B.A. (Gorton), J. K. Smith (Flowery Field), Noah Green (Mottam), J. E. Odgers, M.A. (Liverpool), and Messrs. John Brooks, John Reynolds (Hyde), Jesse Hind (Nottingham), Councillor Ashton, R. Kenyon, Thomas Dornan (Oldham), Councillor Barlow (Hyde), John Phillips, George Smith (Manchester), R. Stewart Redfern, W. H. Knowles, Samuel Buckley, &c. The new school is described as follows:—The basement consists of cellar kitchen, coal cellar, and a fireproof cellar for heating apparatus, and passage approached by an outside flight of stone steps. The ground floor consists of kitchen and vestry connected with the present chapel, the girls' entrance and staircase leading to girls' class rooms, cloak room; infants' schoolroom, 28ft. by 27ft., and infants' class room, 16ft. by 10ft. and 16ft. high; and boys' main entrance with principal staircase, 12ft. 6in. by 11ft. 9in., together with a covered passage leading from the girl's entrance to their playground, also a Fives court, 24ft. by 20ft., and all necessary outbuildings; over the kitchen, vestry, girls' passage, and cloak room, there is a mezzanine floor, in which is situated girls' cloak room, girls' class room, 21ft. 9in. by 18ft. 6in., and private lavatory and staircase. The mezzanine floor and floor above are greatly enlarged by having on each side a projecting window 20ft. wide and 17ft. high, and 2ft. 9in. projection from wall line on each side of building. The first floor consists of a platform or girls' class room, 26ft. 7in. by 18ft. 6in. and 17ft. 9in. high, also a boys' schoolroom, 40ft. long by 27ft. wide and 21ft. 3in. high, together with principal and secondary staircases. Over the main-staircase there is a tower with a high pitched roof, which is utilised by providing a library, storeroom, staircases, and room for water cisterns which supply the whole of the buildings. All of the walls of the principal rooms and staircases are lined with white glazed bricks and coloured bands. The girls' and infants' class rooms can be shut off from the main schoolrooms with revolving shutters, and the arrangement of the girl's class room is such that by lifting the revolving shutters it forms a platform 3ft. 6in. above the level of the boys' schoolroom, with a 15ft. opening, forming a proscenium, and giving a total length to the room of 59ft. by 27ft. wide. The whole of the first floor is covered by a handsome timber roof boarded all over and stained and varnished. There is also a lift or hoist from the cellar to the platform. The whole of the building is most effectually heated with hot water pipes, supplied and fixed by Mr. Wagstaffe, of Dukinfield. The ventilation is most thorough, and consists of Tobin's tubes and ventilating trunks, level with the ceilings and the upper part of all the windows, which are specially adapted for that purpose. The floors of the infants' school, class, and cloak rooms are laid with Wareham's patent flooring in blocks, laid herring bone, on a concrete bed. All other floors are boarded and trugged. The style of the building is free Gothic, with common white end bricks, in black mortar, and stock brick bands, arches and quoins, together with a fair amount of stone work, large windows, for purposes of light and ventilation, and a bold tower at the south-east angle 62ft. high. The main staircase is sumptuously carried out, and the two projecting windows as well as the tower form very striking features in the building and add much to its general bold appearance. The architect is Mr. P. Pons, 41, John Dalton-street, Manchester; Messrs. Holmes and Webster, of Ashton-under-Lyne, being the general contractors; and J. W. Floyd the clerk of the works.

A procession of teachers, scholars, and friends, headed by the Denton original brass band, left the schools shortly after three o'clock, and on their route round the town were joined by about 150 scholars from Brookfield Church, Gorton, accompanied by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A. After perambulating the district the procession returned to the school, where the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson conducted the devotional part of the opening service.

Mr. RICHARD PEACOCK (who was received with loud applause) said: Ladies and gentlemen, it seems to me but as yesterday since I had the honour and pleasure of laying the foundation stone of the little chapel behind here, and as I have been in this neighbourhood very little since, what I have seen to-day causes me almost to think that some great magician has been at work. Looking at the simple character of that building, the foundation stone of which we laid in 1873, and remembering the modest expressions and the simple wishes then given vent to, as to the future, it appears almost marvellous that we should have met again in so short a time to take part in the opening of this magnificent building. Your good pastor and my good friend Mr. Scott must be an extraordinary worker, and not only is he a hard worker, but he is an enthusiastic and a sincere worker—(applause)—to have been able to produce such results as we see to-day. Whether looking at the building architecturally or for practical purposes of education, it seems to me to be exceedingly well adapted for its intended future, in addition to its being very beautiful—(applause.) The architect, whoever he may be, has bestowed great care, not only in the arrangement, but in the manner in which he has carried out his work. No doubt he has been ably assisted by your committee. I have endeavoured to criticise the building somewhat since I arrived an hour ago, and I have come to the conclusion that whoever the architect is, you have got into fortunate hands—(applause.) It is a credit to him, and I sincerely trust that it will be found as good in its working as it is pleasing from an architectural and practical point of view. Mr. Scott some time ago came to the conclusion that you not only wanted a Sunday school, but that a day school was badly needed in the neighbourhood, and he took his good mother into his confidence—I do not know with whom the idea originated—but as a matter of fact it was determined to build such a school as the neighbourhood required, and more than that, it was determined that it should be a school conducted upon undenominational principles, open to all, all treated alike, all receiving the benefit of a high class of teaching. That simple but beautiful inscription over the entrance door will have struck some of you on entering this building:—

"In Remembrance of Russell Scott, 1882, erected for the furtherance of education in this town."

This building is intended to be a memorial of the late Mr. Russell Scott, the late husband of Mrs. Scott, erected by herself, and what more worthy evidence of the true love of a wife than to see such a memorial as this erected by the widow? It does not only speak volumes for the wife, but it also speaks highly for the worth of the departed. Memorials of this sort are not erected to undeserving people, and though many of us probably had not the pleasure of knowing the late Mr. Russell Scott, from what I have heard of him, the schools, grand as they are, good as they are, are nothing more than his character deserved—(applause.) It must be a pleasing duty, not only to Mrs. Scott, but to her kind and good family who are all around me, to see this building erected and arrived at the present stage. It must be highly gratifying to them not only to see it completed, but to find themselves surrounded by a number of sympathising friends such as are on this platform. Would there were more husbands who deserved such memorials—(applause.) Would there were more wives not only capable but willing to erect such a structure. A temporary school has been established in the neighbourhood during the last few months, since January last, and the scholars already number 220. If anything were wanting to prove the necessity for a day school, I think these figures speak plainly. Mr. Scott had not been long in the neighbourhood. He came as a stranger, and you see the results—(applause.) Denton ought to be proud and thankful, and I trust the future generation, at all events those who have the benefit of the education given in this building, will never forget to return those thanks when they have an opportunity. I understand it is not merely to be a day school, but a day school embodying all that can be brought to bear, giving a high class elementary education, that there will be extra classes and extra subjects by which the scholars may be induced to remain longer at school. The managers of the school approach their work with no narrow-mindedness; but, on the contrary, from a broad point of view, and on strictly undenominational principles. Personally I have to thank Mrs. Scott, the Misses Scott, and Mr. Scott, who have done me the honour to ask me to open the school, and I have very much pleasure in pronouncing this school to be open from this moment, and to be known hereafter as the Russell Scott Memorial School, Denton—(loud applause.)

After tea, of which several hundred partook, a meeting was held in the school in the evening, Mr. PEACOCK presiding.

The CHAIRMAN said they were no doubt aware that that room was not only built for the purpose of a day school and Sunday-school but was intended to be a strictly undenominational school, and also to be used for lectures, social gatherings, and any description of meetings which the committee might think fit to sanction. He congratulated the people of Denton in having acquired such grand premises. He felt sure that ere long the neighbourhood would see the advantage, because they would be benefited, and would, as Mr. Dowson so beautifully read from the Old Book, "gain wisdom and gain understanding" by their attendance in that building.

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT said:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen,—You will agree with me, I am sure, that it is of happy augury that on both the chief occasions connected with this building, at the laying of the foundation stone and this evening, we have the presence and sympathy of many who are in no way connected with our religious denomination—(applause.) Although this building was partly built for the Sunday-school and congregation of the Wilton-street Chapel, if that had been the primary object of the founder these buildings would have taken altogether a different shape. But we are met here to-day to open buildings for the furtherance of education in this town. That is the main object for which they are built—(applause.) On the broad basis of liberal unsectarian education all can join, and I am sure that it is with unqualified pleasure we welcome all friends who are one with us this evening—(applause.) Our object in meeting together then is to promote an interest in education, to rouse enthusiasm which shall not spend itself in mere words, but shall spend itself in wise care for the mental and moral training of the young—(applause.) There are some people who seem to confound moral with religious training, and religious training with sectarian education, and who seem to regard them as convertible terms. I refer to this because it is the fixed determination of the managers to promote the moral training of the children in every way they can; but it is as strongly their determination to keep their theology, their sectarian opinions, out of the day school—(applause.) If the managers wished to press their own views on the day school they would not appoint, as they have appointed, and will continue to appoint, if most fitted, teachers who by no means agree with their religious doctrines. The human and Christian virtues are not confined to anyone sect, and I hate sectarianism either in church, school, or chapel. But if this were not so, I should still hold that children are not fit recipients of our discords, though they are fit recipients of the things whereon we agree, for what would education be worth if it did not promote truthfulness, honesty, and all those things which make human character lovely?—(applause.) In this respect, to those who knew my father, the name of the schools is full of suggestion, and for that reason for us this occasion is tinged with a great sorrow, for we know well how deep his interest, his life-long interest was in all works of this kind, and how full would have been his sympathy could we hear his voice in our midst now. In his spirit these schools have been built and by his means—(applause.) In his spirit, because when he was still a young man, in the year 1838, he originated, and built in conjunction with his neighbour, Sir John Sebright, day schools for the district in Hertfordshire, in which he then lived. His wide sympathies led him to take an active interest in education. Whether the effort was for the good of one class of society or of another, it had the benefit of his counsel and wise help. Where human character was concerned he felt we were not divided, and that to train the young into better things was the same work, whether his time and thought was given to a college, or whether he helped to rescue the neglected children of our large towns in sharing with Miss Mary Carpenter in the establishment of the first Reformatory at Kingswood—(applause.) The hope of the future is with the young, and any effort for their good which came near him had not only his substantial help, but what was of far greater value, the influence of his wisdom. In losing that these schools have lost a directing hand, which cannot be replaced; but if his name upon the building carries with it the record of a great love, it will not have been placed in vain—(applause). Let your aim also, my friends, be for the good of those who shall come after us. It is easy when our hearts are stirred by a strongly-felt emotion, when we are lifted on the flood of a united feeling, to be very sure that we at all events will do our best for the children—but it is not so easy to act up to that feeling when the tension of the moment has passed away. Yet in spite of all let us be constant. Our whole aim, our sole desire, is that parents, managers and teachers should be united by a common sympathy and strive for a common object—that each should do his or her own part for the advancement of the children. Knit together by a union so natural, our prayers will not go altogether unanswered, and it may be that the children who enter within these walls will grow into an orderly, well-conducted, happy, harmonious life, and that He who rules over the hearts of men will ever grant them higher blessings—(applause).

The Rev. DENDY AGATE (Gorton) said they must all have been very much touched by the brief, very beautiful, and suggestive address which Mr. Scott had given them. On behalf of the members of the neighbouring congregations who were there that night, and particularly on behalf of the congregation of which he had the happiness to be minister, he sincerely hoped that all the work which they entered into in years to come would be carried out in the spirit which Mr. Scott had spoken of. Nothing was more likely to secure sound results in work, and perfect harmony among workers, than the knowledge that those schools had been erected in memory of one of whom they had heard what had been said about the late Mr. Russell Scott—(applause). It was an admirable augury for the future of these schools that their foundation was so broad. They Unitarians were sometimes told that the liberty, the undenominationalism, the freedom, the large heartedness of which they spoke, and of which some of the ministers talk a good deal, did not amount to more after all than Unitarianism, and getting people to belong to them, and their particular ways. He ventured to say that outsiders, as time went on, would find that when Unitarians spoke of these things they did mean something by it, and though they were touched with human infirmities like other people, and never quite lived up to their ideal, and did not come up to the standard they kept before them, he might say from his experience, that whatever their difference of personal conviction might be, there was a determination that their work and worship together should be determined by the universal sympathies and left to find their own level, and bind them together; and that they shrunk from inquiring particularly into each other's individual opinions, or in being over-anxious that people should reach the very conclusions that they reached. They might honestly say in the grand words of one of the best of women, a French Roman Catholic Nun, "They were of the church of the saints, and all the saints were of their church."

The meeting was also addressed by Mr. C. P. SCOTT, the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, Messrs. R. S. REDFERN, JESSE HIND (Nottingham), S. BUCKLEY, and GEORGE SMITH (Manchester). The last-named speaker said that although the school had only been established in January in temporary inconvenient premises, there were over two hundred names on the book, and on the previous Tuesday he was pleased to find on visiting the school no fewer than 193 children present.

Votes of thanks to Mr. Pons, the architect, the chapel choir, and the Chairman concluded the proceedings.

SHEFFIELD: REOPENING OF UPPER CHAPEL.

On Sunday, the 23rd inst., the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, which for more than six months had been closed for repairs, was reopened by the Rev. C. C. Coe, who completely met the necessities of the important occasion. There is but one opinion in regard to the exceptionally high character of his services throughout. The morning was very stormy, and therefore the great chapel was not crowded as otherwise it would have been, but still the congregation was large. In the evening it was also very good indeed. This historic congregation is greatly enlarging its borders. It is about sixteen months since the Upper Chapel congregation entered upon the scheme of improvements, which contemplated not only a great addition to their congregational appliances, but also a virtual internal reconstruction of their ancient place of worship, for "ancient" it is beyond any other Nonconformist chapel in the town. Its history goes back to the days of good James Fisher—whose descendants, it is claimed, are still with us—who, having been Vicar of Sheffield for sixteen years, was compelled to resign his office by the Act of Uniformity. A large number of his parishioners quitted the church with him, and among them he continued his ministry in secret until within a short period of his death, which, accelerated by imprisonment for preaching, took place in 1666. He was succeeded by Robert Durant, who was ejected from the vicarage of Crowle, Lincolnshire, in 1662. He ministered to the congregation in various private places from 1669 until his death, in 1678, in which year, persecution having for a season abated, his people built for themselves, in Newhall-street, the first meeting-house in the town. It was subsequently used as Hollis's Hospital. After a short interval, Timothy Jollie, son-in-law of Mr. Fisher, became pastor, and under his ministry, which continued from 1681 to his death, in 1714, the Old Meeting-house becoming too small, the Upper Chapel was built in 1700. According to the usage of the English Presbyterians, to which party Mr. Jollie and most of his congregation belonged, the chapel was founded, free from all doctrinal tests or conditions whatever, and is simply dedicated by the trust deed "For the worship and service of Almighty God." From that time to the present, through gradual changes of theological opinion, that principle of Christian freedom has been maintained inviolate alike by the pastors who have ministered there and by the congregation. During the ministry of Bartholomew Teeling Stansus, which extended from 1832 to 1852, the chapel was enlarged and partly re-built. While the Rev. Brooke Herford was pastor of the church a tablet was placed in the porch, on which is recorded these facts, as a "memorial of 200 years gradual progress, and of many faithful pastors." Until the coming amongst them of the Rev. Eli Fay there was ample accommodation in the chapel for the congregation worshipping there, but under his able and energetic ministry there has been such an increase in the attendance that additional sittings became a necessity; and in providing them it was determined also to provide other accommodation and appliances absolutely needful in an active and aggressive church. The work now accomplished consists in the first place of a chapel keeper's house, so related to all the other buildings as to make easy the general oversight of them; and the spacious and commodious kitchen of which is so connected with the arrangements for social gatherings as greatly to facilitate the serving of teas, collations, &c. Then there is the Channing Hall, an exceptionally fine auditorium, 57ft. by 25ft., and designed exclusively for congregational and Sunday-school purposes. On the ground floor of the edifice are spacious shops, which will be a permanent source of income. The old school building has been converted into class rooms, retiring rooms, lavatories, &c.,—an important adjunct for the better prosecution of the work of the Sunday-school, and for all social and public gatherings. Not the least important work, however, that has been executed has been the complete repewing of the chapel, the narrow, low-seated, and richly upholstered modern pew having been substituted for the great square, plain, straight-backed one, which in the case of a crowd turned many faces directly away from the pulpit. Allowing for the external plainness of the chapel, which could not have well been altered, yet including its internal beauty and comfort, and the number, variety, and relation to one another of the co-related buildings, the property of the Upper Chapel congregation is now remarkably and very uniquely adapted to its purposes. Practically the seating capacity of the chapel has been increased by about thirty pews; and as a whole the improvements are so great and the additions so important as virtually to have made of it a new chapel, with all the modern conveniences, attractions, and auxiliaries. The entire cost of the work will be about £3,000, and we have every reason to believe that the chapel will have been opened practically free from debt.

A SUNDAY IN GRANADA.

The Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who has recently been travelling on the Continent and is now in London, is contributing to the Christian Register of Boston, U.S., a series of interesting letters entitled "Sundays in Europe." We subjoin the last of the series:—

The Cathedral of Granada is one of the finest buildings in the world. It was begun in 1529, and an American may be pardoned for remembering that the stimulus for undertakings so immense was quickened by the wealth which poured into Spanish treasuries for that short period when the colonies of Spain were fountains of treasure to her. The fashion for Gothic architecture had gone, even among these descendants of Goths; and the columns which support the roofs and the five naves are Corinthian. But when I say that the Cimbrino is as high as Bunker Hill Monument, and that the arch above the choir is one hundred and ninety feet from the floor, you will understand that the architect, in choosing a Grecian order, did not mean to deaden that passion for looking up which is quickened in lofty forests or in Gothic cathedrals.

In visiting the cathedral on Saturday, I had taken the precaution to ask the sacristan who showed to us the tombs of our great founders Ferdinand and Isabella, whether there would be any sermon the next day. I learned that at high mass, between nine and ten, there would be a sermon, and that perhaps the cardinal archbishop would preach. "Between nine and ten" is as close as one must ask to come in Spain. In fact, high mass began about nine, the sermon began about ten minutes after ten, and lasted perhaps an hour. The whole service was over about half-past eleven. The archbishop did not preach, but a canon, who was, I think, a man of reputation for eloquence. As I know the name of neither canon nor archbishop, and as there are but few of your readers, I fear, better informed, the difference for us is merely that in fact the preacher wore a black cap and robe, while, had it been the cardinal, cap and robe would both have been red.

The Spanish cathedrals differ from those of most parts of the world in the placing what is called the coro, or "choir," in the middle of the building—proper, so that one can walk all around it. It is thus a church within a church. People prowling round in search of the picturesque, and demanding long vistas with fine effects to close them, pour out in guide-books and other organs of opinion their indignation at this arrangement. And doubtless, if everything is to be subordinated to architectural effect they have a measure of right in their indignation. But if, on the whole, the primary object of the whole is worship—and it probably is—the Spanish architects can make a good plea. The lofty screens of the coro and the retablo behind the altar, the high and noble organs, separate the worshippers from what I may call the outer world of the cathedral, as this is, in its turn, parted from the larger outer world of the bazaar, the market, and the park. Within the coro is room for all those who in any sense can join in any service to be conducted there.

To a person of 'democratic—which is to say, Christian—susceptibilities, it is harder to make an argument in favour of the system adopted within the coro itself. Why nine-tenths of the space there should be reserved for priests, and not more than one-tenth for the people—who, in any version of Christianity yet known, are the most important persons present, who outnumber the priests tenfold, of whom the priests are all servants, and the cardinal archbishop chief servant—this does not distinctly appear. But such division is made in Granada, as it is made in Seville, in Burgos, in Belgium—indeed, in all the cathedrals of this plan where it has been my good fortune to worship. Indeed, it would seem yesterday as if every resource of ritual were exhausted to show to the common people that they were not wanted in the service, had no business there, and were out of place. No man offered to them the consecrated wafer. When the procession had occasion to go or to come, they were ordered out of the way by vergers. No church dignitary provided a seat even for the aged or infirm among them. The shifty forethought of the Andalusian woman who peddled, for her own profit, small camp-stools for those of the faithful who did not wish to sit upon the floor, was the only remedy for this indifference on the part of a church the seats in whose choir were half empty, because there are not priests enough left to fill them.

By concentrating, so to speak, the offices of worship in space, the different parts of the ritual of high mass are kept more together than in cathedrals of the other plan. The singers and other musicians have more to do with the altar service; and, as they or theirs come and go from and to the altar, once and again while that service goes forward, that frightful gulf is bridged which in Catholic churches so often suggests that one set of worshippers is carrying on a religious concert at one end of the building, while another set is finding and worshipping God at the other. This is a substantial gain in ritual. Another substantial gain is in the procession. For there is real reason for a procession—if, outside the choir, there be a sort of "Synagogue of the Gentiles," or outer court of the sanctuary, where are men and women who cannot see what is passing within. To bear the cross or the sacred vessels out of them, with song and other music, is real type of the duty and effort of the Church to the outer world. But there is no such type or representation of anything, when, in an open church, a body of the clergy walk up one aisle and down another, singing or saying that which would be better heard, better said, and better sung, if they all stayed together in the place where they began.

A considerable number of the clergy joined in the service on Sunday, but I think it was only in this number that it differed greatly from the service to which we were accustomed. The day was Trinity Sunday. The preacher took the baptismal formula in Matthew for his text, as I have observed Trinitarian preachers often do when they preach this sermon; for the sermon was the same in substance which I have often heard on such occasions. The misfortune of the text for their purpose is that it omits the essential words, "These three are one."

This sermon is, of course, no argument for the doctrine of the Trinity. On the other hand, it concedes the point that the mystery is no matter of argument. And no man could have made this concession more frankly than our friend on Sunday. He began with a lamentable picture of the desperate state in which the world finds itself at this time. For this ruined condition, more faith is the only cure, he said; and, naturally, as the Trinity is the central doctrine of the Catholic Church, more faith in this was the recommendation of the sermon. There are men in Spain, however, as he knew, who draw the inference backwards. Since the Gothic Arians were suppressed by fire and sword, the Roman Catholic Church has, without let or hindrance, proclaimed this doctrine of Trinity in Spain. If, after a thousand years, the result is such hostility to religion, such a failure in faith, such gross and beastly scepticism as he well described in the outset, may it not be that the Church has made a mistake in its central doctrine? By making a mystery of the Son, if he is the only means of revealing the Father, by making him the most unreal and incomprehensible of beings, may not the Church have created precisely the irreligion which he deplored? To this question, of course, this sermon, wherever it is preached, never attempts any answer. But it certainly occurred to me that, in the country with which I am best acquainted, there is more real faith and more practical religion than there ever was; that the fruit of religion is to be found riper and more abundant than in any period of past history; and that that country is precisely the region of Christendom where the least is said about the mystery of the Trinity, and where, with the most success, Jesus Christ has been presented as a real being in history, made in all points as we are made who try to follow him.

It is, alas! the fault of all but the very best preaching that, just when the hearer longs for a square statement of truth, or, failing this, a bit of stiff logic, the speaker gives him, instead, an outburst of brilliant or lively rhetoric. My admirable friend, the canon, alas! was not above this failing. But, granting this, let me hasten to add that the rhetoric was inspiring and well founded; and I well understood how he had won his laurels as a preacher. Best of all, the noblest passage of it was one with which, had he been wiser, he would have brought the sermon to an end. After all this playing up and down the scales—after the explaining that the Trinity could not be explained and that he would not explain it, and why he would not, which is the substance of this sermon wherever delivered—he said he had detained us long; and yet he begged for two words more. With an admirable good sense, in a practice which belonged, I think, to Chrysostom's time, but has, alas! died out from the American pulpit, he then gave us the refreshment of a pause before these two important words. He sat down. He took off his hat. He wiped his forehead. Those of us who were kneeling changed the knee. Those who were sitting on the floor changed their attitudes. Those who stood sat down. When all were thus prepared, he came forward again and to my delight—as to that of any of the Ten-Times One Club—it proved that the fruit of the two words was "caridad"—"charity." Of what use all this dogmatic theology—which had occupied us this morning, as it had occupied the Church for centuries—without charity? Of what use this gorgeous ceremonial—nay, the most gorgeous ceremonial which man could conceive—without charity? In such a strain, we had at last the reality of religion, pure and undefiled; as simply and sweetly stated here under the arches of the cathedral as it could have been in a Friends' Meeting in Narragansett. No sermon could have closed more grandly or fitly than this, had it closed there.

So it shall close there for you and your readers. After the second of his two words, he was really finished. After more adoration of the wafer, the several orders of priests filed out, and the service was ended. Of all this gorgeous ritual, the grandest moment came then. It was when some sacristan, a hundred yards away, pushed open the great doors of the cathedral. Even from that distance, a breath of fresh air swept up the naves and blew away the incense. The light of the sun itself, reflected from pure white walls, dimmed the candles. Every one of the remaining worshippers drew a long breath of the vital oxygen. And, as thus the breeze and light and joy of heaven swept in upon us, the present Father revealed himself to his glad children. How certain, in such a blaze of his glory—as waits on us when we leave the smoke and words and echoes of antiquity—how certain, as we stand under the open heavens, that he is, and is at hand!

BRIDGWATER.—The Rev. James Baily has been appointed Secretary to the Vigilance Association for the defence of personal rights, and that his resignation of the pulpit of Christ Church, Bridgewater, will take effect in three months.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Rev. Dr. R. Laird Collier has returned from a visit to the United States, and resumed his services at Newhall-hill Chapel last Sunday.

The distribution of prizes at University College School will take place on Wednesday, August 2, at two P.M. Lord Reay will preside.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Dismiss your doubts. Let no one be any longer oppressed with the notion that his or her malady is incurable till these purifying Pills have had a fair trial. Where ordinary preparations fail these Pills produce the best results. A course of this admirable medicine cleanses the blood from all impurities, and improves its quality. The whole system is thus benefited through the usual channels without reduction of strength, shock to the nerves, or any other inconvenience; in fact, health is renewed by natural means. For curing diseases of the throat, windpipe, and chest, these Pills have pre-eminently established a world-wide fame, and in complaints of the stomach, liver, and kidneys they are equally efficacious. They are composed of rare balsams, without a single grain of mercury or any other deleterious substance.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD AND THE SCIENTISTS.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD is never at a loss for weapons of either attack or defence, whenever he chooses to enter the controversial arena. And such is the charm of his style, to say nothing of the influence of his name, that he is certain to command a hearing. He is not always just and logical, but he never fails to be trenchant and interesting. His thought, if not deep and far-reaching, is keen and fresh from the novelty of its form, so that though he may not convince his readers he is certain to please them, no matter whether he is satirising the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol on the dogma of our LORD'S Godhead," or dealing out vigorous blows to those Philistines of society who frequent such vulgar places as Zions and Bethels, or who even give any countenance to so questionable a thing as dissent. To be sure the "sweetness and light" he champions, as the apostle of culture, often part company in his utterances, and sometimes both disappear. Still it is little more than the veriest truism to add that he not seldom proves his right to no mean station in the realm of mind. Even if he be distrusted as a critic he is not to be overlooked as a poet, still less as an educationalist of the highest order.

In the new number of the Nineteenth Century he comes before the public again in an article on "Literature and Science," or an address delivered as the "Bede Lecture" at Cambridge a short time ago. His object is to vindicate the claims of literature for the highest place in the superior education or culture of mankind in opposition to the claims which are being ever more and more strongly urged, that such is the rightful position of science. Professor HUXLEY and

M. RENAN are singled out for special attack. "Sir JOSIAH MASON," he says, "founds a college at Birmingham to exclude 'mere literary instruction and education,' and at its opening a brilliant and charming debater, Professor HUXLEY, is brought down to pronounce their funeral oration." As to M. RENAN, though he has made a great name in literature, he is foolish enough to think that his own studies will cease to be pursued within a century, and ungrateful enough to regret that he did not pursue Natural Science himself, as in that case he "might have forestalled DARWIN in his discoveries." We remember noticing a remark to this effect in one of M. RENAN'S charming auto-biographical sketches, published somewhat recently in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and it struck us as being attributable to a well-known weakness of the French mind, or a sign of the emptiness great men are apt to feel in their own triumphs and successes, rather than as an opinion worth serious consideration. Our critic seems to think otherwise, and having undertaken to combat the mighty and evermore imposing phalanx of scientists, he deems it worth his while to set one eminent name against another, so as to dispose of an enemy beyond the scope of his special attack. GOETHE, the great GOETHE, poet, philosopher and even scientist, he did not undervalue literature, but looked upon linguistic studies and what they imply as the best means for attaining that high degree of culture, that full-orbed nature which he himself enjoyed.

Our author charges Professor HUXLEY with having misunderstood him and misrepresented him in the Birmingham address already mentioned. His views of literature are much higher and far more comprehensive, he shows, than what the celebrated physicist in question seems to have explained them to be. Literature, as he understands it, comprises not merely grammar and syntax or linguistic studies, but a comprehensive knowledge of the laws, thoughts, actions, and institutions of both the ancient and modern world, together with an acquaintance with well-established facts of science. The point in contention is whether the methods of science are preferable as an educational influence to the study of language and of literature in this broad sense of the word. But into this special aspect of the controversy we need not go. It is enough for us to remain upon the lines of our author's general argument. "Following our instinct for intellect and knowledge, we acquire," he continues, "pieces of knowledge, and presently, in the generality of men, there arises the desire to relate these pieces of knowledge to our sense for conduct, to our sense for beauty, and there is weariness and dissatisfaction if the desire is balked." We agree with this statement; knowledge as such does not satisfy the mind. The ear is never satisfied with seeing, nor is the ear filled with hearing, to borrow both words and thoughts from a strange old book of sacred writ. It seems to us that in the desire in question there lies not only "the strength of the hold which literature has upon us," but something more—the need of that sense of repose which religion gives to the heart. Possibly, however, Mr. ARNOLD'S thought and our own are identical, since the source of the sweet restfulness and peace we sometimes find in nature, in poetry, in elevated prose, and in art, would seem to be the same sense of the infinite which lulls the soul to a state of holy calm in prayer and praise.

Allowing that the results of scientific inquiry are important, and that we should all be acquainted with their general scope and bearing, our author goes on to say—"But what I wish you to mark is, that when they are propounded to us and we receive them, we are still in the sphere of intellect and knowledge. And for the generality of men there will be found, I say, to arise, when they have duly taken in the proposition that their ancestor was 'a hairy quadruped furnished with a tail and pointed ears, probably arboreal in his habits—there will be found to arise an invincible desire to relate this proposition to the sense within them for conduct and to the sense for beauty." A keen thrust of satire this! What a delightful thing to turn from the realm of ideas as this is disclosed to us by every great soul, and pre-eminently by German poets and thinkers, to find in science the consoling fact that our original forefathers were hairy creatures, who were fond of the woods and sported pointed ears and a tail! It is certainly a caricature, but it has truth enough in it to hit the mark. Science cannot fill the soul; and the mere dabblers in it, who collect facts pretty much as a certain undistinguished class collect the remains of our kitchens and wardrobes, find therein no life, no poetry, no emotion, no satisfaction. And even when facts are tied up into bundles, so to speak, and labelled as general laws, a personal or emotional factor is required to render them soul-satisfying and give them an ethical value. There may be higher conceptions, says Mr. ARNOLD, "still it will be knowledge," and therefore incapable of supplying what is to be obtained in the highest order of literature. For knowledge, however comprehensive its character, must be put, as we are repeatedly told, into ethical and æsthetic relation to us, and be "touched with emotion by being so put," otherwise it becomes "to the majority of mankind after a certain while unsatisfying, wearying."

Mr. ARNOLD makes one exception to the assertion we have just quoted. He admits that, "not to the born naturalist" does this sense of dissatisfaction or weariness come. And he explains that what he means by a "born naturalist" is a man who has special gifts and special tastes for the study of nature, and who thus becomes wholly absorbed in the contemplation of her processes. In illustration of this exception we are told that Mr. DARWIN once admitted to a friend "that for his part he did not experience the necessity for two things which most men find so necessary to them—poetry and religion; science and the domestic affections he thought were enough." We can quite understand this statement of the great naturalist, though it clashes in some measure with what Mr. VOYSEY has said in our columns respecting him. We venture to submit, however, that the term "religion" requires careful consideration, in order that there may be no confusion in its use here. If we mistake not, the substance of religion, together with the essence of poetry, was present in the mind of Mr. DARWIN when he lifted the veil from nature in so many forms, and to use the language of a recent reviewer, "elaborated those wonderful theories which have electrified the world." Nature must have presented herself to him in spiritual as well as material aspects, and thus his soul may have been fed, while his mind was thus gloriously occupied for the good of his fellows.

We have no intention of pursuing Mr. ARNOLD'S argument point by point. Suffice it to say, that if we mistake not, he gets the best of the scientists, or rather of those among them who seem to desire that knowledge should become the be-all and end-all in life. For while there is no food for the soul in mere knowledge there is soul-rest and peace in the satisfaction of what is here called the instinct for conduct. It is not necessary to have a speculative knowledge of KANT'S doctrine of the "categorical imperative," or even to accept it if known, in order to feel or allow the wonderful restfulness and satisfaction which flow out of a good deed. So of beauty. A man may not give an adhesion to all that Mr. RUSKIN claims for it, he may not believe with SCHILLER and a certain German school that, from its joint action and passive power, it is the most important factor in moral reform, he may not see or accept all this; but if he knows anything whatever of its power he must be aware that it has a far higher influence upon his life than mere knowledge. There is in it indeed, or there at least may be in it, that something which religion can alone give to the uncultured mind. When either art or literature shows us the spiritual side of things it is a revelation to us, it becomes a religion and inspires us with something of "the peace which passes all understanding." Religion is essentially ethical and emotional, and therefore fitted to feed and give rest to the soul, independently of the co-existing mental culture, or else we should not see its power in the heart of a Channing and also in the life of a convert of the Salvation Army. As these elements, too, are present in all pure literature it is necessarily more or less religious, and therefore capable of sustaining the life of man. But in the mere facts and methods of science there is nothing emotional, nothing ethical, and hence, though they may afford light to the understanding, they cannot give strength to the heart or rest to the soul. Science is an exclusive appeal to the intellect, and as such it does not educate our ethical and emotional powers; but a great soul irradiates it from within, and thus it becomes transformed into a religion.

CHRISTIANITY PROGRESSIVE.

In the times of long ago, when the world was a-making, and the elements were melted with fervent heat, under favourable circumstances, and with fitting materials, we can conceive of giant-armed nature seizing a critical moment in her creative work. At her chemic touch the volatile and elastic gases, the seven times heated liquids lock themselves in a close embrace, and about their crystallised forms the slowly congealing atom encircles itself and wraps them in its womb. After many ages some philosopher, or savage, or worker in the belly of the earth, finds the huge mis-shapen block, he breaks it open, by accident or design, and within the matrix he sees the wonderful beautiful crystals, tinted, flashing, transparent, imperishable, excellent in the eyes of GOD and man. Their forms are perfect, so as no planer on earth could plane them. The work of a moment, they will last for ever—such are some of the glories of inorganic nature; the deep-hearted ruby, the pale tender amethyst, the pure emerald, the imperial "brilliant" diamond.

There is also organic nature, less shapely in its elemental forms, infinitely more transitory in its individual existences, sometimes lasting longer in the embryonic state than in its active condition, passing through its changes in an interval ranging from a few hours to a few thousand years or so; but living and transmitting its kind, moving, thinking, feeling; culminating in the vigorous strong elasticity of man in the wondrous subtle beauty of woman, and in the heart and brain of human-kind.

It used to be said—"The individual perishes; but the type remains." But this is now recognised to be a faulty utterance. Under the guiding inspiration of DARWIN and others, we have learnt that, unless the type (as in unworthy cases) deteriorates and finally dies out, it develops and takes up a nobler sphere with larger aims and duties. It does not stand still. Through myriads of deaths the type rises to higher life. The law of healthy life is the law of progress. Life that is not progress is slow death.

Under which category are we to place Christianity? There are some who will tell us that Christianity is as the amethyst, or perhaps as the iridescent opal with its changeful soft gleams. They will say that GOD in the person of His Son created Christianity perfect, imperishable, unalterable, descending from the throne of GOD, clothed with immortal strength and beauty. GOD said fiat lux, and the light came that lighteth every man that is born into the world. But there will be some who (by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture, as it seems to the writer, and by most natural reading of the history of the Church and the world, of human nature, and of animal life) regard Christianity as an organic thing. They will trace the feeble beginnings of Christianity a thousand years before CHRIST was born. They will see the first shimmering light of dawn, the doubtful, cloudy half lights, growing unto the perfect day. They may express themselves in the supernatural phrases of St. Paul, and say: "They drank of that spiritual rock which followed them, and that rock was CHRIST." Or they may prefer the mystical, metaphysical conception of the Logos, adopted from Philo by the author of the Fourth Gospel, and spiritualised by him, accepting the doctrine of the eternal sonship of CHRIST. In either case they will recognise Christianity as existing embryonically before the Christian era, developing, expanding, thrusting its roots into life. They will recognise CHRIST as a learner, and as one growing in wisdom. They will see after his death, in the fight of faiths, in the vain attempts to confine the living material of Christianity in the winding sheet of exact dogma and creed, that the very vanity of the attempts proves the organic progressive nature of Christianity and of the kingdom of CHRIST. And these inferences will be that though each Church and each individual must have a definite belief, which, it may be, is as dear as dear life is, yet that the creed can never be an exact expression of truth, but of the then attainable truth. They will believe that Christianity is perfect as our LORD himself commanded us to be perfect; perfect within the limits and possibilities of character, of opportunity, and of circumstance.

Any scientific man can define an amethyst, because it is inorganic. It is a matter of pure science. But no man can exactly define an organism, or, at any rate, a highly developed organism. When we are able to answer, what is Christianity, then we shall be able to tie it up in bands and parcel it out in Athanasian clauses, and seal it with the seven seals of creeds which heaven itself shall not be able to unloose. We cannot answer what is man. The definition called Plato's is silly, and manifestly depends on mere accidents. Perhaps the best definition is SHAKESPEARE'S poetic, non-scientific description:—"What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason, how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a GOD! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals!" But if we do not know what man is, how shall we know what Christianity is—the work of the Son of Man?

What heart can rise to, what tongue can utter the perfectibilities and possibilities of Christianity in the good time coming? With hearts enlightened, with brains purged from superstitions and folly and uncharitable narrowness of individual being, with inspirations embracing the universe, with "good news" for all men and not for a select few, through the anguish of death of myriads of lower forms to the growing splendour of the everlasting type, we may exclaim in the passionate words of the poet-philosopher—

Ring out the false, ring in the true, Ring in the Christ that is to be!

"NATURAL RELIGION."—III.

In the last article we traced the argument which our author uses to lead to the conclusion that the complete knowledge of God is arrived at by combining two kinds of knowledge—the scientific, otherwise termed theology, and the practical, otherwise known as religion. We now come to the last two chapters of the first part of his book,* in which he treats of "Three Kinds of Religion," and "Natural Religion in Practice." From what has been said it will be seen that Christianity claims to show a complete knowledge of God, since it is both a theology and a religion. Naturally, therefore, it has two classes of opponents, those of the scientific school who object to it as a theology, and those who reject it as a religion. But these latter do not object to all religion; they simply seek to replace Christianity by another form. Some set up humanity, while others seem to see in a Pantheism, or Higher Paganism, a purer object of worship. May not these new experiments in worship, asks our author, be less subversive of the old worship than they seem to be?

And first he considers what worship is. For the sake of convenience he admits that the words religion and worship are commonly appropriated to the feeling with which we regard God. But the feelings which constitute worship—love, awe and admiration may be, nay, are, felt for human beings, and even for inanimate objects. Feelings of admiration, when strong, seek to find expression in some outward act; when strong, serious and permanent, the act becomes recurrent. The sudden song or prayer develops into ritual. But religion, in its elementary state, exists without ritual, and in this state it "may be described as habitual and permanent admiration." Ought every higher form of religion to supersede and drive out the lower forms? No, says our author. Feelings of admiration and devotion differ in degree, and are excited by various objects, and such feelings may be called by the general name of worship. In its technical sense, however, it denotes that particular sort of devotion paid to the highest object we recognise, and it is in this sense that worship is forbidden by religion to be given to any lower object. "Churches, however," says our author, "are often intolerant in pushing this way of speaking beyond bounds. The greatest religious revolution in history is, in the main, simply a reaction against such intolerance, when the right of ideal humanity to receive worship was asserted in the heart of a people devoted to the exclusive worship of Deity."

It does not seem to us that this quite accurately describes the change effected by the work of Christ. There was no intention on his part to supersede the worship of God, and to substitute personal devotion to himself. That worship had degenerated into a ritual which was perfunctory in its character; or, at any rate, if it had not degenerated, it was purely ritualistic, it had become "habitual and permanent." Against this, or rather as something better than this, Jesus sought to establish a higher form of religion; and this, too, in the spirit of that scientific law known as the survival of the fittest. In the proposition laid down in the foregoing summary of our author's argument it appears to us that he is violating this very important law, which the disciples of the theory of evolution have taught us. Naturally, if that theory be a correct one, the higher form of religion will supersede the lower. Of course it is another question which is the higher, and which the lower; but this does not seem to be raised by the writer. We may agree that Paganism "was too intolerantly put down," and this may operate as a caution to us against repeating the same kind of intolerant action, but we do not follow our author when he suggests that there is no reason why such intolerance should not be repaired "in later and quieter times," if by that he means that we are to recur to a lower form when we already know of a higher. It is true, no doubt, that "the iconoclasm which raged against Greek art and heathen learning is no more necessary to Christianity than the hatred of painted windows is to Protestantism." If, as he says, the world has so advanced "that there is little danger of any worship we may pay to natural beauty blunting our sense of the higher reverence due to moral goodness," it is well that a certain amount of homage should be paid to natural forms; all we contend for is that such homage is not to be mistaken or substituted for a loftier worship.

Our author thinks that we might without difficulty adopt the idea of a sort of higher Pantheism, and that Christians might readily reconcile themselves to the worship of Humanity, because it is not their affirmations but their negations which "may reasonably excite alarm in these new systems;" not the new worships themselves, but the repudiation of the ancient worship of God. This leads him to ask, in reference to Christianity and its rivals, the same question he put in relation to Christianity and Science, Is the difference really as radical as it seems? And he answers it in pretty much the same way—viz., that there has been too much identification of Christianity and Theism with the doctrine of the Supernatural. It is untrue, he says, that Natural Religion is identical with classical Paganism, which was quite as full of supernatural personages and occurrences as the most superstitious forms of mediæval Christianity. It is in Natural Religion that we must hope to find the reconciliation, but it is Nature comprehending "man with all his thoughts and aspirations not less than the forms of the material world." This natural religion will "include a religion of Humanity as well as a religion of material things." Retaining the kernel of Christianity, while rejecting the shell, "it will concern itself with question of right and wrong," and may, like Christianity, fall into excesses of introspection and asceticism. "But along with this transfigured Christianity, only in a subordinate rank, it will include the Higher Paganism, or, in other words, the purified worship of natural forms."

With the disappearance of supernaturalism in religion would all belief in God necessarily go too? No doubt in the minds of most people miracles have gathered round the idea of God; but is that idea inseparably bound up with them? There are passages in the New Testament that clearly throw contempt on the desire for miracles, and these passages go to show that the God who habitually maintained his laws was worshipped, and not the God who occasionally suspends them. But this is not the question, rather it is, that having got rid of the idea of a God beyond Nature, is there only left to us a God who is simply Nature under another name, and can such a deity be worthy of worship? The commonly accepted notion of such a religion is that it is Pantheism, about which a great deal of error exists. "The God in Nature with whom we are here concerned is no rustic Pan." The form of religion referred to by our author is "austere, abstract, sublime." It is not the different forms of Nature which it worships, but "Nature itself considered as a unity." This worship is to be found in most historic religions, but joined with other worships. It is not less necessary than the others, but there is still something wanted—the thought of a Supreme Being, "which is so natural to man." "Who is there," our author asks, "that is not conscious of a feeling of awe when he realises the greatness of the Universe?" Still it is wrong to suppose that the identification of this natural awe with the worship of God is necessarily Pantheism. Both Pantheism and Orthodoxy agree in giving a unity to the Universe, though the kind of unity is not the same; so far as religious feeling is concerned the form is immaterial. When we realise that the Universe is one we utter the name God, without, however, pledging ourselves to the doctrine that God is the Universe, or that He is distinct from it.

To those who ask why the name of God is used, when merely Universe or World or Nature is meant, and whether it would not be better to reserve that name "for the distinct, invisible, eternal cause of the Universe, which is supposed in most religions, which is denied in Pantheism, and put aside as an unverified hypothesis in Positivism," while contending that the alteration of name does not alter the nature of the object of our worship, our author admits that very strong reasons ought to be shown before "the name by which we habitually indicate the Eternal Being" can be replaced by some other "hallowed as yet by no associations." The term Universe expresses merely "the total of things arrived at, as it were, by mere collection or addition," and not "the unity which all things compose in virtue of the universal presence of the same laws." Even the word World, when used in the higher sense as a synonym for Universe, conveys the notion of a place, rather than of "an infinite Being, with which we are connected as the part is connected with the whole." Both these terms, too, exclude the view opposed to Pantheism, while the name God excludes neither the Pantheistic view nor that opposed to it. Science has adopted the word Nature, and even though there are times when this term is preferable to that word, "which, no doubt, is too sacred to be introduced unnecessarily," still, it is ambiguous, and as used by scientific men "excludes the whole domain of human feeling, will, and morality." All this leads our author to conclude that in the word God we have that unity of the Universe that all ought to seek:—

"Nature," he says, "presents herself to us as a goddess of unwearable vigour and unclouded happiness, but without any trouble, or any compunction in her eye, without a conscience or a heart. But God, as the word is used by ancient prophets and modern poets—God, if the word have not lost for us some of its meaning through the feebleness of the preachers, who have undertaken to interpret it, conveys all this beauty and greatness and glory, and conveys besides whatever more awful forces stir within the human heart, whatever binds men in families, and orders them in states. He is the inspirer of kings, the revealer of laws, the reconciler of nations, the redeemer of labour, the queller of tyrants, the reformer of Churches, the guide of the human race to-wards an unknown goal."

Coming to "Natural Religion in Practice," our author deals with the objection that there is no consolation in the worship of or use in believing in a God as revealed in nature alone. He admits that there is a real foundation for the opinion that God so viewed "appears so awful, so devoid of moral perfections, as to be no proper object of worship." At the same time this has been "admitted by those who have worshipped him most." But because religious men have been "able to perceive dimly that which reassured them," they have been able to retain religious feelings. It is not, he contends, because there is no God to worship that science is tempted to renounce worship; rather it is because the necessity of concentration, the absorbing passion of analysis, prudential limitation of the sphere of study and a mistaken fear of the snares of the imagination tempt them to do so. While we may set aside as of little weight the declarations of some scientific men that their pursuit leads to worship, we cannot forget that God as revealed in nature has received the homage of poetry and art, and that worship finds expression in both of these. "Wherever art is, there is religion," says our author, although he admits the religion may be Pagan. In the complete sense of the word religion, art must appreciate the unity in things; and of such religion there must be a higher and lower form. In the latter an inadequate view of nature is taken, that which is highest in nature—the moral principle is excluded. "But if morality receives its due place, such religion is, in a worthy sense, the worship of God." As examples of men who rendered worship to God in Nature, our author indicates Goethe and Wordsworth. We confess that we do not think that the former is altogether a fortunate selection, because whatever may be said in honour of his genius, his industry, and other admirable qualities, there are facts in connection with his life which cannot be set aside when we estimate the value of the religion that Goethe possessed. With respect to Wordsworth, the same objection can not apply. Of him our author says, "He may be called the saint of the religion of Nature, on account of theunworldliness both of his life and of his writings, which refuse to be tried by a mere literary standard;" and he asks why Natural Religion should be refused the credit of having, in this instance, produced its saint? But allowing to Wordsworth all the virtues of simplicity, sincerity, and patience under ill-success—attributed to him—is it quite clear that his worship of the God in Nature alone accounted for these? and was it not the blending of Christian ideas with this worship that really was at the root of his character? We think that our author practically answers such a question when he says further on:—

"If men can add once more the Christian confidence to the Hebraic awe, the Christianity that will result will be of a far higher kind than that which now passes too often for Christianity now, which, so far from being love added to fear, and casting out fear, is a presumptuous and effeminate love that never knew fear."

Wordsworth had this combined confidence and awe, but it was the combination and not the exclusive possession of the one or the other that is accountable for the position he holds.

We have now brought down our review of "Natural Religion" to the conclusion of the first part. It remains to consider the second, in which its application is dealt with.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.—This Association was formed twenty-five years ago. It was on the 29th of July, 1857, that there was held at the residence of the late Lord Brougham a private meeting called by Mr. G. W. Hastings, now one of the Members for Worcestershire, at which the association was established. Lord Brougham was its first president. The twenty-fifth anniversary will be celebrated in September next in the town of Nottingham. A sketch of the origin, constitution, and labours of the Society, by Mr. J. L. Clifford Smith, the secretary, will be published in a few days.

LESLIE STEPHEN'S SCIENCE OF ETHICS.—IV.

After considering the importance of the distinction between the individual and the race, the author proceeds to analyse the character of the social organisation and the nature of the social tissue. The State, the Church, and industrial bodies are spoken of as presenting the most conspicuous cases of different kinds of social organs. According to Mr. Stephen, and we must say his whole reasoning supports the position, "The social evolution means the evolution of a strong social tissue; the best type is the type implied by the strongest tissue; and the correlation between the painful and pernicious, pleasurable and beneficial, is to be understood by interpreting the pernicious and beneficial with reference to the tissue, whilst painful and pleasurable refer to the instincts generated in the socialised being. It is the vigorous tissue which prevails in the struggle, and fitness for forming such tissue is therefore the criterion of a successful elaboration of the type."

In the chapter on the Form of the Moral Law, customs and habits are shown to be "laws of nature" in the making. The moral law is natural; morality is natural. When it is said that a law is moral, what is meant is that it belongs to human beings as such, and not as belonging to any special class, hence it must be natural. It is eternal, so far as anything human can be eternal. It varies only by development, "as each step in the social evolution represents a fuller solution of the problem of adapting a society formed of given materials and acting under fixed conditions to the needs which those conditions impose."

Under the heading, Contents of the Moral Law, separate virtues, as Courage, Temperance, Truth, &c., are discussed. The whole is a statement of the conditions of social welfare, and morality, as distinguished from prudence, refers to "those conditions which imply a direct action upon the social union." "Morality is thus 'the sum of the preservative instincts of a society.' Virtue being a condition of social welfare, the question arises why should I be virtuous, or what are the motives by which the conformity of the individual is or may be secured? Hence in the next three chapters the "theory of obligation" is reviewed, in order to answer the question and the many problems which arise from or are intimately connected with it. The theory of conscience as an elementary faculty is, the author does not hesitate to assert, untenable and superfluous. "Conscience means the pain felt by the wrongdoer, or rather the sensibility implied by that pain." It is not a separate faculty which responds only to a special set of stimuli, but a "compound feeling to which all the strongest instincts of our nature contribute." Our whole character is stamped and moulded from earliest infancy, and the conformation of character so impressed upon us carries with it the wider moral sensibilities. The relation between morality and happiness is next inquired into, and the two succeeding chapters on this subject, although not the most striking in this intensely interesting volume, are full of meaning and importance. The legitimate and inseparable conclusion of the Altruist theory, that the path of duty does not coincide with the path of happiness, Mr. Stephen fully accepts. By acting rightly the virtuous man sometimes makes a sacrifice. Scarcely a man living would refuse unhesitating sacrifice of his own happiness for a sufficient advantage to others. Almost every mother would die or expose herself to sufferings for the good of her infant.

"I do not wish to exaggerate any more than to extenuate the extent of this fundamental discord. I believe it to exist, but I do not believe that it materially modifies the ordinary statement. I take for granted that as a rule it is prudent to be moral, and still more unequivocally that it is prudent to encourage the morality of our neighbours. But I also admit that this argument in favour of morality cannot be rightly put in the form, Morality is always and necessarily coincident with prudence. In exhorting a man to be virtuous, we really exhort him to develop his nature upon the lines which the experience of the race has conclusively proved to coincide with the general conditions both of social and individual welfare. This is to exhort him to acquire a quality of character which, under normal conditions, and in the vast majority of particular cases, will make him the happier because better fitted for the world in which he lives, capable of wider and more enduring aims, and susceptible to motives which will call out the fullest and most harmonious play of all the faculties of his nature; but it is also to exhort him to acquire a quality which will in many cases make him less fit than the less moral man for getting the greatest amount of happiness from a given combination of circumstances. I advise a man to acquire habits of temperance on a simple calculation of pleasure, from wider prudential considerations, and upon purely moral grounds. In each case the argument is conclusive, but in each case it admits of certain exceptions. Temperance will, as a rule, procure him most pleasure, because it will make him healthy; but if he were certain to die to-morrow, he might get most pleasure by being drunk to-night. It will make him fitter for work, and therefore, as a rule, secure him a more comfortable position; but, in particular cases, it might lose him the favour of some immoral person who could do him a service. It will, again, make him more virtuous, and so far a better husband and father; but it is still as before easy to imagine particular cases in which the very strength of the feelings which form the best guarantee for happiness may cause the most exquisite pain, and make him miserable in proportion to their strength. If, indeed, life were—as seems to be implied in the theories of some moralists—a series of detached acts, in each of which a man could calculate the sum of happiness or misery attainable by different courses, and calculate them without reference to his character, the whole argument would be different. But this is precisely what it is not. Every man starts with an inborn set of qualities which are gradually moulded, developed, or suppressed by the circumstances in which he is placed, and by the inherent processes of growth and decay. The happiness or misery due to any set of external conditions depends essentially upon the disposition upon which they operate. Therefore it may be, or rather it plainly is, necessary for a man to acquire certain instincts, amongst them the altruistic instincts, which fit him for the general conditions of life, though in particular cases they may cause him to be more miserable than if he were without them. And thus, again, the acquisition of altruistic feeling may be recommended on purely prudential grounds, although these grounds can never supply an exhaustive statement of the motives; and some power of altruistic feeling is presupposed in the very capacity to become moral. But it does not follow that on special occasions prudence and virtue will coincide; and, as a matter of fact, I think that they often emphatically differ."

It is long since we derived greater pleasure from the reading of a book than that which Mr. Stephen's work has afforded us. Though the notices of the volume which we have given from time to time in these articles will impart a fair idea of what the book consists, it must be read to be appreciated as fully as it deserves to be. The author's clearly logical style, and the ready use he is able to make of an extensive insight into human nature have helped in the production of a very charming and profitable work on the science of ethics. He concludes by a remark which seems to require explicit statement.

"It is sometimes said that science cannot provide a new basis of morality; and this is urged as though it were an objection. I at least must thoroughly accept the statement. What science proves, according to me, is precisely that the only basis of morality is the old basis; it shows that one and the same principle has always determined the development of morality, although it has been stated in different phraseology. And, moreover, this principle is not the suggestion of any end distinct from all others. The great forces which govern human conduct are the same that they always have been and always will be. The dread of hunger, thirst, and cold; the desire to gratify the passions; the love of wife and child or friend; sympathy with the sufferings of our neighbours; resentment of injury inflicted upon ourselves—these and such as these are the great forces which govern mankind. When a moralist tries to assign anything else as an ultimate motive, he is getting beyond the world of realities. If a theologian tells me to love my mother because God commands me to love her, he is inverting the true order of thought. My love of those who are nearest to my sympathies must be the ultimate ground of any love that I can have for anybody else. My desire for the welfare of my race grows out of my desire for the welfare of my own intimates; and that exists independently of any ethical theory whatever. A theological basis of morality is conceivable so far as the supreme being is represented as knowable and lovable; but to order morality in the name of logical consistency is reasonable only when I can stir men's blood by assuming that two and two make four. On my theory, then, the moralist assigns no new motives; he accepts human nature as it is, and he tries to show how it may maintain and improve the advantages already acquired. His influence is little enough; but, such as it is, it depends upon the fact that a certain harmony has already come into existence; and that men are therefore so constituted that they desire a more thorough solution of existing discords. A sound moral system is desirable in order to give greater definiteness to the aims and methods; and it is doubtless important to obtain one in a period of rapid decay of old systems. But it is happy for the world that moral progress has not to wait till an unimpeachable system of ethics has been elaborated." M.

RESIGNATION OF PROFESSOR BLACKIE.—Professor Blackie, Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, acting on medical advice, has resigned his chair. Professor Blackie has held the appointment since 1852. The patronage is in the hands of the curators.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE SCHOOL.—Lord Reay presided at the distribution of prizes to the scholars in this school, which took place on Wednesday in the Lecture Theatre of the college, in the presence of a considerable number of the friends of the boys. Mr. H. Weston Eve, M.A., the head master, said the year had been an eventful one, but one of good steady work and progress. The highest class had never been better attended, nor had they ever shown a better average of work, and the same remark applied to all the other branches of the school. Of the twenty-two boys sent up to the London Matriculating Examinations eighteen passed, and four of the sixty-six honours fell to the boys of this school. In the course of a short address, after giving away the prizes, Lord Reay said he claimed for the founders of this great institution in London great foresight and great insight into the educational wants of the day, in having founded the school and the college for the boys, and he also claimed great credit for the teachers who had been able to work out the great problem which was then laid before them, because there was not the slightest doubt that this eclectic system of education, if it were to have the results which he was happy to say had been attained in that institution, entailed on both the teachers and the scholars and undergraduates infinitely more trouble than was ever gone through in bygone days under the old system. Let them go back thirty years when they started this educational work, what were the ideas prevalent in those days? Let him give them in the words of one of our poets:—

O ye who teach the ingenuous youth of nations—

Holland, France, England, Germany, and Spain—

I pray you flog them on all occasions;

It mends the morals never mind the pain.

(Laughter.) Apart from the principle which he had just described, they there supplied a great want in English education, and that was the grading of the various degrees of education, the gradual ascension from one school to the higher education given in another, and a proper giving of that modern knowledge which was so much required in England. Having spoken of what they had, he was bound to say there were certain things which they had not. They had not got rich endowments. In Glasgow and Dundee there were splendid educational endowments, as there were also in the North of England, as in the case of the Manchester and Liverpool Colleges. London, in one sense, was more like a country than a town, and there was not that individual sense of belonging to a great corporation that there was in the great provincial towns, which induced persons to give largely in support of the educational institutions. In that respect London was a loser, but he hoped it would not remain so. On the motion of Mr. Eve, seconded by Dr. Buchanan, a vote of thanks was given to Lord Reay for distributing the prizes, and for his address, which his lordship briefly acknowledged, and proposed three cheers for the masters, which were given with great heartiness, and the proceedings then terminated.

Occasional Notes.

THE Manchester correspondent of the Boston Christian Register tells us that a somewhat interesting correspondence, not yet published, exists between certain American consuls and James Russell Lowell, American Minister at St. James's. A happy thought struck these consuls—that it would be a graceful thing for them to present Mr. Lowell with a handsome bit of plate upon his reaching "the grand climacteric," as they phrased it, of his seventieth year. The happy thought brought forth gracious deed. The plate was forwarded upon the poet's birthday, with a most eulogistic letter. Unfortunately, the "grand climacteric" was still seven years away when Lowell received the happy silver thought of his appreciative countrymen. He was obliged to make the best he could of his backwardness—to explain that it was very awkward that he had attained to no more than sixty-three years, and to promise to get on toward the "grand climacteric" as fast as ever the conditions of time would permit. The consuls, too, were a little awkwardly fixed; and the whole correspondence, still lying in private drawers, is both humorous and full of making the best of it.

CANON WILBERFORCE's recent letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury illustrates the connection between beer and Bible in a way that must be very awkward for the Primate. The Church as a whole being the largest landowner in the kingdom is naturally the largest owner of public-houses. Mr. Wilberforce avers that public-houses are more, in proportion, numerous on Church lands than elsewhere. The Bishop of London, riding between his two town houses, would, it is said, pass 100 taverns which are the property of his Church. One of the largest public-houses in London, which sells £10,000 of drink every year, is part of the Bishop's endowment. Here and there in London you may see a church flanked on either side by a ginshop—all three, of course, being Church property. The publican appears to take instinctively to the vacant land in the neighbourhood of a church. Is this sort of thing to go on, asks Mr. Wilberforce, or is the Church to continue pretending to fight against the intemperance which it helps to produce? The Archbishop is an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, and the Times orders him to answer the Canon's interrogatories without delay. As it will be difficult to explain away facts, the Archbishop and others in authority will probably find it convenient to make no reply.

WE are glad to hear of the improvements which our earnest and hard-working friends at Stamford-street Chapel, Blackfriars-road, are about to make in connection with their congregational activities. They have one of the largest Sunday-schools in London, but have no suitable place for teaching, and have had to hire part of one of the Board Schools in the neighbourhood, while many of their classes meet in the gallery of the chapel and some of the large pews. The neighbourhood is densely crowded with the poorer classes, and almost any number of children could be gathered in if there were more and better accommodation. It is now proposed to build a large schoolroom capable of holding about 500 children; and there is no doubt that with the very efficient teachers they have at Stamford-street it will soon be filled. In addition to this, the chapel itself is to be repaired, improved, and beautified, so as to make it not only more attractive, but a better centre of usefulness in the district, occupying very much the position of a parish church to the surrounding population. We like this idea of combining the useful with the ornamental in our church work, and the whole scheme is so carefully prepared, and is so thoroughly deserving of support, that we recommend it with confidence to the never-failing liberality of the Unitarian public.

THE writer of the interesting "Chapters from the Life of a Congregational Minister" in the Congregationalist of this month records his experience of a meeting of the Peace Society, when Mr. Henry Richard was the chief speaker. "The chair was taken by the mayor, a retired captain, and an advanced Liberal. He made no speech in opening the meeting, but on returning thanks at the close, he said: 'Gentlemen, I heartily thank you for the honour you have done me; and all I can say in reply is, here is my sword, and when my Queen and country require it, it is at their service.' An interesting finale for a peace meeting!"

"THE Year-Book of Unitarian Churches in America shows that the churches of this denomination number only 351. Since 1800 only 220 churches have been formed. This is slow progress—not three a year. The Baptists, on the other hand, have averaged one church a day for many years." This is taken from the Nonconformist. But the Roman Catholics in America have been increasing in even greater ratio in proportion to their numbers, so what does that prove?

Macmillan's Magazine for August contains a poem by the late Dean Stanley, on "Death and Life," written so lately as 1880. The following lines are very touching, written as if in unconscious anticipation of the great change which the writer was so soon to experience:—

O Death! how sweet the thought
That this world's strife is ended;
That all we feared and all we sought
In one deep sleep is blended.

No more the anguish of to-day
To wait the darker morrow;
No more stern call to do or say,
To brood o'er sin and sorrow.

O Death! how dear the hope,
That through the thickest shade
Beyond the steep and sunless slope,
Our treasured store is laid.

The loved, the mourned, the honoured dead
That lonely path have trod,
And that same path we too must tread,
To be with them and God.

WE hear with great pleasure that Mr. Stopford Brooke, jun., after graduating at Oxford and attending courses of lectures at Berlin, has finally decided to enter the Unitarian ministry, and been engaged to preach to the Old Meeting Congregation at Birmingham on Sept. 17. We hope that before that time some of our metropolitan congregations, or at least the scanty remnants of them left in town, will have the opportunity of hearing Mr. Brooke. By the way, why do we so constantly speak of a minister as preaching to a congregation, and of a congregation as hearing a minister? We have ourselves fallen into that bad habit, which is a relic of our old dissenting traditions, which seem altogether to ignore the fact that the most important part of a minister's function is the conduct of public worship, and that a congregation assemble not merely to hear the sermon, but to offer up the common service of praise and thanksgiving. Our old dissenting system with its unfortunate limitations fails to realise the beautiful idea expressed in the "Book of Common Prayer," and we should be thankful for the addition to our ranks of a large and influential Broad-Church element which might help us to realise more of the true liturgical spirit of worship, which seems to us to be the only form of worship adapted for the public service of the congregation.

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS.—The report of the College of Preceptors for the half-year states that the examination of pupils in the schools began on June 13, and was carried on simultaneously at thirty-one centres. The total number of candidates examined was 4,616, of whom 2,493 were boys and 2,123 girls. The examination for teachers began on June 27, and was attended by fifty-four candidates, of whom six were examined for the licentiate and forty-eight for the associateship of the college. The council has instituted a supplementary examination each half-year to meet the case of students seeking registration by the Medical Council or the Incorporated Law Society. The first was held in London in March last, and was attended by 135 candidates, of whom three obtained certificates of the first class and fifty-eight certificates of the second class. Arrangements are now under consideration for holding these examinations at local centres in different parts of the country.

Reminiscences: Chiefly of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement. By the Rev. T. Mozley, M.A. Two Vols. Longmans. 1882.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

Even after reading these two very interesting volumes of 900 pages we have to repeat the opening sentence of the venerable writer now that "the story of the Oxford Movement has yet to be told, and there is much reason to fear that it never will be told as it should be." Those who were most actively concerned in it both as friends and foes have already passed away, and have left behind them no records but the controversial pamphlets which exercised their purpose for a time, and with few exceptions have scarcely become a prominent even of the literary history of the Movement. Some of the principal leaders, including, of course, that great personage who is most of all entitled to say quorum magna pars fui, have gone over to Rome, and look back upon the stormy times of the Oxford Movement from an external and comparatively unsympathetic point of view. Cardinal Newman has left us his own impressions in an Apologia, which is a possession for ever as a model of pure English style; but it is doing no injustice to that invaluable book to say that it is more interesting as a record of the personal character and impressions of the writer than as a contribution to the history of the most momentous religious movement of the last half century. Like the Evangelical reaction of the last century and the first quarter of this century, the Tractarian movement has extended much further than even its zealous advocates had first anticipated; it has taken deep and permanent root in the ecclesiastical life of the country, and has exercised a wide influence over the whole tone of religious thought as well as in the development of the cultus, not only of the Church of England, but of other churches widely removed from it in doctrine and discipline. Such a movement needs a candid and careful historian, who shall be in sufficient sympathy with it to do full justice to its leading characteristics; who shall be sufficiently removed from its heated personal controversies to be able to grasp its fundamental principles; and yet shall have that intimate personal knowledge of the leading personages who directed the great Movement of which they were rather the organisers than the initiators, as to be able to give life and soul to the whole history. It seems doubtful, however, whether any one will ever combine all these requisite qualifications, and we shall probably have to content ourselves with "Reminiscences," biographies and Mémoires pour servir which may form the materials for a clear and consecutive history by some model religious historian of the future.

Mr. Mozley has many of the prime qualifications for such a work, and his "Reminiscences," next to Cardinal Newman's "Apologia," form the most valuable contribution to it that the world has yet received. He has lived through the whole period which he describes, and although in full sympathy with most of the essential characteristics of what used to be called the "Oxford Movement" he has learned to discern many of its weaknesses, and with advancing age has modified many of his early opinions and prejudices. He is the brother-in-law of the Newmans, and was the intimate personal friend of most of the Tractarian leaders. As a former distinguished fellow of Oriel, he witnessed the origin of the Movement, and as subsequently the editor of its principal organ, the British Critic, in succession to J. H. Newman, he exercised no small influence on the various controversies, literary and ecclesiastical, which marked the origination of a new form—or, we should rather say—the revival of an old form of Church thought and life. Yet in his introduction our author himself modestly allows that his book is but a contribution, with many unavoidable limitations, to the history of this important epoch of religious history. "Reminiscences," as he allows, are but a lower form of Recollections, which at the best must share the common infirmities of mortal memory. "The mental picture of events long passed by, and seen through an increasing breadth of many-tinted haze, is liable to be warped and coloured by more recent remembrances, and by impressions received from other quarters." Our venerable author—he tells us he is about six years Newman's junior—disarms criticism by the almost pathetic recapitulation of his disqualifications, but still it is simply a fact that these Reminiscences, as he himself characterises them, are superficial, sketchy and often trivial. He acknowledges that he is not much of a logician, or of a metaphysician or of a philosopher; least of all is he a theologian. But the Tractarian movement was within certain obvious limitations essentially a logical, a metaphysical, a philosophical, and most of all a theological, reaction against the prevailing tendencies of thought both in Church and State. Nevertheless, he has all the qualifications for his task that we have just enumerated, and in addition to these he possesses a great mass of letters, journals, and other documents, as well as a wonderfully clear recollection of the characters and even the minutest events of the stirring Oxford life of half a century ago, which have enabled him to produce a work second only in value to the "Apologia" itself, and even surpassing it in its extremely interesting and life-like picture of what may be styled the Tractarian personnel.

Newman is unquestionably the prominent figure of these volumes, as he was the leader of the reaction which was long known by the name of a theologian greatly his inferior in all the essential characteristics of intellectual eminence. He appears here as the centre of a group of men, notable in their time, not one of whom, however, as Mr. Mozley candidly remarks, would be a living name a century hence but for his share in the light of Newman's genius and goodness. We have occasional, but only too slight, references to F. W. Newman, Whately, Blanco White, Churton, Hartley Coleridge, Arnold; and fuller reminiscences of Hurrell Froude, the Wilberforces, Hampden, Isaac Williams, Charles Neate, and others now almost forgotten who were prominent figures in Oxford life from forty to fifty years ago. But Newman is the one great figure who rises pre-eminent over all the others; and amidst the immense amount of diversified reminiscences of the most sketchy kind before us we can hardly confer a greater boon upon our readers than by selecting and grouping together the scattered notices of the real centre and head of the Oxford Movement.

In these fascinating volumes J. H. Newman stands out in clearer outline than even in his own marvellous "Apologia." He was born in the City of London, a few yards from the Bank of England, early in the year 1801. His father belonged to a family who had a small landed property in Cambridgeshire; and from being chief clerk in a bank he became a partner in a well-known firm of private bankers. His mother belonged to a Huguenot family, well known in the City of London as engravers and paper manufacturers. She retained the old family traditions in religion, and brought up her sons in that modified form of Calvinism from which their subsequent life was an intense reaction in divergent directions. In his own biography of his spiritual life Newman has, as Mr. Mozley says, not done justice to his early adventures in the domains of thought, politics, fancy, and taste. As a boy he composed an opera and improvised masques and idylls, and only they who see no poetry in "Lead, kindly light," or in the "Dream of Gerontius" will deny that this divine gift entered into his birthright. He was sent to a large private school at Ealing, said then to be the best preparatory school in the country. He rapidly rose to the head of the school, where before long he was followed by his no less remarkable and even more precocious brother, Francis Newman. From boyhood, we read, the two brothers took the opposite sides on every possible question, and perhaps the fact that one of the born disputants was more than four years younger than the other accounts somewhat for their respective lines of divergence. From Ealing both brothers went to Oxford, the elder entering Trinity College, the younger, too young as yet for college, pursuing his studies "as far as compatible with an amiable but universal and persistent antagonism," under the other's directions in lodgings. John Henry was intended by his parents for the law, and actually kept some terms at Lincoln's Inn; but early in his university career a great blow fell on him and changed his destiny. His father's bank succumbed under the pressure of the times, and henceforth he could have little aid from his friends. From some unaccountable cause he failed utterly in the examination for honours, when he was not yet nineteen. A few years later his younger brother Francis, at the age of little more than twenty, gained, without any apparent effort, one of the best double-firsts ever known. Remaining for three years after taking his degree at Oxford, enjoying the much-valued position of scholar of Trinity, in 1821 he published, together with his friend Henry Boden, two cantos on St. Bartholomew's Eve, which, says Mr. Mozley, might now be supposed the first fiery outbreak of a spirit destined to wield the masses of Exeter Hall. In the year 1823 he was elected to a fellowship of Oriel College, which at that time contained "some of the most distinguished personages, the most vigorous minds, and the most attractive characters in Oxford." Oriel was the seat of the "Noetic" school, the term evidently meaning the intellectualists as distinguished from the obscurantists of the then prevailing Evangelical party and the old "High and Dry" Churchmen. "Its prominent talkers, preachers and writers seemed to be always undermining, if not actually demolishing, received traditions and institutions; and whether they were preaching from the University pulpit, or arguing in common room, or issuing pamphlets on passing occasions, even faithful and self-reliant men felt the ground shaking under them." Whately was then the spiritual and intellectual despot of Oriel, and it would not be possible, says our author, to describe now the terror his presence was sure to infuse among all who wished things to remain much as they were in their own lifetime. For years after Newman was a fellow of the same college with Whately it would not have been easy to state the difference between their respective views, unless it might be found in Newman's immense and almost minutely reverential knowledge of Scripture, and in a certain yearning to build as fast as men cast down, and to plant again the waste places. Newman was unaffectedly deferential to his seniors. He obeyed Whately, though he used to say that in Whately's Logic, "a most interesting book, there was one thing not to be found, and that was logic." He would have been ready to love Whately to the end, "but for the inextinguishable condition of friendship imposed by Whately, absolute and implicit agreement in thought, word and deed." When Newman was twenty-five he seems to have been the first choice of Professor Lloyd, to whom the selection had been confided, for the post of private tutor to Prince George of Hanover; only he was found to be a couple of years too young, and Dr. Jelf was appointed. A "very good judge of men and things used to call Newman a Lord Chancellor thrown away." Mr. Mozley speculates whether, had he been offered the tutorship, which it is assumed he would have taken, the course of German politics might not have been varied. Newman's "politics," it is stated, "occupy an earlier place in the memory of his pupils than his theology, for he had analysed the constitution and history of every State in the world, ancient or still existing."

In 1825 Whately became Principal of St. Alban Hall, and Newman his Vice-Principal, and at Easter, 1826, two Oriel men were elected to fellowships—Robert Wilberforce and Richard Hurrell Froude, and in the same year Newman became tutor at Oriel. He now found himself in a college, then held to be in the very front rank of academic progress, with a Provost, Dr. Hawkins, who owed his election to him, and with two tutors, the above-named Fellows, entirely devoted to him. At what date he began to move in the direction which now seems plain enough it would not now be easy to say. "It never was possible to be even a quarter of an hour in his company without a man feeling himself to be invited to take an onward step sufficient to tax his energy or his faith."

About this time he wrote the elaborate article on Apollonius Tyaneus for the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, drawing the line strongly between true and fictitious miracles. He had early faced the question of evidences by the study of infidel writers. He knew well Gibbon's great work and Hume's essays. He had Tom Paine's works under lock and key, "and lent them with much caution to such as could bear the shock." Mr.

Mozley adds that "his carefulness to master the other side of the great question has suggested to some critics that his faith and his scepticism contended for the ascendancy on such equal conditions as to leave the issue sometimes doubtful." We ourselves have often remarked the essential similarity between the minds of the two brothers, and are strongly inclined to think that it was in an even balance which was to write the "Phases of Faith" and "Natural History of the Soul," and which "The Apologia," and the "Lives of the Saints." Mr. Mozley admits it as possible, though it never occurred to him while working with Newman that he may "once have caught sight of the spectre of unbelief," though the dread might not have been long present with him. If he ever knew what it was to doubt, its sole effect was to make him "resolve never to abate the speed of his onward progress, never even to look behind, never even to indulge in any earthly abstraction that would give the foe the least advantage." Constant work of a spiritual constructive sort has been the principle of his life: the one feature he could scarcely understand was that he should stand and gaze instead of advancing. He had no leisure for scepticism. "He reduced retrospection to very narrow compass, to a few faces, to flowers on a bank or a wall, to a fragrance or a sound. Perfumes, he said, brought back the past, and so did distant church bells; but with the scent and the sound the past departed from him."

In 1828 Newman succeeded Hawkins in the vicarage of St. Mary's, the University Church, where he soon attracted a large congregation. To St. Mary's was attached the Chapelry of Littlemore, three miles from Oxford. Up to this date, and for some time after, there was no open breach between Newman and the Low Church party. Hitherto he had been actively connected with the local Evangelical Missionary Society, a subscriber to and writer in the Record, and an occasional attendant at the Evangelical soirées at St. Edmund's Hall, the headquarters of the party, where his sermons were judged to be spiritual, though somewhat incomprehensible. Not till after the completion of the "Arians" was he aware that he was parting company with his old friends the Evangelicals, to whom he was in the habit of referring by the letter X, or the name "Peculiars," while he used Z of the High and Dry. He was alarmed by the Evangelical neglect of the objective phases of the Christian Church. He continued to respect Evangelical spirituality. Mr. Mozley detects the force of early associations in much later stages of his development. "In the 'Apologia' it seems to me that Newman returns a long way towards his earliest religious impressions, and shows himself more at home with the Evangelical party." For the present, though detaching himself from his Evangelical connections, he had no desire to fight them. He had no desire to found a religious sect at all. He did not love the personal rule it implies. He wished each of his followers to work on general lines with individual freedom. His efforts were applied to the creation of a community, with Oriel for its head-quarters, which should battle by a variety of agencies with the general worldliness and coldness of the age. "Newman's feeling was that, since the world was going one way, he would go another, and that the world had no right to complain if it compelled counter-action."

Oriel College was now to be the centre of a great ecclesiastical revival which was to stir all England, and which has a perceptible influence on other parties within the Anglican than the High Church party, and on other Churches than the Church of England. It is interesting to read in these minute reminiscences revelations of Oxford as it was in the first half of the present century; it is still more instructive to read the reforms gradually effected by the wonderful personal influence of Newman. In many respects he anticipated more than fifty years ago recent academical theories in regard to teaching Fellowships and the endowment of research. He met of course with much opposition, but every election he brought about justified itself by its results.

As early as 1829 Newman and other Fellows of Oriel had begun to meet twice a week for the study of the Scriptures. They soon agreed in their investigations into prophecy that "Anti-Christ was not the Church of Rome, but Pagan Rome, the spirit of which survived Paganism and the Empire, and, as it were, haunted and partially possessed the Church, especially the Roman communion." There was no such thing as Biblical scholarship at that time in the University, and Mr. Mozley's sarcastic stories call to mind our friend Mr. Geldart's recollections in his autobiographical "Nitræ Tradleg." He remembers being told that the very learned tutor of a neighbouring college made the ingenious comment on the words—"Draw out now," in the miracle of Cana, whence we may infer that the Jews used "spigots." Tyler, the then Dean of Oriel, had a decided turn for the picturesque and quaint. To illustrate the absolute sanctity with which the Jews regarded the Temple he quoted a strange Rabbinical story. Along all the lines of the cornice and roof there were wires in such complete communication that not a sparrow could alight on any part without setting six thousand small bells tinkling. Of this same Tyler, a pompous but kind-hearted man, the story is told that he had a somewhat higher estimate of his position as Dean than was warranted by usage, or by the actual powers of the office. He had occasion to write a note to Gaisford, Dean of Christ Church, who receiving it in company, read aloud: "The Dean of Oriel presents his compliments to the Dean of Christ Church," adding, "Alexander the coppersmith sendeth greeting to Alexander the Great."

But the limits of our space warn us to pass rapidly on, not omitting, however, the incidental reference to the autobiographer's old schoolmaster, "Edward Higginson [of Derby], the Unitarian pastor and teacher of the Strutts, beckoning to friends and clambering over the pews of All Saints' Church," when the whole town attended a late evening service on occasion of the funeral of the Princess Charlotte.

It was not till the publication of the volume of "Parochial Sermons" in 1834 that the church, which was already being stunned, or awakened, or exasperated by the rolling thunders of the weighty and multifarious "Tracts for the Times," became alive to the actual individuality of him who inspired them. "It was as if a trumpet had sounded through the land. All read and all admired, even if they dissented or criticised. The publishers said that the volume put all other sermons out of the market, just as 'Waverley' and 'Guy Mannering' put out all other novels." But all parties were more or less against him. Evangelicism stood aloof from its recreant son. High and Dry disliked the earnestness and asceticism without venturing to persecute a party which proclaimed its eager devotion to Episcopacy. A large part of the clergy, however, earnest and proud of its vocation, read and admired, if not always very intelligently, publications which, with all their unwieldiness and prolixity, stirred the prevailing stagnation. It is curious to recall that Newman introduced into Oriel as lecturer, Hampden, afterwards Bishop of Hereford. It is still more curious to recall the ingenious confessions of the dismay occasioned by Hampden's Bampton Lectures which were then incomprehensible, which everybody, Mr. Gladstone included, condemned, and which nobody, Mr. Gladstone included, read. "Thirty-four years after the delivery of these lectures Hampden, to his great surprise and somewhat qualified pleasure, received a letter from Mr. Gladstone, written in the very abyss of penitence and self-humiliation. He had done his best for a whole generation to understand the lecturer, without the slightest success. As it was utterly past his power to understand them, he had been clearly wrong to condemn them on the information of others." Church and University were alike fighting against them under the leadership of Newman and his associates. But the story of the Oxford High Church revival is too long for us to recount, and, moreover, it is familiar in all its main features to most educated readers. It is pleasant to dwell upon the personal recollections of the past, with which, as we have seen, these volumes are crowded. There is a perfect gallery of Oxford portraits, all of them recalling men who were prominent in the movement, and are still remembered with reverence by a great party. The figure of the leader himself, "Ὁ μέγας," as Henry Wilberforce used to call him, is presented in a pleasant human setting.

It is interesting to hear how this man of many cares, while at Oxford, never passed a day without writing a Latin sentence, either a translation or an original composition, before he had done his morning's work. He had all the painstaking temper which is said to be a condition of genius. "As well for present satisfaction as for future use, he wrote and laid by a complete history of every serious question in which he was concerned. It must be added that he did the same with every book he read, and every subject he inquired into." None but Copleston surpassed him in quickness and accuracy with the College accounts. His pleasures, though not many, were more than the incessant talk round the Oriel teapot, which was the jest of Oxford non-Oriel wits.

He derived an exquisite delight from music, and was and is an accomplished performer. He left to others the details of ritual and Church architecture, because he valued other objects more, not that he did not sympathise with everything graceful and beautiful. His ear for rhythm was just and sensitive. He had a poet's insight into nature. Flowers he was as fond of as a child could be. He could seldom see a flower without its reviving some memory. Old English forest trees he delighted in. "The walk from Oxford to Littlemore, especially if taken every other day, might be thought monotonous; but it never palled on Newman. The heavens changed if the earth did not, and when they changed they made the earth new. His eye quickly caught any sudden glory or radiance above; every prismatic hue or silver lining; every rift, every patch of blue; every strange conformation, every threat of ill, or promise of a brighter hour. He carried his scenery with him, and on that account had not the craving for change of residence, for mountains and lakes, which most educated people have. His visits to country parsonages sometimes took him into districts singularly wanting in the features constituting scenery and landscapes. But even on Salisbury Plain, where there are no trees, no hedges, no water, no flowers, no banks, no lanes, and now not even turf, and seldom even a village or a church in sight, he would walk or run with a friend as cheerfully as the prophet ran before the King from Carmel to Jezreel to announce the opened gates of heaven."

Animal Intelligence. By George J. Romanes, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S. London: Kegan Paul, Trench and Co. 1882.

The author of this book, one of the late Mr. Darwin's most valuable coadjutors, is to be congratulated upon the appearance at length of his long-announced work. A really good outline of the whole subject of mind in animals was much wanted, and Mr. Romanes has excellently supplied the want. No word, perhaps, has been more misleading than the word "instinct," and easy as it has been to ascribe various actions of the lower animals to this principle, when once those actions have been affirmed to have been instinctive, further investigation has usually been deemed unnecessary, if not absolutely useless. The true explanation of the phenomena, ignorance of which was thus cloaked under a word, was not forthcoming until evolution in biology had been established—evolution in organic forms, rather; for psychology must now be regarded as a department of biology. It was a loud howl which first greeted the statement that all the variations in animal and vegetable morphology had arisen in time by virtue of the fact that slight modifications are constantly occurring, and that in the struggle for existence such as possessed any small advantage in form, colour, &c., survived to perpetuate their peculiarities. When the harmlessness (as well as the truth) of this doctrine became apparent, that howl subsided. But we can hardly say the same of the dissent made from evolution in mind. The reason of this has not been because the harmlessness (and truth) of the doctrine of mental evolution has not become apparent in an equal degree, so much as because students of nature have mostly followed scientific methods, while metaphysicians, who have had the monopoly of investigation of mind, have not adopted the scientific method. Hence, although the latter have had to yield at last to the universal opinion of specialists in the sphere of organic forms, after vainly asserting themselves upon a matter they did not understand, they refuse to give up their own special province, with its stores of curious things, to the merely scientific man. But the study of the form of the brain has inevitably led to the parallel investigation, by the same observers, of its functions. To the blessing of mankind the work of explaining mental phenomena has thus fallen to the hands of those who are not above using rational systems of inquiry.

The work now under notice is the first part of an undertaking on the part of Mr. Romanes to provide for men of science (and also metaphysicians) something resembling a text-book of the facts of Comparative Psychology, from which the particular level of intelligence to which this or that species of animal attains might be ascertained; and, secondly, to consider the facts of animal intelligence in their relation to the theory of descent. The original intention was to complete this in a single volume of the publisher's "International Scientific Series," but the material proving too considerable, the second division of the work is promised within a year or two, under the title "Mental Evolution." The present volume is, of course, to be read with reference to its ultimate object of supplying facts for the subsequent deduction of principles, otherwise, as the author says, it may seem but a small improvement upon the works of the anecdote-mongers. It is the mapping out of animal psychology for the purposes of a subsequent synthesis.

The preface contains a grateful expression of the obligation the author was under to the late Mr. Darwin, and in a note explaining that this was written before the close of the life of the great naturalist, Mr. Romanes says: "I cannot allude to the calamity which has since occurred without paying my tribute, not alone to the memory of the greatest genius of our age, but still more, and much more, to the memory of a friend so inexpressibly noble, kind, and generous, that even my immense admiration of the naturalist was surpassed by my loving veneration for the man."

In a very fine introduction to the whole subject the author states exactly what he means by "mind," "instinct," "reflex action," &c.; and then he proceeds to an examination of the mental phenomena exhibited in the animal kingdom, beginning with the lowest in organisation, and at length reaching the highest, save man. The volume is brought to a close by an account of the behaviour of a brown Capuchin monkey, lent to the author by the Zoological Society. This account, given in the form of a diary kept by Miss Romanes, is a very remarkable one, and has not been previously published. In conclusion the author says:—

"In conclusion, I should say that much the most striking feature in the psychology of this animal and the one which is least like anything met with in other animals, was the tireless spirit of investigation. The hours and hours of patient industry which this poor monkey has spent in ascertaining all that his monkey-intelligence could of the sundry unfamiliar objects that fell into his hands, might well read a lesson in carefulness to many a hasty observer. And the keen satisfaction which he displayed when he had succeeded in making any little discovery, such as that of the mechanical principle of the screw, repeating the results of his newly earned knowledge over and over again, till one could not but marvel at the intent abstraction of the 'dumb brute'—this was so different from anything to be met with in any other animal, that I confess I should not have believed what I saw unless I had repeatedly seen it with my own eyes. As my sister once observed, while we were watching him conducting some of his researches, in oblivion to his food and all his other surroundings—'when a monkey behaves like this, it is no wonder that man is a scientific animal!' And in my next work I shall hope to show how, from so high a starting-point, the psychology of the monkey has passed into that of the man."

We commend this book as one in many respects well worth reading.

THE QUARTERLIES.

The British Quarterly Review, to which we give precedence on account of its theological character, has but little theology in the present number. Its most interesting article is that on "Recent Japanese Progress." It seems that in devising and founding the new national institutions Japan has chosen various countries as her models. Her army, for instance, is on the French pattern, her navy on that of England. Americans have aided in organising the postal service and developing agriculture, and have also taken a large share in education. Police are on the French plan, Government hospitals on that of Germany. British systems have been mainly followed in the railways, telegraphs, lighthouses, mines and prisons, and the Government scheme of public education. America, Germany, France and England have together furnished types of machinery and other aids for developing manufactures and mines. It is a marvellous record of progress that the writer lays before his readers. Once having recognised that progress is essential to welfare, and having resolved, first amongst the nations of the East, to throw off past traditions and mould their civilisation after that of Western countries, it was not in the nature of the lively and impulsive Japanese to advance along the path of reform with a calmness and circumspection that might have been possible to a people of less active temperament; but, looking to its action as a whole, the Japanese have made singularly few mistakes in the sweeping changes they have sanctioned during the last twelve years.

Dr. A. H. Japp follows with a fine literary paper on "The Puritan Element in Longfellow," with copious quotations from the "New England Tragedies," and "Miles Standish." Another purely literary article is that on the "Poetry of Rossetti," in which the writer shows that "one of the priceless gifts that Christianity gave the world was the ideal—not merely of chastity, but far wider and deeper—of purity. It is against this Christian ideal of life that the modern, like the ancient, Pagan rebels. Mr. Rossetti's verse, Mr. Burne Jones's pictures, Mr. Pater's criticism, and the multitude of feeble echoes they have aroused, are so many pagan protests against the Christian ideal of purity. There is an article in another branch of art on "Bach and Handel," an essay in comparative biography, by Lina Ramann. There is but one purely theological article, a learned discussion, by Dr. W. Wright, entitled "The Hittites and the Bible," the main thesis of which is that the statements of the Bible with reference to the Hittites are fully confirmed by the cumulative evidence of modern discovery. There are two political articles which call for no particular comment, "The Situation in Ireland" and "The Ministry and Parliament;" and there is the usual full review of "Contemporary Literature."

The Westminster Review has a painfully interesting article on "The Decay of Faith," from which we widely dissent, and which we must make the subject of separate comment. The opening paper treats of "Canada as a Home," and gives many interesting and reliable particulars to induce emigrants to direct their course to that country. As an instance of the progress of the Dominion the writer alludes to education. Forty years ago hardly one in fifteen of the children of Canada attended any school, now the proportion is one in four. "The Universities, colleges and high schools of the Dominion number some five hundred, and the public or common schools fourteen thousand, attended by over a million of pupils, and supported by an annual contribution from the State and people of over £1,400,000." There is a valuable paper on "Invention and Patent Law," and an extremely interesting one on "Caroline Fox, John Sterling and John Stuart Mill," the choice anecdotes in which have been incorporated in our own recent review of the work which forms its text. There is a comprehensive "Review of Indian and Colonial Affairs;" and papers on "Camille Desmoulins," "Darwin," and "Cant's Moral Philosophy" make this a number of more than usual interest.

The Edinburgh Review is in many respects less attractive than usual, and is thereby perhaps a suitable representative of a moribund Whiggism. There is little to be learned from the papers on "Indian Administration and Finance" and "North Borneo." The articles on "Don Sebastian and his Personators," "Siemen's Theory of Solar Heat," "Litré, Dumas, Pasteur, and Taine," "The Red Book of Menetheth," "Lecky's England in the Eighteenth Century," "American Society in American Fiction," and "Three in Norway," will be read with varied interest by different classes of readers. But the article which will excite most general interest is "A Retrospect of the Session," in which the author of "Plain Whig Principles" empties the vials of his wrath upon Mr. Gladstone and the more advanced section of the Liberal party. We are told that the Land Act "has not disarmed a single Whiteboy, it has not led to the punishment of a single murderer, it has not brought in arrears of rent, and it has left the country more distracted than ever. It was the work of short-sighted and enthusiastic politicians, who were not ashamed to apply many of the principles of the Land League which they profess to condemn, and who certainly were not aware that they were paltering with treason and inciting to murder." The Radical policy which has been mainly applied to Ireland for the last two years "has ended in a most disastrous failure, in sanguinary and unpunished crime, and in what has been termed a social revolution." The House of Commons itself is rapidly sinking in public estimation, and this "arises mainly from the insincerity, not to say cowardice, of men who fail to give utterance to their real opinions, or to act up to their true principles. It is notorious that votes are given under pressure, which is as degrading and as inconsistent with the spirit of a free Parliament as the dictation of an old borough-monger to his nominee. True liberty consists in checking the immediate ascendancy of any class or any authority; and it may come to pass that arbitrary power is more to be apprehended from those who usurp the influence of the democracy and claim a monopoly of Liberal opinions than from any acts of the Executive Government or from the resistance of any institution in the country." The Edinburgh seems to us to represent a timid and discredited aristocratic faction rather than the great Liberal principles which are to control the future policy of the British Empire.

The Quarterly Review has more literary interest than its rival, and we do not lose our equanimity in reading the accustomed diatribe against the Liberal party in the article entitled "The Paralysis of Government." We are told that Mr. Gladstone and his followers made it impossible for Lord Beaconsfield to govern; but the writer does not add that this was only because Lord Beaconsfield's imperial policy was discredited in the eyes of the whole country. In the following formidable indictment he omits also to notice that every difficulty which Mr. Gladstone and his followers are striving to cope with was a legacy of evil from their immediate predecessor. "Every unfair device which they employed to impede and discredit the last Administration is now working, with an implacable force like that of fate, to their own destruction. Hour by hour retribution has dogged their steps. The very means by which they climbed to power will produce their downfall. The Eastern Question, the Irish Question, the question of providing a sufficient supply of popular legislation—all these were recklessly played upon by Mr. Gladstone for the purpose of overthrowing a Conservative Government; and each one of them has since started up in his own path with an aspect more appalling than in his wildest words he ever gave to it. In two years all law and order have been trampled under foot, class enmities envenomed, the rights of property overtaxed, a country entering within the very shadow of civil war, and a vast Empire threatened with disruption." We turn with more interest, however, from this, the last, to the first article, on "The Fall of the Monarchy of Charles the First," in which the reviewer says that Mr. Gardiner, in his recent most valuable history, has shown "that the history of our country can be made interesting and attractive, although the narrative be neither inflamed by the heat of party spirit nor forced upon the attention of the reader by epigrammatic brilliancy or the stimulus of dogmatic assertion." The delightful article on "Natural Scenery" is a brilliant review of the growth of the higher appreciation of poetry and art, as well as of the estimation of the glories and beauties of natural scenery, dating especially from the time of the poet Gray, a hundred and fifty years ago. The writer of the article on "Mr. Matthew Arnold on Wordsworth and Byron" enters the lists courageously against the foremost literary critic of our age. He maintains that the selections from Byron—which Mr. Arnold gives in his recent volume—do that poet an injustice as contrasted with the selections he has made in a companion volume from Wordsworth. The best poems of the latter are, as the reviewer says, short, and can without difficulty be presented in a volume of selections, while the best of Byron are of considerable length; and if selections from Byron are to be made, his best poems must be mutilated for the purpose. The reviewer is by no means satisfied with the selections which Mr. Arnold has made even from Wordsworth, and he justly adds that, "To do Byron anything like justice we require several volumes of the size of that Mr. Arnold devotes to him—we require, in fact, most of what he wrote. To do Wordsworth justice, we require a volume less than half the size of what Mr. Arnold gives us; we require, in fact, to suppress at least three-fourths of what he wrote." Other articles which will greatly interest the general reader, from their copious store of anecdote and literary allusion, are the reviews of "Mrs. Fanny Kemble's Records of her Life," and Mr. Mozley's "Oxford Reminiscences."

Literary Notes.

MR. MONCURE D. CONWAY is engaged upon a work describing the South Kensington Museum, which will be abundantly illustrated.

MR. R. H. SHEPHEARD has in preparation "The Life, Letters, and Uncollected Writings, in Prose and Verse, of W. Makepeace Thackeray." It may be remembered Thackeray did not wish any biography of himself to be published.

THE Academy says that Lord Chief Justice Coleridge has been kind enough to let Dr. Alois Brandt have access, for his new work on Coleridge, to all the letters of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey addressed to the late Sir John Coleridge. The Coleridge letters cover nearly the whole of the poet's career, and begin with the appeal to buy his discharge from the army.

WE learn from the Critic that the authorised edition of Garfield's papers, including his speeches, legal arguments, and literary essays, will be published in two volumes next November by Messrs. Osgood, of Boston. The editor is President Hinsdale.

A MOVEMENT is on foot in Aberdeen for the erection of an Art Gallery Museum in that city. Nearly £11,000 has been subscribed, and among the contributors is the Queen.

WE are glad to see that the Sunday School Association is reprinting in separate form Miss Swaine's "Remarkable Women as Examples for Girls," which appeared a year or two ago in Teachers' Notes.

THE question of the authorship of the once famous book, "The Whole Duty of Man," has long been a bibliographical crux. Mr. Edward Solly has investigated the question in an elaborate article, which appears in the August number of the Bibliographer, and his opinion is adverse to the claims of Lady Pakington. He describes the first edition published in 1658, or one year earlier than the edition which Lowndes erroneously supposed to be the first.

IT has long been known that in out-of-the-way parts of Germany traces might be found of our Saxon ancestors, but the instances usually given have been somewhat vague. Dr. Frederik H. Brandes, of Göttingen, has, however, contributed to the Antiquary an article, which appears in the August part, in which he specifies a particular district, near the old Prussian fortress of Minden, where distinct traces still exist. The author gives a curious list of English words used there, among which is Yea in place of Ja or Jo.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO. Homœopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

"NATURAL RELIGION."

The Athenæum writes:—

If it be the function of genius to interpret the age to itself, this is a work of genius. It gives articulate expression to the higher strivings of the time. It puts plainly the problem of these latter days, and so far contributes to its solution; a positive solution it scarcely claims to supply. No such important contribution to the question of the time has been published in England since the appearance, in 1866, of "Ecce Homo." That the same man should have written both books, that none but himself can be his parallel, argues a unique order of mind. He is a teacher whose words it is well to listen to. His words are wise but sad: it has not been given him to fire them with faith, but only to light them with reason. His readers may at least thank him for the intellectual illumination, if they cannot owe him gratitude for any added fervour.

The object of this book, one might say with logical precision, is to extend the connotation of the term "religion." It groups together all the great idealisms—art, science, culture—and claims that these are natural religion. Thus, according to this author, everything that takes us beyond and above our selfish aims is religion. The opposition between science and theology becomes vain and of no effect: both are forms of religion. The indifference of art for the conventions is but another form of the struggle against worldliness, and here again art and religion join hands. "Wer Wissenschaft und Kunst besitzt," said Goethe, and our author repeats the saying with approval, "hat auch Religion." Professor Huxley and Mr. Burne Jones will be somewhat surprised to find themselves regarded as great lights in the religious world. The old triad of ideals, the good, the true, and the beautiful, are classed by this observer under the one genus of religion.

Turning to the practical side of the book, we have the demand that the Church should learn the error of her ways in not recognising her two companions in the struggle against the lower life, and should renounce the parts of her doctrine that conflict with their ideals. The idea of development must be applied to religion as to everything else, and the conception of prophecy be revived in the modern form of a philosophy of history. Let the cultured classes teach culture, which is religion to the lower classes, who will otherwise lapse into Nihilism; and let the cultured nations of Christendom spread the light of religion till one great bond of civilisation span the earth. Above all, if we wish to master the art of life, let us study the experiments that have been made by time in the field of history and learn the lessons of "philosophy teaching by example." Such, in main outline, are the theorems and problems of this brilliant book. The boldness of the eviremon cannot but strike every reader; but the age is bold in these matters, and this quality is only another mark of the time-liness of the book.

MR. RUSKIN'S WORKS.

The Echo writes:—

An intelligent foreigner acquainted with contemporary English literature would be somewhat surprised to find that the works of the greatest living master of English prose are scarcely ever exposed for sale in the booksellers' shops, and there are many intelligent Englishmen who would be unable to explain the reason. There have been great changes in the publishing trade within the last twenty years. Even poets, the most conservative class of authors, have been to some extent affected by the democratic wave; one can now buy the Laureate's works complete for less than the price of the volume of collected poems of an earlier date than "In Memoriam." But Mr. Ruskin remains unaffected by the movement; he seems to study dearth and obscurity. We firmly believe that even to the vast majority of the English middle class he is little more than a great name. They know that occasionally a copy of "Modern Painters" is sold at from £25 to £40, and they occasionally read a magazine article by its author, but it is rarely that Mr. Ruskin's volumes appear upon their bookshelves. It is not so much the high prices that act as a deterrent as the studied obscurity. Nine men out of ten buy the goods that are well advertised and well displayed. For reasons which are satisfactory to himself, Mr. Ruskin some years ago determined that his works should not be advertised or displayed at all, and such books as he chooses to allow the public to buy are to be had direct from Mr. G. Allen, of Orpington, a village some twenty miles from London. The booksellers, having no pecuniary advantage to gain from the sale of Mr. Ruskin's works, do not exhibit them, and only enthusiastic disciples of the great art critic know where to obtain them. The obvious result is that, to the great crowd of English worshippers in the Temple of Fame Mr. Ruskin is "an unknown god." Whatever Mr. Ruskin may think of the matter, this is a deplorable fact. Such studied obscurity is a wrong to the world at large. It is bad enough that the author of "Modern Painters" should have expressed his unalterable resolution not to republish it, on the insufficient grounds that some parts of it have been rendered unnecessary by the established fame of Turner, while others have been always useless in their praise of excellence which the public will never give the labour necessary to discern. There is some consolation in the fact that many of the finest passages in "Modern Painters" have been collected by a lady friend of the author, and re-published in a small volume entitled "Fronde Agrestes." Considering the trouble which Mr. Ruskin takes to keep his works out of sight, it is somewhat surprising that this little book has run through five editions in less than ten years. The selections have been made with admirable judgment, and with the approval of the author, who, however, freely criticises his own earlier work in the foot-notes. A copy well bound in roan costs but four shillings. It is a pity that Mr. Ruskin has not seen fit to publish his other works at an equally reasonable price, for beyond all question he is the dearest of English living authors. It appears from Mr. George Allen's catalogue, that if anyone wishes to obtain a complete copy of the works which Mr. Ruskin now offers to the public, he will have to pay £19 19s. 8d. net. But this is the cheapest form in which the works can be obtained, the volumes being in paper boards and the pamphlets unbound. If the purchaser wishes to use the books and not merely to set them upon shelves to be looked at, it is necessary that he shall order them bound in roan, calf, or leather, which will involve an expenditure of five or six pounds more. "Fors Clavigera" is the greatest curiosity of all. As everyone knows, this is the title of a series of letters to the labourers and workmen of England. They are published in numbers at sevenpence and twopence each, but if any labourer or workman wishes to read all the advice which Mr. Ruskin offers to his class, he must expend three pounds five shillings and twopence in eighty-nine unbound pamphlets.

THEOLOGICAL PROSECUTIONS.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—

The Recorder, addressing the grand jury on the charge of blasphemy against Mr. Bradlaugh, is reported to have appealed to their feelings as "Christian men" to say whether the incriminated writings could be anything but blasphemous. There is certainly prejudice enough in the case already without any being imported into it from the bench, and if Sir Thomas Chambers were a judge whose example was likely to be imitated this sort of address might do infinite harm. The next thing might be a judicial harangue addressed to the jury as Churchmen. Fortunately, the evil example will not extend beyond the walls of the Old Bailey, and fortunately also the cases in question have already been removed by certiorari to another and, we may hope, more equitable tribunal.

CONGREGATIONALISM IN AMERICA.

The Rev. E. Paxton Hood, a well-known English Congregationalist minister, in an article contributed to the Christian World this week, gives the following interesting account of Congregationalism in the United States, from which he has recently returned:—

I never had so strongly borne in on my mind the difference, in the ancient and early history of the States, between Pilgrim and Puritan—otherwise Independent and Congregationalist—as when rambling among the homes and haunts of the early settlers in Plymouth and Salem. Those who in England only know Congregationalism through its English type will quite fail to understand the old Congregationalism of the States—in fact, it became the established religion of the New England States, and even still it holds and derives many of its sanctions from legal decision and prescription. Congre-gationalism in the United States, or certainly in the New England States, is so complex a thing that it needs volumes of Ecclesiastical law to be written to expound and to define its limitations; I could give many interesting illustrations of this—for instance, What is a Parish? The designation has quite a different meaning in the New England States from that we attach to it in Europe, while its ancient meaning, and its popular use with us, is a territorial precinct, and, in modern use, in America, the idea of a religious society, or congregation, supersedes all the older definitions; it has been laid down in law that "never in Massachusetts had a church any legal existence apart from a parish." But in the old construction parish consisted not of those who attended as hearers, or members of the congregation, nor of those who were in the fellowship of faith and had received the sign of unity and communion. A parish consisted of those who had a property qualification in connection with the building; hence it has been ruled in law that Congregationalism is not a religious, but an ecclesiastical doctrine; "that ecclesiastical councils," as Buck, a prime legal authority, remarks in his "Massachusetts Ecclesiastical Law," are the life and soul of Congregationalism." In the Boston Review is a paper "which distinguishes the Congregationalists from the Independents on the ground of the mutual Christian fellowship afforded by councils to which the Congregational churches are addicted." Thus it has been very easy to merge, and New England ministers made very little resistance to the process of merging, Congregationalism into Presbyterianism; and thus the monetary claim and standing of the parish has, in many instances, made it easy to transfer the Congregational Church to the Congregational Unitarian Society, and this is exactly the case in the curious history of the old Congregational Church which met in Long-lane, in Boston; in 1735 this church endeavoured to place itself beneath "the fostering care and discipline of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland;" the terms of the trust-deed are "that the tenures are to be held after the same manner as the Church of Scotland doth enjoy land." In 1805 this society was incorporated in the Congregational Unitarian Society, and received the decision of the Supreme Court in 1854, the court ruling that "the words of the trust did not refer to religious doctrines, but to the tenure by which land is held." The Presbyterians removed, by this sanction, from Long-lane to Federal-street; over this society the beloved and revered Unitarian, Dr. Channing, was so long the minister, and now this ancient Congregational or Presbyterian church is that in Arlington-street, one of the most distinguished sites and edifices in Boston. Thus while Puritan and pilgrim have long since mingled, I felt that, in their originals, there was considerable difference. The pilgrim seems to me to have resembled most the Huguenot before Calvin, the Christian before the Council of Nice. The Puritan gave definitions of faith, and sometimes confounded the faith in its definitions. There may be safety in definitions, but at best they only catch us as we are falling—there is safety in definitions, but there is danger when men attempt to make words carry too much, as when they attempt to define the inconceivable, and to put limitations on the infinite; simple minds do not define so promptly as they act; it has been too much the case that schoolmen and logicians have first defined, and then called on Scripture to furnish the proofs. However, it is notably the case that Pilgrim and Puritan realised in an eminent degree the functions of the Church in history; they sought to tear and rend off the false fig leaves of ecclesiastical finery; they sought to purify the world at a time of which it has been said the Church was like a noble house ruined by bad drainage; and perpetually, as I went through the New England States, I felt of Puritan and Pilgrim alike,

They have left behind

Powers that will work for them—air, earth, and skies;

There's not a breathing of the common wind
That will forget them; they have great allies;
Their friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind.

Talking of the Puritans has reminded me of Salem, and Salem has reminded me of Lynn, the City of Shoemakers. Few of the places I visited in the States have left on my mind a more pleasant impression than the city of Lynn, in Massachusetts, and its immediate neighbourhood. Its population is about forty thousand; it is more than the Northampton of the United States; not fewer than be-between twenty and thirty thousand hands are employed in supplying the merchandise for hundreds of manufactories; probably fifteen millions of pairs of shoes are exported annually from this kingdom of leather; and innumerable citizens of the States trample the industry of Lynn beneath their feet without being aware that they are doing so. Whittier, the poet, resides only a distance of five miles from Lynn; he commenced life as a shoemaker, probably, in Lynn. Certainly Alonzo Lewis, in his most entertaining history of the Shoemaker's City, says of him, that "he left the manufacture for ladies' feet to make verses for their boudoirs." This accounts, in some degree, for the enthusiasm with which he sings of the shoemaker's craft—

Rap, rap! upon the well-worn stone,
How falls the polished hammer!
Rap, rap! the measured sound has grown
A quick and merry clamour.
Now shape the sole, now deftly curl
The glossy vamp around it,
And bless the while the bright-eyed girl
Whose gentle fingers bound it!

But Lynn, the city of shoemakers, has a quite distinguished place among the homes and haunts of genius in America; and no wonder, for the scenery of its shores mingles in an eminent degree the sublime and the beautiful. A singular isthmus of about two or three miles brings the traveller to the charming and quaint old village of Nahant, where Longfellow wrote a large portion of his delightful Indian poem of Hiawatha, and other pieces. There Motley retired to spend his hours in studying the plot of his great works on the Revolt of the Netherlands and the Dutch Republic; there Agassiz explored the mysterious and contemplated the beautiful in Nature; there, in the neighbourhood of a majestic solitude called Swallows Cave, Prescott laboured the stately pages of Ferdinand and Isabella; while, in Lynn itself, in a house off Ocean-street, fronting the sea—a house which now forms a part of Prescott-street—the great historian wrote his "Conquest of Mexico and Peru," and his later historical pieces; beyond, half hidden by a clump of trees, stands the home of Ik Marvel, the author of the "Reveries," and the graphic piece of domestic New England painting, his solitary novel "Dr. Johns." That Lynn should have become such a retreat for genius is not surprising, for I know few spots on our English coast where Nature has been so lavish of her most imposing and impressive scenes. While the broad Atlantic stretches out its illimitable horizon, a few miles distant rises the Egg Rock, swelling from the midst of the sea, like our Bass rock or Ailsea Crag—it rises abruptly from the sea, crowned with its lighthouse shedding along the coast through the dark night its friendly fires. Thus this City of Shoemakers is a perfect region of romantic loveliness;—there are craggy cliffs and caves which overhang the shores, hills of porphyry, woodland lakes, groves perpetually haunted by the songs of the whip-poor-will, and full of legends of the old forest kings and their vast tribes, "the feather-cinctured chiefs and dusky loves,"—here, when the first settlers came, in 1629, the light birchen canoes of the red men were seen gracefully skimming the surface of the bright blue ocean; where now stands the town were forests of aged trees, which had never been disturbed but by the storms of centuries; amidst them, or on the adjacent crags, the eagles built their nests, and the wild cat, the bear, the fox and the wolf prowled beneath their branches. The first shoemaker who settled here was Philip Kirtland. He came here from Sherrington, in Buckinghamshire, in 1635; and while he laid the foundation of that mighty guild of labour which gives its importance to the city, his name and family are associated with some of the most distinguished and honourable men of the States. Lynn is only six miles from the celebrated city of Salem, which, as we have seen, shares with Plymouth the honour of being the seat of the earliest settlers in New England, and which was also the immediate parent of Boston. Salem, the birthplace and home and study of Nathaniel Hawthorne,—there was the scenery of the "Scarlet Letter" and the "The House of the Seven Gables;" and as I walked through that lovely city I found it difficult to realise that a spot which seemed so well to deserve its name could ever have been the scene of tragedies so terrible as those of the awful persecutions of the witches. Frequently as the pen of genius and of poetry has been employed in attempting to describe that period of fierce fanaticism, I realised it all far more distinctly as, by the aid of Upham's singularly able history—a book which ought to find its way by reprint to this country—I found myself living over again the horrors of that grimly superstitious time; I penetrated all the secret crannies of the old witch-house where the examinations took place; I held in my hand the examination of poor Rebecca Nurse, and saw the magical pins said to be thrust by the witches into the bodies of their victims; these are still preserved in the Court House; and perhaps I felt something of the horror of that moment when five poor, haggard, despairing white-faced women mounted the cart, surrounded by a score of men armed to the teeth, who were leading them forth to die as martyrs to the wild fanaticism of a fixed idea.

KINGSWOOD CHAPEL, BIRMINGHAM

The Dart, a local Church and Conservative organ, gives the following pleasant account of a visit to this ancient chapel, and the services of its venerable minister:—

If you look in the directory for Kingswood it is ten to one you will not find it, we mean the Kingswood where the historical Unitarian chapel is situated, which must not be confounded, as it sometimes is, with the Kingswood near Warwick. Very few Birmingham people know this chapel, although it is occasionally attended by some of our most distinguished citizens. It was purposely situated in an out of the way place at the time of the Church and King Riots, when Unitarians were at the bottom instead of the top of Fortune's wheel, and when to belong to that sect was to be liable to hootings and other distasteful treatment. The rioters burnt the meeting house, so the meeting-house people withdrew to Kingswood and worshipped there.

But although the chapel is known to few, the Pack Horse Inn on the Alcester-road (which is a continuation of the Moseley-road) is known to those who drive out in traps, to the thirsty cyclist, and to the pedestrian who does not belong to the Blue Ribbon Army.

It is about six miles from Birmingham, and he who at that spot draws bridle, puts on his brake, or stays his dusty steps, may see, a hundred yards or so along a lane which turns off to the right, an evident place of worship. That is Kingswood Chapel, and if he should get there after the service has commenced he will probably see a carriage or two, belonging to members of the congregation, put up at the inn. No spot could be more delightful to come to, as a change from the hurry and bustle of town life. It is quiet on week-days, and on Sundays none of the church-going bustle and bell-ringing that characterise the town. We don't wonder that eminences, municipal and political, sometimes go to Kingswood. It must be a soothing and a restful thing after Cabinet criticisms and Watch Committee worries, to come to this quiet tabernacle among the fields and forget them, to join in its simple service, and to listen to the wise words of its aged pastor. If we kept a trap we should go to Kingswood sometimes ourselves.

The chapel, which is of a plain quadrangular shape, with a chancel which has been added in recent years, stands in a little churchyard, where lie the remains of two Mayors of Birmingham—Thomas Weston and James Baldwin—both eminent men in their way, and where we noticed, also, a plain gravestone marking the resting place of Joseph Henry Nettlefold, who passed away from his busy labours the other day, at the early age of fifty-four. Thomas Weston was the chosen companion of Prince Albert when he visited Birmingham in 1849, to see the manufactories, and to inaugurate the Exhibition at Bingley House, which was the forerunner of that of 1851. To see the plain marble obelisk which bears the name of James Baldwin, already weather-marked, is to feel that we are getting old. How often had we seen his jolly face at Town Hall meetings, and heard him tell of "when he was a boy." He used to pronounce it without the "o," and always had the popular ear, for he had come to Birmingham with the proverbial half-crown in his pocket, and had done well with it. We remember on one occasion he compared the existing Conservative Government to a nice young woman—it wanted squeezing. If the Radicals "squeeze" the Government they would get what they wanted in time. This illustration was received with the "roars of laughter" which are such a relief to a political meeting, and which seem so absurd afterwards.

Entering the chapel we observe signs of recent alterations and improvement. The chancel is evidently new, a modern roof with visible beams has been put on, and the box-like pew has given place to the more fashionable style of seat. About sixty of the hundred and fifty sittings are occupied, and the choir seats in the chancel, which face the congregation, are well filled, principally by young ladies, though there are one or two male voices. On the walls there are tablets to the memory of deceased persons. The organ is playing as we enter, and a gentleman in a gown is ascending the pulpit to the right of the chancel, with the heavy step of age. He is a massive man of the old style, whose hair was doubtless called golden by his mother when he was a four-year-old boy, eighty years ago now. The tint of it has scarcely altered. In the pure atmosphere of Kingswood, and among those quiet fields, it seems almost possible to postpone change and dissolution indefinitely.

The old gentleman looks out from under his shaggy eyebrows and "gives out" a hymn, which is very fairly sung, and proceeds to conduct the usual simple Nonconformist service. He has a very curious way of slurring some of the syllables, and pronouncing some compound words so rapidly that you have to get used to his utterance before you quite follow him. In the prayer he was impressive, for the perception of age begins to recognise the proportions of things and give them their respective places. Many of his phrases were taken from the liturgy of the Church; perhaps he had found out that nothing better in the way of prayers could be formulated.

Many old parsons died years ago, practically speaking, though they still go on preaching. Their mental vitality, like John Brown's knapsack, "lies a mouldering in the grave," but their voices go preaching on.

The minister at Kingswood is evidently not to be classed in this category. His sermon-making force, if not unabated, is alive. He gave us a vigorous disquisition on the words "Ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak," a disquisition which was marked by originality of thought and illustration. It came out incidentally in some announcements that he had been a preacher for thirty-five years, so that if "practice makes perfect" he ought to be able to preach. After the sermon it was quite pleasant to hear him join in the hymn with a still powerful bass. We wondered whether there were any building lots hereabout where we could build an unpretending dwelling when we relinquish pulling at the collar. Such a vigorous old age as that is enviable.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—From the report of the trustees of the British Museum for the year ending March 31, 1881, which has been recently issued as a Blue-book, we learn that the number of distinct works added to the department of printed books was 30,182, of which 2,526 were presented, 9,347 acquired by English and 810 by international copyright, and 17,499 by purchase. The titles for the catalogue of English books before 1640 have been finally reviewed, and are now being prepared for the press. The number of readers was 134,273, being a daily average of 455, who consulted about six volumes per diem each, exclusive of those in the reference library. Many important old books have been added. In the department of MSS. 690 have been acquired, and 31,197 MSS. consulted during the year; the number of special visitors was 2,071. The Oriental department added 112 MSS., and 1,515 MSS. were consulted by 201 readers during the year.

The rumour is confirmed by Herr Biedermann, in Westermann's Monatshefte, that several boxes have been found in the Royal library at Hanover containing the correspondence of Leibnitz with several learned men of his day, and also other interesting papers.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—Indisputable Remedies.—In the use of these medicaments there need be no hesitation or doubt of their cooling, healing, and purifying properties. Imagination can scarcely conceive the marvellous facility with which this Unguent relieves and heals the most inveterate sores and ulcers, and in cases of bad legs and bad breasts they act like a charm. The Pills are the most effectual remedy ever discovered for the cure of liver and stomach complaints, diseases most disastrous in their effects, deranging all the proper functions of the organs affected, inducing restlessness, melancholy, weariness, inability to sleep, and pain in the side, until the whole system is exhausted. Those wonderful Pills, if taken according to the printed directions accompanying each box, strike at the root of the malady, stimulate the stomach and liver into a healthy action, and effect a complete cure.

LITERARY DISHONESTY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—A few weeks ago the Inquirer contained a short notice of "The Design Argument Vindicated. A Lecture to Atheists. By George St. Clair, F.G.S." That "notice" called forth a bitter protest from Mr. St. Clair, who, however, did not seek to justify a remark in his lecture to which your reviewer drew attention—a remark which in effect falsified the opinion of John Stuart Mill upon the soundness of the so-called "Design" argument. Subsequently I read in Public Opinion (July 22) a review of the same lecture, in which the reviewer said, "The dictum of Professor Huxley, that every animal 'is the resultant of two forces, the one teleological, and the other morphological,' perhaps expresses the thoughts of many persons," &c. I could not but find my attention arrested by such an extraordinary "quotation" from Huxley, and I at once wrote to the editor of Public Opinion for chapter and verse. His reply was as follows:—"Huxley, T. H.—Lecture on the Principles of Zoology, published by Lords Commissioners of Education (South Kensington), 8vo., London, about 1870; probably at a penny, and now likely to be out of print. The reviewer quoted from his memo. of the lecture made at the time, and cannot give the page of the printed lecture. Very likely Professor Huxley himself might recollect it." Being familiar with Mr. Huxley's lecture "On the Study of Zoology," delivered in 1861, I knew no such statement as that cited occurred therein, hence to clear up the point I wrote to Professor Huxley himself, who replied, "Mr. Huxley is not aware that he has ever used the language attributed to him. The lecture on the study of Zoology published by the Department of Science and Art was delivered in 1861, and is to be found in Mr. Huxley's 'Lay Sermons,' p. 104. Mr. Huxley is unable to find any such 'dictum' as that cited in this lecture; and as he does not understand what a 'teleological force' may be, he ventures to doubt the correctness of the 'memo' said to have been made at the time." To say nothing of the blockheadedness of the reviewer in attributing so insane a statement to Professor Huxley, I cannot but marvel that writers for the press should commit such immoralities as that of "quoting" in turned commas opinions the very reverse of those held by the authors cited. It is often said that the moral law is unalterable, but it is to me a cheering thought that morality is explained by the new doctrine of evolution, and that as man progresses his ideas of right will advance. Bacon said:—"Revenge is a kind of wild justice," and it is not difficult to see that in certain stages of the history of the human race it must be the only justice. Mankind have well-nigh outgrown that stage, and I am looking forward to the time when writers will consider it a duty to seek to understand the authors they "quote," or at least to avoid misrepresenting their opinions.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—My attention has been called to an error, which perhaps you will have the kindness to correct, in the historical account of Dr. D. Williams's Trustees. The section contained in the Inquirer of July 8, states that I was minister at Eustace-street, Dublin, from 1822 to 1827. During those years, however, I was at York College. My Dublin ministry was from 1828 to 1832.

AGNOSTICISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It is the usual practice when statements cannot be controverted to misrepresent your opponent, and therefore Mr. Jeffery says I held up prayer "to contempt and derision." I did nothing of the kind. Mr. Jeffery contested Mr. Conway's ability "to conduct a service" in a Unitarian Chapel (Mr. Dalby did not use the expression a Unitarian service), and I pointed out prayer was not necessarily the most effective form of service, and that aspiration and meditation might be more beneficial. Mr. Jeffery has the class of mind too prevalent in the Unitarian body, that can bear with any amount of superstition, but cannot offer any sympathy with those who have less belief in the miraculous than himself. He reminds me of the man who could never see any beauty in a picture, however well painted, unless the frame was exactly to his liking. All religious services must have for Mr. Jeffery a Christian frame, or he would desire they should never be heard of. He evidently rejoices in the text without the context. "If any man obey not our word, note that man and have no company with him."

"O brother man, fold to thy heart thy brother,
Where pity dwells, the peace of God is there.
To worship rightly, is to love each other,
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer."

AN AGNOSTIC.

[This discussion is getting a little too personal, and if it is to be continued it must be limited to the principles at issue.—ED. of Inq.]

MR. HERBERT SPENCER will sail for the United States next week.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. Two blind children, a boy and girl, who had won the Gardner's Trust Scholarship, were introduced and congratulated by the Chairman. Prizes were also awarded to fourteen girls for their proficiency in animal physiology. The prizes were the gift of the National Health Society, and consisted of sums of money. A proposition by Miss Taylor as to the remission of fees was discussed, and was eventually got rid of by means of the previous question. An inspector in drawing was appointed for one year at a salary of £200 per annum. The Board adjourned till October 12 next.

METROPOLITAN HOSPITAL SUNDAY FUND.—On Wednesday a meeting of the Council of this fund was held at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor presiding. The report of the Committee of Distribution to the Council was as follows:—"Your committee have the honour to submit their report of the several awards they recommend for payment this year to 145 institutions, enumerated in the appendix, showing an increase of five since last year, and of forty since the establishment of this fund in 1873. By Law XII., as amended, 4 per cent. of the total amount of collections, namely, £1,380, is ordered to be set aside this year for the purchase of surgical appliances. The cash received to July 18 amounts to £34,424 12s. 2d. After payment of the above sum of £1,380, allowing sufficiently for liabilities and for the usual current expenses, the amount available for distribution is £32,415 13s. 9d. £28,446 15s. is now recommended to 93 hospitals, including four institutions which may be classed as hospitals, and £2,588 8s. 9d. to 52 dispensaries. Your committee recommend that all payments to the fund after this date be carried to the credit of next year's fund. In compliance with the order of the Council, and for the special use of its members, tables have been prepared as usual, showing a statistical analysis of the number of beds in hospitals, the cost of patients both in hospitals and at dispensaries, the proportionate expenses of management, as well as other valuable information, and they are now sent to every member of the Council. Your committee have great satisfaction in reporting that the number of deputations invited to confer with them and to offer explanations on matters of apparently unsatisfactory character is gradually diminishing. Seven invitations were issued this year as compared with eleven in 1881; of this number three sent letters in reply, from two no answers were received, and two hospitals sent deputations. In one of these cases a considerable error in the preparation of the accounts was admitted, and a promise given that it should be corrected before the issue of another report. In the other your committee explained to the deputation that they had not thoroughly understood the operation of Law V., whereby the system of distribution of this fund is governed, and at the same time your committee hope that they removed from the minds of those gentlemen a false impression, that a small award necessarily casts an imputation on the management of an institution, the fact being that the grant is determined by the arithmetical basis obtained from a three years' average of the accounts of each institution."

WESTERN SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The second annual meeting was held at Gloucester on Thursday week, and the proceedings commenced at three o'clock in the afternoon with an open committee meeting, at which several matters of business were transacted relating to the Association.

At half-past three the Rev. George Knight was elected to preside over the annual meeting, and after a few introductory remarks, he called upon the Rev. John Birks, secretary and treasurer, to read the report and financial statement for the year.

The report recorded improvement in the number and condition of the schools in the West of England. At the same time it was to be regretted that several schools were lamentably small, and some important places had no school at all. It was to be hoped that such as were numerically weak would become stronger, and that no congregation would remain much longer without having a Sunday-school. Several schools had joined the association during the year, Bridport, Cirencester, and Gloucester. The association had become affiliated to the Sunday School Association, London, and was represented at the Whitsuntide gathering by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford and the Rev. John Birks. A communication from the secretary of the London Association respecting "Teachers' Notes" would be laid before the meeting for consideration. In conclusion, attention was called:—

1. To the importance of proper school premises, and sufficient class room accommodation, wherever possible. The friends at Bath had set a good example in this matter.
2. Suitable class books and Sunday-school literature.

3. Organisation and discipline.

The Association would rejoice to have the means of rendering efficient aid in these and other directions among the schools in the West of England.

The financial statement was satisfactory, the income being three times as much as the first year, with balance in hand of £2 12s. 5d.

The following resolutions were passed:—

1. "That the report and financial statement be received and adopted for printing and circulation."
2. "That the Rev. George Knight, of Gloucester, be President for the year."
3. "That the Rev. John Birks, of Taunton, be Secretary and Treasurer."
4. "That the following be the Committee for the current year: the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, Mr. W. Butcher, Bristol; Mr. W. Combs, Bridgwater; the Rev. W. Robinson, Crewkerne; the Rev. H. Austin, Mrs. Austin, Cirencester; the Rev. J. Davies, Mr. Male, Miss Wansey, Bridport; Miss Ashley; Messrs. W. [H. Knight, A. J. Goode, Gloucester; the Rev. W. Birks, Miss Gresswell, Stroud; Mr. W. G. Cole, Taunton; the Rev. J. Felstead, Trowbridge; the Rev. A. M. Holden, Mr. M. B. Baker, Ilminster."

A paper on Sunday-schools was read by Mr. W. H. KNIGHT, of Gloucester, and an interesting discussion followed, in which the CHAIRMAN, the SECRETARY, the Revs. W. BIRKS, H. AUSTIN, W. R. SMYTHE, Messrs. W. H. KNIGHT, A. J. GOODE, J. COOKE, and others took part, all expressing pleasure and satisfaction with the paper, and a strong desire that it should be printed for wide circulation.

At the conclusion of the Conference the Rev. W. BIRKS proposed, and the Rev. A. AUSTIN seconded, "That the best thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. W. H. Knight for his excellent paper, and that it be printed with the report, or separately, for general circulation."

The resolution was passed with acclamation. A vote of thanks was heartily accorded to the Chairman and the Gloucester congregation for receiving the Association on the occasion of its second annual meeting.

OPEN AIR MISSION IN LANCASHIRE.

At the Quarterly Conference of the North-east Lancashire Free Congregational and Sunday-school Union, held at Colne on the 17th of June last, the Rev. A. LAZENBY introduced the question of an open air mission; and it was decided to hold special services in connection with the congregations in the Union, the series to conclude with Sunday meetings at Burnley. Twenty-one hymns were selected and printed for use at these services, which were announced by small handbills distributed in each town. Altogether ten week-evening meetings were held, in which all the ministers in the Union took part, and, at the close of most of them a large number of tracts was distributed. At the first service held at Colne there would be upwards of 200 present; at Darwen not less than 500 would be within hearing of the speakers; at Newchurch about 300 were present; at Burnley about 450; at Rawtenstall about 350. Three meetings were held at Padiham, with an average attendance of about 300; and two at Accrington, with an attendance of about 400 at each meeting. Fortunately not a single service had to be put off on account of unfavourable weather, and on every occasion the attention of the people assembled was most marked. They joined heartily in the singing, and accepted the tracts with an evident desire to possess them.

These services received their crowning success at Burnley on Sunday last. In the afternoon, the weather being unfavourable, the meeting was held in the Unitarian church, and it was comfortably filled, largely with friends from the other congregations in the Union, who, in spite of the weather, walked over to Burnley in order to ensure the success of the services. Mr. Councillor BLEZARD presided, and the Revs. C. J. STREET, M.A.; J. HARRISON and T. LEYLAND gave addresses on the Positive Aspects of Unitarianism. After the service tea was served in the schoolroom to nearly 200 friends. Towards evening the clouds cleared away and the sun shone out brightly. At six o'clock the friends assembled on the market ground, and a large crowd of not less than a thousand persons gathered together. Mr. JOHN ASHWORTH, of Newchurch (President of the Union), presided. After the singing of a hymn the Rev. J. HARRISON engaged in prayer, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. C. J. STREET, H. HILL, H. B. SMITH, A. LAZENBY and T. LEYLAND. At the close of the meeting the friends formed in procession and walked up to the Unitarian church, singing hymns on the way, where from eight to nine o'clock a fellowship meeting was held. The Rev. T. LEYLAND presided, and, in short speeches, many of the earnest workers in the cause gave most affecting testimony to the saving and consoling power of the Unitarian faith. A special feature in most of these services was that many laymen took part in them either by giving addresses or announcing the hymns. These meetings, being for Unitarianism in this district, an entirely new departure, a few of the old and valued workers looked upon them with some diffidence, but the gatherings on Sunday were so thoroughly successful and inspiring that they felt compelled to recognise their benefits, and on all sides the desire was expressed that such services should become part of the regular work of the Union.

CONGLETON: LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A NEW CHAPEL.

Wednesday last was a day long wished for by our Congleton friends. The congregation was established by Mr. Moxon, an ejected minister, upon the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662. The chapel, which was built by his efforts, was demolished by a mob, and the chapel just pulled down was erected in its place in the year 1733. This also has just been pulled down, as many parts of it were decayed, and it had become unfit for use. About twenty years ago a new school was built, and worship has for some time been conducted therein. The foundation stone of a new chapel was laid by Mr. T. U. Brocklehurst, of Macclesfield, on Wednesday afternoon, at three o'clock. At that hour a large number of people were present, among whom we noticed the Revs. J. C. Williams (Newcastle), Iden Payne (Leeds), H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), J. Russell (Macclesfield), N. Green (Mottram), W. Mellor (Crewe), Joseph Freeston (Stalybridge), E. Turland (Mossley), Messrs. T. U. Brocklehurst, James Worthington, Albert Greg, John Phillips, T. G. Sheldon (Mayor of Congleton), John Cheer, George Pickford, George Statham, Councillor Barton, J. Brough, Edward Hollinshead, H. Burslam, John Worrall, and a large number of local friends. The new chapel is to be in the Gothic style, from drawings prepared by Mr. James Brown, of Congleton. It is to be lighted from each side, and to have a large tracery window in the south end to Cross-street. The external wall is to be built of stone from the Tegnose quarry, near Macclesfield, set in random courses with stone dressings. The interior dimensions are to be 51ft. by 32ft. and 20ft. high, with an open roof. The fittings are to be of pitch pine. The seats are open stalls, and with a gallery at the south end will accommodate about three hundred persons. The cost will be about £1,250, including gas fittings and heating apparatus. The contractors are Mr. John Worrall, of Congleton (whose father has worshipped at the old chapel nearly seventy years), for the brick work and wood work, &c., and Mr. Randle Burslam, of Congleton, for the stone work.

The Rev. IDEN PAYNE gave out the hymn. "This stone to thee in faith we lay," which having been sung, a most appropriate prayer was offered by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, after which

Mr. E. HOLLINSHEAD said:—Ladies and gentlemen, before we proceed to the ceremony I have been requested to report briefly the position of our affairs at the present time. The necessity of having to make extensive alterations in the old chapel became apparent some years ago, but it was not until last year that the actually unsafe condition of the old building rendered it impossible to delay the improvements any longer. A committee was therefore appointed, and to them there appeared two courses open, one to alter the old chapel so as to meet our requirements, the other, to pull the old building down and erect a new one. The report of the surveyor who was appointed to inspect the old chapel disposed altogether of the first course, for it was found that the cost of the necessary alterations would amount to over £500, with a reminder that it might cost more, owing to the fact that we should be interfering with an old building, and when once we commenced altering we should not know where we might end. It was, therefore, decided to erect a new church on the site of the old one—(hear, hear)—and plans were accordingly drawn. I may mention here that the original plan provided the entrance to the church from the street, but it has now been settled to have the doorway in the yard, and to build the foundations right up to the street. In this way we obtain further room. The money had now to be provided. The total cost of the building with all expenses will be about £1,200. It was thought that the congregation would be able to raise £400, but I am glad to say that not only has this sum been raised, but a considerable amount more, and we have therefore guaranteed to raise an additional £200—(applause.) The bazaar which we held in the Town Hall last May was in our small way a success, and as the proceeds derived from that occasion have not as yet been definitely announced, I take this opportunity of saying that the total receipts come to £80—(applause). For the remainder of the money we looked to our friends, and it is with pleasure than one can say that up to the present they have been most generous. The total amount at present paid and promised is £770. Of this the congregation has raised £500, which includes a subscription of £70 from the Rev. J. Brierley of this town, who formerly conducted services for us. When Mr. Pickford and I waited upon Mr. Brocklehurst to obtain his consent to lay the foundation stone, one of the first questions he asked us was whether we were building "on faith." We could not then give a wholly satisfactory answer, as there was some little amount of faith required to believe that we should be able to raise our chapel free from debt; but it is with great pleasure that I am enabled to state that Mr. Brocklehurst has strengthened our faith and increased our substance by a very generous subscription of £50—(applause). We have still £400 to raise; let us then work with all our might, with one heart and with one mind, and I have no doubt that when our church is opened in the spring it will be free from debt—(applause).

Mr. Councillor BARTON then, on behalf of the Building Committee, presented to Mr. Brocklehurst a very handsome silver trowel, and read the inscription as follows:—"Presented to T. U. Brocklehurst, Esq., on the occasion of his laying the foundation stone of the Unitarian New Church, Congleton, 2nd August, 1882."

The stone having been laid, Mr. BROCKLEHURST said he sincerely hoped it was well and truly laid, and remarked that he believed that he was indebted to the honour of being asked to perform the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of their new chapel to the fact that he came from an old Presbyterian family. A member of his family seceded from the Church of England in the year 1662, and in the year 1667 old Mr. Brocklehurst built the chapel in Macclesfield in which they at present worshipped. He desired, therefore, to congratulate them on the occasion of laying the stone of a new chapel. He was not informed as to the antecedents of their old chapel, but he hoped some one would be able to give them some knowledge. The connecting link between the old and the new should be retained, and if some memorial showing it were erected he should be glad to contribute—(applause). It appeared to him that in these days men sought to worship God by building ornate churches, and giving to Him lip service. But good as nice churches were, he thought holy and pure lives would be more acceptable to Him, and he trusted it would be their intention to use their new chapel to build up good and pure living. It was a great pleasure to him after an absence of three years from England to come to Congleton to lay the foundation stone of that new chapel, and he trusted the committee would not allow it to be opened in debt. Nothing hampered a minister or a congregation in their work more than the burden of a heavy debt. He was proud to see so many friends present to testify by their good will towards that effort, and he trusted the young people present would keep up their interest in the new chapel, and be able to tell the tale of that day's proceedings to the generations that would succeed them—(applause).

Mr. GEORGE PICKFORD then proposed, and Mr. WM. WORRALL seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Brocklehurst for the part he had taken in their proceedings. This was carried with acclamation, and Mr. BROCKLEHURST briefly returned thanks, after which Mr. ALBERT GREG, on his own behalf and that of Mr. Worthington, expressed the feeling of interest they had in the ceremony that had just been performed, and urged that for sincerity in life it was needful that they should have freedom of worship.

The Rev. J. C. WILLIAMS then gave out a hymn, and the Rev. J. FREESTONE closed the stone-laying proceedings by prayer.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the school-room, when appropriate addresses were delivered by the above-named ministers and others.

The Liberal Pulpit.

EMERSON'S GOSPEL.

THE RELIGION OF NATURE.

[The following discourse was delivered in All Souls Church, New York, on Sunday, May 28, 1882, by the Rev. R. Heber Newton.]

The first of preachers our generation has known was Ralph Waldo Emerson. He left the pulpit behind him, but carried his sermons with him. He simply exchanged the church for the lecture-hall and the publisher's house, where he found a wider range of topics and a freer method of handling them. He answered an urgent solicitation to settle over a church where he temporarily supplied after giving up his own pastorate, "My pulpit is the lyceum platform." It was a portable pulpit to him. He did not lecture to amuse or please or even instruct his hearers. He never sought merely to mint his brilliant phrases into golden coin. On every theme, to every audience, he has preached by tongue or pen, seeking to rouse, inspire, and ennoble men. He could say, with Wesley, "My parish is the world."

Poet, philosopher, and saint, such a preacher certainly had a message for his age, some glad tidings of great joy. That gospel, like all other real gospels, is not to be read off-hand. The exhilarating tones of the clarion-call we hear full well, the articulate utterance we must study carefully. I am sure that the dear old soul in East Lexington did not speak without a meaning when she explained her church's reluctance to call a minister, after having had him as "stated supply": "We are a very simple people, and can understand no one but Mr. Emerson." That she habitually understood him, I somewhat question. But that deep and blessed thoughts were awakened and high and holy emotions were stirred in her, that she felt out of this man influences streaming, full of cleansing and comforting power, I am perfectly sure; and so she thought she understood him. Well when poorer preachers are thus understood!

It seems a forlorn hope to extricate any definite beliefs from the brilliant phantasmagoria of Emerson's pages. His vagueness, his love of paradox, his lack of logic, his self-contradictoriness, are proverbial. We should not wonder much if the Egyptian sphinx had verily opened her lips after forty centuries of silence to say to the strange man standing before her, "You're another." But the attempt is not so hopeless as it seems. Most of his dark sayings have the key hanging by the door. He spake in parables, as Browning and other great poets have done up to the divine poet of Galilee, to turn away the unready and pique the hungry souls to keener relish, saying, "He that hath ears to ear let him hear." His contradictoriness grows out of his inveterate habit of climbing round a truth and looking at it from every side. The moods of nature passed into his mind, and a spiritual truth was no more the same to him on different days or in different hours of one day than the face of Monadnock was the same from sunrise to sunset through the changeful play of the light.

"Yonder ragged cliff,
Has thousand faces in a thousand hours."

Yet have rock and man alike a persistent identity. Illogical he certainly was, according to the cut-and-dried patterns of our Art of Logic, with its quaint forms and conventional methods. Mr. Alcott once said that his essay read as if he had written separately the detached sentences of which it was composed, and thrown them into a hat, and then pulled them out haphazard, stringing them together as they came, which was very much the actual fact of his literary method, if method it could be called. My honoured friend, Miss Peabody, told me that he once read a printed essay to her, referring to his common-place book for the sources of the sentences, which it has been his habit to write therein as they came to him; and thus one sentence bore date of 1847, in England, and the next of 1860, in Concord. Yet these kaleidoscopic paragraphs arrange themselves by law in fixed figures. A few commanding ideas group these brilliant combinations. There is a logic of thought, though not of form. If then, undeterred by the difficulties of our quest, we search these hieroglyphs, we need not wholly miss a real message of good cheer.

Emerson's gospel is the religion of nature—a limited gospel, but a veritable glad tidings for our age of nature study, with its blind fear that there is therein no place left for worship and for awe, for peace of faith and joy of hope.

It seems to me most natural that Emerson should pass away close after Darwin. They were really linked together as typical men of our age; the one representing the researches of the Understanding into nature, the other the visions of the Reason through nature. Darwin creates an epoch in knowledge, and reconstructs the globe. Emerson leads up the new knowledge into a new faith, and spheres the larger earth within vaster heavens. Darwin is the accoucheur of a new order of thought, which in Emerson finds its voice:—

"An infant crying in the night,
An infant crying for the light."

The great Englishman, dying just as he had examined an interesting beetle, was not more truly a student of nature than was his fellow voyageur into the mysteries of the beyond.

Emerson's first notable essay was entitled "Nature." That title might stand over all his writings. Each tune was a variation of one theme. Every topic was a phase of one subject. How he loved nature and lived in it we have already seen. Thence, he drew his inspirations. His poems are songs, not of the salon, but of the field; and not of the "asphodel meadows" about which he read, but of the daisy fields of Concord where the rhodora blooms "its own excuse for being," where "the burly, dozing humble bee drones," and the winds sough through the "sacred pines." Nature holds a fundamental position in his thought. All knowledge must rear itself upon its basic facts. Laws, beliefs, institutions, must root themselves in nature, and suck up their forces from it. Nature holds the truths it behoves us to know. Therefore, he studied her with such patient, reverent care that he interpreted her as another Wordsworth. He is nature become self-conscious and thinking aloud. Whether he had acquainted himself with the fore-feelings of the earlier savans in our modern world, as he certainly knew some of the students of nature in the ancient world, or whether it was an illustration of Tyndall's "use of the imagination in science," the fact remains that twenty years before the appearance of the Origin of Species he announced the theory of evolution, which that epoch-making book brought fairly to the birth. The seer was beforehand with the savan. The motto to "Nature" was:—

"A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings.
The eye reads omens where it goes,
And speaks all languages the rose.
And, striving to be man, the worm
Mounts through all the spires of form."

This was no lucky guess of a moment. It was his habitual vision. In the "Ode to Bacchus" he asks for "wine which music is," that "drinking this" he

"Shall hear far Chaos talk with me
Kings unborn shall walk with me;
And the poor grass shall plot and plan
What it will do when it is man."

"The Sphinx," "Wood Notes," "Monadnock," "May Day," "Song of Nature," are hymns for the psalter of evolution. Tyndall could not apostrophise heat, wherein lie "the promise and potency" of all things, with more accurate eloquence than Emerson in the "May Day":—

"Like a sea which me infolds;
Heat with viewless fingers moulds,
Swells and mellow and matures,
Paints and flavours and allures;
Bird and brier inly warms,
Still enriches and transforms;
Gives the reed and lily length,
Adds to oak and oxen strength.
* * * * *

Enveloping heat, enchanted robe,
Wraps the daisy and the globe;
Transforming what it doth infold,
Life out of death, new out of old.
* * * * *

The death lot touched bursts into leaf,
The wheat-blade whispers of the sheaf."

That these are not the hyperboles of the poet is assured by the soberer prose of the essayist. Of the progressive life of nature, he writes: "It publishes itself in creatures, reaching from particles to spicula, through transformation on transformation, to the highest symmetries, arriving at consummate results without a shock or a leap. A little heat—that is, a little motion—is all that differences the bald, dazzling white and deadly cold poles of the earth from the prolific tropical climates. All changes pass without violence by reason of the two cardinal conditions of boundless space and boundless time. How far off is the trilobite, how far the quadruped! How inconceivably remote is man! All duly arrive, and then race after race of men. It is a long way from granite to oyster; farther yet to Plato and the preaching of the immortality of the soul. Yet all must come as surely as the first atom has two sides."

With this clear vision of the process of evolution, Emerson, the seer, has the vision which the savan does not always have. The savan deals analytically with the various parts; while, in the synthesis of the imagination, the seer tells us

"I yielded myself to the perfect whole."

In this sight of the "one stupendous whole," of which all sciences are but parts, nature became to him a revelation full of awe. Where the ancient poet of evolution, Lucretius, saw only the blind play of atoms, Emerson saw—that which I leave him to describe.

"What god is this imperial Heat,
Earth's prime secret, sculpture's seat?
Doth it bear hidden in its heart
Water-line patterns of all art,
All figures, organs, hues, and graces?
Is it Daedalus? is it Love?
Or walks in mask almighty Jove?"

A question to which his answer is clear and positive in the sublime conclusion to the "Wood Notes":—

"Ever fresh the broad creation,
A divine improvisation;
From the heart of God proceeds
A single will, a million deeds.
Once slept the world an egg of stone;
And pulse and sound and light was none;
And God said, 'Throb!' and there was motion,
And the vast mass became vast ocean.
Onward and on, the Eternal Pan,
Who layeth the world's incessant plan,
Hatheth never in one shape,
But forever doth escape,
Like wave or flame, into new forms
Of gem and air, of plants and worms.
He is free and libertine,
Pouring of his power the wine
To every age, to every race;
Unto each and unto all,
Maker and original.
The world is the ring of his spells,
And the play of his miracles.
* * * * *

Thou seek'st in globe and galaxy,
He hides in pure transparency;
Thou askest in fountains and in fires,
He is the essence that inquires.
He is the axis of the star,
He is the sparkle of the spar;
He is the heart of every creature,
He is the meaning of each feature;
And his mind is the sky,
Than all it holds more deep, more high."

No wonder that Mr. Tyndall, in his fragments of science, declares: "In him we have a poet and a profoundly religious man, who is really and entirely undaunted by the discoveries of science, past, present, and prospective. In his case, poetry, with the joy of a bacchanal, takes her graver brother, Science, by the hand, and cheers him with immortal laughter."

The savan thus hails the seer the prophet of the new order, the psalmist of the Bible writ in stone, to whom there is the vision of the living creatures round the throne of the Lord and Giver of Life, singing, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God almighty, which was and is and is to come."

How did Emerson reach this sublime apocalypse, and see the new heavens over the new earth? He did not leap to his conclusion, else he were no poet laureate of science. Imagination may have projected the lines of his pathway with swift, unerring sight; but reason opened the roadway thus surveyed, and builded slow and sure this causeway to the skies. Let us try to follow the steps by which he climbed to this mount of vision.

Emerson lays the foundation of his religion in the two cardinal affirmations of science.

1. The first string in his constructive thought is the Unity of Nature. We can quite understand the surprise of John Stuart Mill's father that no one revived the ancient theory of dualism. It is the off-hand explanation of the contradictory forces and laws which earth presents. It offers an easy solution to the hard problems of life. But, whatever its plausibilities may be, it is for ever impossible henceforth. Evolution establishes the oneness of nature. The materials of all organisms upon the earth, from the bacteria up to man, are the same. The elements of the worlds around us in space are the elements which compose our world. Sulphur and iron, oxygen and hydrogen, build up Neptune as the earth. The laws which govern the crystallisation of the rocks reappear in higher forms in human society. Civilisation arranges itself after the pattern of the life within the domed halls of the bees and the galleried chambers of the ants. The planets sweep through space under the law which drops the apple from the tree. Forces slip into each other, while we are watching them, and show themselves but forms of one Protean force. One type of organisation discloses itself through the endless varieties of vegetable and animal life. The trunk of the tree and its branching boughs become the body, or, as we still say, the trunk of the animal and its legs, which only need to be set up on end to become the human form divine. We may learn about our organs in the oyster. The minuter the scrutiny, the more astonishing the analogies between all living things. It is because of this oneness of materials, laws, forces, and type, that each fleck of bioplasm carries within its filmy thread the possibilities of anything that is. It no longer admits of question that whether or not we are to say, "I believe in one God," we must say "I believe in one nature, one order, one table of elements, one system of laws, one pattern and type of structure, one subtle, mystic force, of which all forces are but masks."

By no thinker has this unity been more vividly realised or more profoundly estimated than by Emerson. He is full of this thought. It fascinates him. It even moulds his style. Any sentence will do to follow any other sentence; for whether it be about ethics or physics, art or chemistry, it is about one and the same substance, a different setting of one thought. A truth of music turns to a truth of painting, just as motion passes through different stages into sound and light. A principle in botany is a principle in government and trade, and all are principles of morals. Everything can become every other thing.

Nature's unity is a basic truth with him, the first article of the new creed. "This unity of design in creation, this unity of thought, is the key to all science." In his poem on "Xenophanes," whose early discernment of this truth interested him, he writes:—

"To know one element, explore another,
And in the second reappears the first.
The specious panorama of a year
But multiplies the image of a day,
A belt of mirrors round a taper's flame.
And universal Nature through her vast
And crowded whole, an infinite parquet,
Repeats one note."

This is the secret of the Sphinx.

"Uprose the merry Sphinx,
And crouched no more in stone;
She melted into purple cloud,
She silvered in the moon;

"She spired into a yellow flame ;
She flowered in blossoms red ;
She flowed into a foaming wave ;
She stood Monadnock's head.

"Thorough a thousand voices
Spoke the universal dame :
'Who telleth one of my meanings
Is master of all that I am.'"

II. The second article of the creed of evolution, which Emerson also voices, is the Progressiveness of Nature. Evolution is a synonyme for progress. Things are not standing still. Creation is advancing. From chaos, order has emerged. Out of molten masses of star-dust, out of stormful, seething seas and hills hissing with the fires that twisted their granite-like clay and knotted their veins in writhing coils, issued the earth in the calm beauty of the summer opening again upon us. From wriggling, shapeless films of transparent matter, grasses and flowers and trees, fishes and birds and beasts have arisen, until, at the last, man has turned his mirroring face upon the long ascent of life, and in reading its processes recognised himself its issue "the man-child glorious" with whom it has been in travail.

True, this progress has been no uniform, undeviating movement on and up, but a strangely wandering movement, now in this lateral direction and again in that, a series of tentative efforts, a feeling forth and round in all curious and baffling tracks: missing its way again and again, drawn aside into culs-de-sacs where was no exit, lapsing in recedent eddies, halting in stagnant back-waters, yet ever recovering itself from every wrong guess, retracing every mistake, finding its path again into the main stream of "the organic ascent of life," and pushing on into ever finer, higher, nobler forms, till in man it rests not still, but is already casting beforehand the shadows of the Coming Man in our dreams and aspirations. This truth, too, has been clearly grasped and graphically drawn by Emerson. It recurs ever in essays and in poems. "We can point nowhere to anything final, but tendency appears on all hands, planet, system, constellation, total nature, is growing like a field of maize in July, is becoming somewhat else, is in rapid metamorphosis. The embryo does not more strive to be man than yonder blur of light we call a nebula tends to be a ring, a comet, a globe, and a parent of new suns."

"'Tis in the stomach of plants that development begins, and ends in the circles of the universe. 'Tis a long scale from the gorilla to the gentleman, from the gorilla to Plato, Newton, Shakspeare,—to the sanctities of religion, the refinements of legislation, the summits of science, art, and poetry. The beginnings are slow and infirm, but 'tis an always accelerated march. The progress higher shows itself in society as in the lower spheres.

"The civil history of men might be traced by the successive meliorations, as marked in higher moral generalisations, virtue meaning physical courage, then chastity and temperance, then justice and love."

III. Thus, far, the savan leads us. As he leaves us, it should be on our knees. Given an order whose vast complexity reveals an inner unity of elements, laws, forces,—an order whose unity is that of one advancing type, of one idea finding ever fuller and nobler embodiment, and already blossoming into such a creature as man,—and we have a fact before which none but the thoughtless can fail in awe, as before an infinite power in which we live and move and have our being. Here, we have already the materials for a creed, waiting only the seer's touch to tremble into worship. The seer's touch, not the savan's; for beyond this point he, as such, does not lead us. The next step is into the mystery beyond the ken of the physicist, the source of the enfoldments whose unfoldings he pursues. He postulates a potentializing of bioplasm before he begins to write his genesis, but he cannot find these potencies in the matter with which he deals. The only rational indication of this source is found in following the uplifted finger of the seer, as he points to mind. Philosophy can account for matter by mind, it cannot account for mind by matter. When pushed to the wall, it affirms—and can prove, if need be,—that all things cognised by the senses are but states of consciousness in mind. Common sense, the quick, concurring instinct of the multitude, authenticates this witness of philosophy, and unhesitatingly and universally declares that such an order is stamped with the seal of an infinite intelligence. Science itself leaves us before a mystery of form within every organism upon which the fluent matter streaming through it steadily is moulded into persistent identity. From every region of thought we are driven back, as Huxley confesses, upon the ideal or spiritual interpretation, if we have to choose between this and materialism, though under the influence of Spinoza's illusive and unethical ethics, he persists in expecting a higher unity, of which we need only say it is not yet within the field of thought. The alone substance or reality standing under the changing phenomena of nature we can postulate is mind.

This Emerson saw and taught.

"Mind is the only reality of which men and all other natures are better or worse reflectors." Every law of nature was first a law of mind. "Nature is the incarnation of a thought. . . . The world is mind precipitated." He tracks law through its circles till he finds its throne, where

"Conscious law is King of kings."

Cities, and all the seemingly substantial facts of civilisation,

"Are but sailing foam-bells
Along Thought's causing stream,
And take their shape and sun colour
From him that sends the dream."

Monadnock spake to him :—

"If thou trowest
How the chemie eddies play.
Pole to pole, and what they say ;
And that these grey crags
Not on crags are hung,
But beads are of a rosary
On prayer and music strung ;
And, credulous, through the granite seeming Seest the smile of reason beaming ;
Can thy style-discerning eye
The hidden working builder spy,
Who builds, yet makes no chips, no din,
With hammer soft as snow-flake's flight ;
Knowest thou this ?"

Yes, he knew it well ; and for him and those who know it with him, were there nothing more to add, it can be said—

"Enough for thee the primal mind,
That flows in streams, that breathes in wind."

But though enough, it is not all.

(To be concluded next week.)

BROOKE HERFORD'S FAREWELL.

On Sunday, July 2, Mr. Herford preached his farewell sermon in the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, to a large and deeply-attentive congregation. It was in reality not a farewell sermon at all, Mr. Herford not choosing to "spend the closing hours of a very happy ministry in any lingering sadness of farewells," especially as he could feel that this was no "absolute parting." His last words were words of cheer and encouragement, and of kindly, earnest entreaty to the people who have worked with him these many years to abate no whit of their faith or enthusiasm for the cause for which they stand in the years to come. Mr. Herford leaves his old flock hopeful and strong for the future, and, though sincerely regretful over the close of the happy relations of the past, yet by no means wholly sad or cast down.

Having the Sunday before endeavoured to set before his hearers the things which he had tried to teach during his seven years' ministry in Chicago, Mr. Herford chose in his final discourse to speak of what he had learned. The announcement of such intention at once piqued the curiosity of the hearers, who felt this to be a new departure, inasmuch as the clergy are not wont to reveal to the plain understanding of the laity the hidden mental processes by which they have reached those results of thought and doctrine which they expound so eloquently from their pulpits.

Mr. Herford is glad, he says, that his work is to be continued here in America. "These have been seven good and fruitful years to me, fruitful in large impressions of the world, fruitful in strengthened convictions and clearer faith."

He then alluded to the great change in all the outward circumstances of life which he necessarily experienced in his removal from England to this country. Before this, his habits of life and study had been such as taught him "a great love and veneration for that far-off past which we are too much in the habit of looking down upon as mere barbaric times." When he came to this Western land, where man has no past, no revered traditions, no centuries of a dead and embalmed ancestry, nothing but his faith in and ability to cope with the future, he was greatly impressed by the splendid promise implied in this new civilisation. And he felt that he should like to have his part in it. "It set me looking beyond the lines of material conquest. I felt that it should not be only the hunter, the woodsman, the farmer, the merchant, that should come here. Is man to be only materially or intellectually richer in the opening future ? And I longed to have some part in the religious up-building, in winning life to worship and nobler faith."

The greatest lesson which the past seven years have taught is that of "a new confidence in the onward life of the world ;" and this confidence has been strengthened "by the way in which I have gradually come to appreciate the deep underlying strength and goodness of American life, to distinguish between that which asserts itself upon the surface of the America of to-day and the vast silent force of life which lies underneath, and seldom makes much visible sign." Here, in this "deep underlying strata of wholesome sense and goodness," lie the real worth and excellence of American life, and the hope of its future success. Along with these two lessons, that of greater faith in the onward progress of man and greater faith in the part which this new Western civilisation is to perform in that work of progress, there is a third: that the most effective aid in the furtherance of both these causes is that furnished in the teachings of practical Christianity. Mr. Herford then reverted to the various forms of literal thought which he was compelled to encounter among his new associates, the bold and radical tendencies of which he often felt himself in doubtful sympathy with ; yet, though his own views may have been slightly altered and modified in this friction with the more daring and younger thought of our times, Mr. Herford still holds to the conviction that "the best life, even in the most sceptical elements of America, is unconscious Christianity, which pervades all the better thoughts that men imagine new."

DUDLEY.—The annual examination and distribution of prizes at Baylies' School took place on Wednesday, July 26. The Rev. M. Gibson presided on the occasion, and delivered a short address before he distributed the prizes, sixty-two in number. He referred to the great benefits that the school had conferred on the town and neighbourhood, and expressed his pleasure at the result of the examination, affording, as it did, clear evidence of the good education work, so long carried on there—for a century and a half now—still continuing to be conducted with great efficiency by the present head master, Mr. Joseph Ridgway. He mentioned that the average number of boys on the school register through the year had been 211, and the average attendance 208'58, which he considered very satisfactory. He hoped all would try, parents and children, teachers and managers, to make this school a real blessing to the town of Dudley.

POPULAR MISCONCEPTIONS OF DARWINISM.

WHENEVER a great idea, fit representation of some great fact of the universe, first arises and promises to become a factor in the convictions of men, it is sure to be misunderstood. The ignorant cannot comprehend it; the partially informed see it in a distorted form; the philosopher cannot at once find a fitting place for it in his well and full-rounded system; and the theologian quivers with dread of the consequences to the several articles of his creed. Clamour arises, and voices hoarse and harsh denounce the "heresy."

We have received a valuable pamphlet on this subject, entitled "Some Popular Misconceptions of Darwinism: " a paper read before the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, on January 23 last, by our friend the Rev. S. F. WILLIAMS, and published by the Council. It bears on every page the evidence of much reading and hard study, the result of which is packed into sentences full of matter, suggestive of much more than what is actually said. And this is just the kind of writing that a reader ought to delight in—writing that gives the mind such a vigorous push that perforce it is driven up into regions of thought that it would not else have reached. After dealing with several other misconceptions, those relating to natural history and the physical descent of man among others, Mr. WILLIAMS turns to those which specially relate to religion. Now it seems to us that theologians of the orthodox type are fully warranted in their fears of the new and revolutionary conception of science, which is called Darwinism. Geology had overthrown certain fundamental axioms of their system, and now, just when they were managing to get over their fright, and were trying to adjust the focus of their views to its vastly extended time, there comes in this additional difficulty to deal with somehow. And it is impossible to find a place for it by any scheme of accommodation they may be able to invent. If Darwinism be true the truth of the orthodox doctrines of the "Fall" and all it involves, is out of the question. While pure Theism, the spiritual teachings of JESUS, the moral laws written in the constitution of man are untouched, the fabric of Orthodoxy is threatened with ruin from the apex to the foundations. Of course "it is not a question between Evolution and Creation, but between Creation by Evolution, and Creation by sudden and arbitrary successions." For "when it is clearly apprehended that Evolution gives us only the order, and leaves it as before for reason and faith to supply the cause of the creation, the particular method advocated by the Evolutionists is seen to be one that has illustrations of its own to supply concerning the wisdom and beneficence of the Creator." Of course, apart from the special theological dogmas, which lose all the grounds in which they were rooted, it is still believed by some that important interests are at stake in the materialising tendencies of some scientific teachings. But supposing that matter, when reduced to its elements, should turn out to be spirit, what then? And what seems to be the soundest deductions of the latest science appears to be leading in that direction. Ponderable matter is being first reduced to atoms, and atoms to points of force, and force to what? Can the profoundest thinker realise force within his own nature apart from his active will? And if will, then mind? And the corresponding forces of the universe must surely also be the same; for they act within a scheme, the scheme pushes onward in a well set direction to the development of even higher forms of life, betokening the presence of purpose.

When the present hurly-burly of thought, engendered by the breaking up of old convictions, and the formation of new ones, is past, physical science will become to spiritually minded men a revelation from Him with whom all true knowledge originates. "The excellent people" to whom Mr. WILLIAMS refers as "afraid that if they admit they have been developed from the lower forms of animal life they are in danger of losing their souls, and their hope of immortality," will be seen to have been very short-sighted indeed. And those who admit the doctrine and accept the inference will be seen to have been even more short-sighted still. For surely GOD could add to a well organised brute body and an animal intelligence the spiritual nature as easily as to a clod of earth kneaded into a human form. And if the food we eat is all the better for having been organised into vegetable or animal substance from the physical earth, before we partake of it, surely the body prepared for us by ascent from the protoplasmic globule through countless forms up to the ascidian of DARWIN, is better material out of which to make it than the raw earth. At least if the wisdom of the Creator has so decided, certainly it is as religious to accept the fact as it is to accept the fancy of the older thinkers, when men had not attained to the greater knowledge of the present day. As for the fact involving Atheism, it is because men reason badly, and on assumptions which ought to be discarded by all intelligent minds—if facts are GOD's words, which surely they are. Christians who reason thus forget or ignore the suggestive words of their Master. "My Father worketh until now," words which imply the incessant and continuous activity of the Creator through all time. The Creator never ceases to create. The doctrine of Evolution—materialistic and atheistic? Rather does it prove that the universe is steeped in and pervaded by GOD, and that the laws and forces of the world are spiritual. And this is the conclusion to which this powerful paper brings us, for its last words are: "The persistent uplifting of types of being, from epoch to epoch, would prove the ceaseless activity of a living spirit, working out a definite purpose, and manifesting Himself with an ever-brightening glory." Most heartily do we recommend this thoughtful and suggestive paper to our readers.

CHURCH MYTHOLOGY AND WAR.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY has issued a curious prayer, "commended to the clergy of his diocese," and in favour of the soldiers and sailors engaged in the war in Egypt. Not a word is said about the duty of directing all the warlike operations to a righteous end. The Archbishop, and the clergy who adopt his formula, will pray as part of the State machinery, and will let off their invocations to Heaven just as soldiers and sailors fire their guns, leaving all responsibility to those in command. The words are:—

"O Almighty God, whose power no creature is able to resist, keep, we beseech Thee, our soldiers and sailors who have now gone forth to war, that they being armed with Thy defence, may be preserved evermore from all perils, to glorify Thee, Who art the only giver of all victory, through the merits of Thy only Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

The statement that no creature is able to resist Almighty GOD is a truism, introducing a petition that the soldiers and sailors whom it is intended to expose to cannon, rifle, and sword, "may be evermore preserved from all perils," a thing which could only happen under the expected circumstances by a series of miracles to prevent projectiles and cutting implements from producing their ordinary effects. The object of this miraculous preservation is somewhat obscure. If the words "Who art the only Giver of all Victory" are regarded as parenthetical, it is prayed that the soldiers and sailors may glorify GOD through the merits of JESUS CHRIST. It is impossible to attach any definite idea to this proposal. The Archbishop seems to have had the doctrine of imputed righteousness in his head, and not to have known what to do with it. Does he imagine that in some mysterious way the "merits" spoken of will help our warriors to aim well and shoot straight? If the words are not parenthetical the statement is, that all victory is given through the merits of JESUS CHRIST, and if this means anything it implies that all winners of battles have a larger share of those merits imputed to them than the conquered party. Putting the jumble of words altogether the Archbishop's doctrine makes victory and defeat the consequences of special Divine interposition, controlling such secondary causes as numbers and equipment of troops, training, and tactical management. Does he really believe this? Or, is he giving an opinion which is professional, and not personal? Ignorant people cannot conceive of Divine government without miraculous interpositions. Thoughtful people perceive that confusion, moral and intellectual, results from regarding any kind of success in battle or otherwise as a proof of special Divine favour, and failure as evidencing Divine displeasure. In the Irish warfare against landlords the assassins are the victors. Would the Archbishop encourage them to apply his phraseology to their case and claim their success as GOD given?

FROM THEISM TO SUPERSTITION.

FROM Theism to superstition—this, we are sorry to say, describes, it seems to us, the downward course of that section of the Brahma Somaj of India of which BABU KESHUB CHUNDER SEN is the acknowledged leader and chief. We remember four or five years ago the pleasure with which we used to read Miss COLLET'S Year-books, and the high hopes we entertained of the future work of Mr. SEN as a true religious reformer. Since that time the position of affairs has greatly changed; strife and division have crept in and broken up into conflicting parties the once united Church. Many of Mr. SEN'S former friends have deserted him, and the earnest hopes held concerning him have been checked by bitter disappointment. The marriage of his daughter to an Indian Maharajah, under circumstances directly opposed to his own former teaching, first introduced the element of discord. In his attempted justification of the part he had taken in this affair Mr. SEN pleaded the high sanction of Divine authority. He professed to have acted under divine command, not under the conditions which ordinarily influence human conduct. Of course such a claim could not be allowed. It was assuming a sanction which might be pleaded in justification of any line of action, however unreasonable or mistaken. And it savoured of superstition; in fact, it marked the transition point from rational faith to superstitious feeling. A downward progress has continued from that time, with the result of confirming the alienation and division so much to be deplored. Miss COLLET'S Year-book for 1881, recently reviewed in these columns, shows that the first mistaken step has been followed by others, all tending in the same direction to mysticism and superstition. A new name has been given to the movement. The Brahma Somaj of India has become "the Church of the New Dispensation." The latter title is fast becoming the favourite designation. A special, authoritative divine character is claimed for this institution. Thus in his anniversary address at the Town Hall, Calcutta, Mr. SEN said:—

"Is this new gospel a Dispensation, or is it simply a new system of religion, which human understanding has evolved? I say it stands upon the same level with the Jewish dispensation, the Christian dispensation and the Vaishnava dispensation through Chaitanya. It is a divine dispensation, fully entitled to a place among the various dispensations and revelations of the world. But is it equally divine, equally authoritative? Christ's Dispensation is said to be divine. I say that this Dispensation is equally divine. Assuredly, it is the Lord of Heaven who has sent this new gospel into the world. . . . The New Dispensation is Christ's prophecy fulfilled. Did not Jesus predict and foreshadow a fuller dispensation of light and grace? Did he not say the comforter would come after him and guide the world into all truth?"

The exhortation with which this address concludes is characteristic of all such assumptions:—

"In these days of scepticism a whole army of infidels will attack you and persecute you. The light which the Lord has vouchsafed unto you is darkness unto all those who have no faith, and they shall laugh at you. Stand firm. Small is your number now, but many will come and swell your ranks in the fulness of time."

On March 24, 1881, a weekly four-page journal was started, entitled the New Dispensation, as the authorised organ of the movement so called. In the first number the principle of no compromise, no surrender, is earnestly enjoined—

"We know there is a strong temptation in these days to make the Dispensation somewhat more rational and less offensive than it is. But woe unto them who yield to the tempter. Men of faith must not faint because some have said of our doctrines that they are absurd, and ludicrous and even offensive. The apostles of God will preach the truth and nothing but the truth, the Dispensation and nothing but the Dispensation, and leave the issue in the hands of Providence. They cannot judge of the doctrine, for that is of God."

The ground here taken that those who oppose the doctrine cannot judge of it, because it is of GOD, is identical with that taken by the defenders of the Roman Catholic superstition, and the same may be said in defence of any other, however extravagant and absurd. And of course every objector would be silenced if he admitted that, as an objector, he could not judge of the doctrine. The principle thus boldly advanced strikes at the root of all criticism and individual judgment.

One feature of the New Dispensation is called "the communion with saints." Certain saints of old are said to be visited on certain days; the visiting of them is called "a pilgrimage." These pilgrimages were held in the minister's residence, and were taken part in by all the missionaries. They were held mostly in the worship-room, and on one occasion in his study, where, surrounded by book-shelves loaded with the wisdom of ages, and in the midst of literary associations, they communed with SOCRATES. The following saints were visited on the dates specified against their names:—MOSES, 22nd February; SOCRATES, 7th March; SAKYA, 14th March; CHRIST, 8th August; MAHOMMED, 19th September; CHAITANYA, 26th September; Scientific men, 3rd October." It is true Mr. SEN explains this as spiritual communion, but it is obvious how easily mysticism, superstition, and spiritualism, with its pretended converse with the dead, and pretended messages from the unseen world may grow out of this practice.

Various new ceremonies have been introduced. One of these is the Flag ceremony.

On the evening of the annual festival, held on Sunday, Jan. 23, the prominent object noticed by the congregation was a handsome crimson silk banner mounted upon a silver pole, fixed on the open space of marble pavement in front of the pulpit. This is the flag of the New Dispensation, which was to be unfurled with the accompaniment of lights and music. The Brahmos had composed "a grand hymn" for the occasion, "glorifying the many attributes of the Supreme Mother," the worshippers held each a lighted candle in his hand, "creating a brilliant and picturesque effect." Dozens of musical instruments were loudly and simultaneously performed upon. Scores of men "went round in a circle, with the burning tapers in their hands, heartily chanting the Arati hymn." The minister having "solemnly unfurled the dispensation banner" addressed the assembled apostles, calling them "apostles of the New Dispensation," and declaring that the Lord of Heaven had chosen them to preach his saving truth to the world. In token of their vow of allegiance they were to touch the banner and bow down before GOD. The apostles then each and all touched the banner and bowed their head to GOD. Those among the congregation who accepted the New Dispensation were invited to do the same. On the following day the ladies performed a similar ceremony before the flag. "They had composed and sweetly sung a new hymn, they walked round with dishevelled hair, and great plates of illuminated lamps."

We come next to a new sacramental ceremony. On Sunday, March 6, the ceremony of adapting the sacrament to Hindu life was performed. The Hindu apostles of CHRIST gathered after prayer in the dinner hall, and sat upon the floor, upon bare ground. Upon a silver plate was rice, and in a small goblet was water, and there were flowers and leaves around both. The minister read from Luke xxii., then offered prayer as follows:—"Touch this rice and this water, O Holy Spirit, and turn their grossly material substance into sanctifying spiritual forces, that they may, upon entering our system, be assimilated to it as the flesh and blood of all the saints in CHRIST JESUS."

The rice and water were then served in small quantities to those around, and men ate and drank reverently, and the women and children also ate and drank, and they blessed GOD, the GOD of prophets and saints.

A few days after another novelty was introduced, the vow of poverty. First came the washing of feet:—

"One after another the apostles came to the place where there was a low wooden seat and sat upon it. The attendant who looks after their daily good bowed, and washed the feet of the apostles as they sat with their feet stretched upon a basin, while another attendant wiped them with a towel. They then went solemnly into the sanctuary and took their seats. The minister bowed before the basin, then raising his head he drank out of it, and invoked God's blessing that he might become a worthy servant. Next the 'chief priest' administered the vow of poverty, pledging those who take it to live for a time exclusively upon alms. He presented to the minister a medal, which he reverently accepted, and wore on his person. Then followed the presentation of a stick and a scrip, both national symbols of mendicancy. Dressed in gairic, with head shaved, the servant of the apostles humbly received and asked for alms. Thereupon rice and vegetables were put into the small bag which he held in his hand as a mendicant. This was the beginning of thirty-five days of mendicancy, during which the servant of the apostles was pledged to live exclusively upon alms in the shape of rice, salt, oil, vegetables, fruits, &c., with which kind friends might favour him. A few more medals were then presented, and there was laying on of hands, in each case indicative of apostolical succession. The ceremony concluded with a charge to the apostles, prayers and benediction."

We come now to the New Hom Ceremony, which is thus described in the New Dispensation of June 9, 1881.

"On Tuesday last the Sanctuary witnessed a new and imposing, and we may add, an instructive spectacle. There was a large iron fire-pan in front of the Vedi; in an earthen vessel was ghee or clarified butter; bundles of sticks were gathered in one place, and there was a large metallic spoon. Varieties of beautiful flowers and evergreens in abundance formed a semi-circle skirting the place where these things were arranged. No one was prepared for such a sight, as none, even among the select few who were present, knew what was going to happen. After the introductory portion of the service was over, the minister invoked Divine blessing on the ceremony which was to be performed, and prayed that it might become profitable unto the church. He then lighted up the fuel before him, and pouring over it clarified butter, produced a brisk fire, which he thus addressed:—

"O thou blazing Agni! great, great art thou, great among the forces in creation. We shall honour thee and magnify thee because of thy greatness and majesty. Thou art not God; we do not adore thee. But in thee dwells the Lord, the Eternal Inextinguishable Flame, the Light of the Universe, the immanent Fire, Fire of Fire, whom fire doth reveal and glorify, and much more to the same effect. Then the God of Fire is addressed:—

"O thou resplendent God of Fire! O God of Agni, as Agnihotri and priest I initiate the ceremony of the New Hom, under thy command for the destruction of carnal propensities. . . . These six pieces of fuel tied together, which represent the six evil passions of the heart, do thou burn and destroy in the flame, and as these pieces of fuel burn and are reduced to ashes, may they typify the destruction of our carnal passions in the fire of thy holiness."

"Thus saying the minister cast the six pieces of fuel into the burning fire, the congregation exclaiming together, 'Victory to God! Victory to God! Peace, Peace, Peace!'"

We pass on to another ceremony, which is set forth as the fitting sequel to the foregoing:—"Immersion in Jordan water, or the New Baptismal Ceremony."

After service in the Tabernacle the devotees congregated in the family sanctuary, and a short prayer having been offered by the minister, expressing the desire to go on pilgrimage to the Jordan in the Holy Land, for their redemption's sake, the devotees formed a procession and solemnly moved on singing a hymn, till they reached the Jordan, which was a pond in a garden attached to Mr. Sen's residence. On the steps leading down to the water they all sat down, and the minister addressed them:—"Beloved brethren, we have come into the land of the Jews, and we are seated on the bank of the Jordan! Let them that have eyes see. Verily, verily, here was the Lord JESUS baptised eighteen hundred years ago," &c. The whole ceremony is much too long to quote. We may just briefly say that the water was addressed as the fire had been on a previous occasion. "O thou great Varuna, water of life. Sacred water, mighty expanse of seas and oceans and rivers, we glorify thee. Thou art not God but the Lord is in thee." And much more of the same sort. Then the minister having dilated on the gospel narrative of the baptism of JESUS, and anointed himself with flower oil, went down into the water and thrice immersed himself, saying, "Glory unto the Father, glory unto the Son, glory unto the Holy Ghost." To magnify the Three in one he dipped once more, saying, "Blessed be Sachchidananda (the Vedantic Trinity). Truth, wisdom, and joy in one!" With the water he washed his eyes and ears, his hands and feet, and prayed with clasped hands, "O Lord of Rivers and Seas," &c. A portion of the assembled devotees then reverently went through the ceremony of immersion. The whole party having left, a number of ladies and children of the New Dispensation came to the spot, and after immersion and a short prayer joyfully carried home vessels of the water.

In the succeeding number of the New Dispensation we read:—

"The rite was administered by John the Baptist himself, who was present in spirit; and the immersion took place not in ordinary water, but in the sacred Jordan, exactly where Jesus Christ was baptised eighteen centuries ago, for verily faith converted Calcutta for the time into the Holy Land, and the water of the tank into the water of the Jordan!"

Such is a portion of the evidence in support of our opening statement that the progress of the Brahmo Somaj of India has been from Theism to Superstition. Those of our readers who wish to see the evidence stated at greater length will find it in Miss COLLET'S Year-book. Our abstract omits very much that strongly supports our view. We have merely indicated the line of development along which this new movement has gone. What that line of development is, the novel rites, forms, notions, and ceremonies sufficiently show. And they are all of the same character, and have the same tendency to superstitious reverence and mere make-believe. What reality is there in the pretended pilgrimages to the saints of old, and in affecting to hold converse with them one at a time on certain days? What reality is there in the vow of poverty and the garb of mendicancy? What reality is there in the pretence of being baptised by JOHN the BAPTIST in the river Jordan? Is it not all mere make-believe? What has rational thought to do with it? To us there seems something childish about it all. It is like the play of children when they pretend to keep school or to keep house. It is altogether unworthy the pretension of religious reformers claiming to be engaged in a great work of religious reformation. And the whole effect is lowering to individual character, and to one's sense of what is due to one's self respect, reason, and intelligence. Thus, a missionary expedition, consisting of a few Brahmos, is met on the way by "a number of Hindus, who come and prostrate themselves before the procession and apply the dust of the street to their heads with the greatest reverence." It would have been well if the missionary leader had imitated the example of PETER when CORNELIUS fell down at his feet, and said with him—"Stand up; I myself also am a man!" There must be a return to reasonableness and reality, or, we fear, the course of the Brahmo Somaj of India—Mr. SEN'S party—will be still downward, to a lower depth of puerile fancy, mysticism, and superstition.

C. F. B.

THE WISDOM OF THE EGYPTIANS.

There is scarcely a country in the world which possesses a deeper interest to the thoughtful student of history than Egypt. This interest arises from various causes—its ancient civilisation, its long history comprehending the ancient, the mediæval and the modern world, its remarkable vicissitudes of fortune, its singular people, its relation to the old religions of the world, its geographical position, and its remarkable river. On these various accounts it has an interest for the students in several branches of knowledge. It is equally attractive to the man of science and the theologian, to the scholar and the archæologist, to the traveller and the student of history. And that interest grows with the continually increasing success with which the light of modern science is brought to bear on the annals and relics of antiquity. A truer knowledge of the empires of the ancient world is one of the gains, and not the least important, of modern investigation and research. Those wide gaps, those blank epochs in the records of antiquity, concerning which a few years ago nothing was known, are gradually filling up with the names of kings and dynasties, and the records of conquest and dominion. We may yet be enabled, with the aid of further investigation, to bridge over completely those dark chasms until we can go back through the past ages of historic times by one long and continued pathway, and guided by the clue which modern science has placed in our hands, tread the ramifications of this wondrous labyrinth with ease and safety.

What was this wisdom of the Egyptians? What was its general character, and what attainments did it comprise? It was a wisdom characteristic of an advanced stage of material greatness, but it was largely alloyed with superstition and caste distinctions. It was the wisdom of the priest, and of the warrior, and of the artisan. It was a wisdom which related to chariots and armies, to weapons of war, to agriculture, manufactures and buildings. Abundant evidence of their proficiency in these things is afforded us by the imperfect records which have come down to us, and still more by the wondrous structures—the massive pyramids, the mighty temples, the obelisks, and colossal statues which are the relics of their greatness. In many of the arts and sciences they pioneered the way and laid all future generations under the obligation of a debt of gratitude. How intimately the religion and government were blended together is well known to every student, but the æsthetic character of the Egyptians is not so generally recognised. The conception of the beautiful and the grand was largely developed in their minds, and abundantly displayed in the thousand forms of beauty they called into being. They were eminently an æsthetic people. The evidence of a refined taste is manifested in their textile fabrics and in their articles for domestic use. And in architecture the ruins that remain are still the wonder of every beholder. From the Egypt of antiquity to the Egypt of modern times what a change! When we, in imagination, place ourselves amidst its ruined temples and palaces and remember that when the whole Western world was plunged in the night of barbarism ages and ages before the very earliest dawn, the light of civilisation in its full radiance shone on Egypt, and think of the state of the country in modern times, all through the centuries that Europe has been making the greatest progress, the feeling that comes over the thoughtful mind is inexpressibly mournful and sad. Not only is its ancient greatness gone, its former glory departed, but it has been the victim of cruel oppression. The condition of the labouring class has been wretched in the extreme. They have had barely sufficient to support animal existence. Their labour has gone to keep up a profligate, licentious Court and to pay the interest on the enormous national debt in contracting which the people had no voice, and from which they derived little or no benefit. The people have existed and toiled not for their own sakes, but for the sake of a few rapacious extortioners who have lived in extravagant luxury on the industry of the nation. For ages this oppression has lasted, varied only by one race of oppressors being exchanged for another, till centuries of abject servitude have degraded the people, crushed in them the spirit of independence and almost silenced the voice of protest and complaint. Modern Egypt has been a mournful spectacle, and suggests the reflection how inveterate is the spirit of tyranny and wrong in human institutions, and how much, how very much, in the way of change and reform remains to be done before justice and freedom shall obtain their rightful sway over all the earth. And now once more this country is involved in the cruelties and horrors of war. Whether wisely or unwisely, certainly unfortunately, England is intimately mixed up with the anarchy and crime that have prevailed. The results of our expedition to Egypt no one can foresee. Very grave issues tremble in the balance. An immense expenditure of treasure and life will almost certainly be the cost before the end has come. England has embarked in an enterprise, whether wisely or unwisely is a question—but certainly of a very perilous character. The best that we can hope is that it will lead eventually to a better state of things, and to an improvement in the condition of the Egyptian people. We cling to this hope under the most adverse circumstances, for it is founded on our belief that by means often inscrutable to us a righteous rule guides the destinies of the world.

CIVILISATION AND HUMAN NATURE.

"Emollit Mores" was said in praise of civilisation by a Roman writer of the Augustan age. Undoubtedly it is well to soften manners when manners need softening; but in the case of Rome, her civilisation, whatever effect it may have had upon manners, was certainly not healthy in its influence on morals. The mass of the people were brutal at all times, and as for the educated and refined, so-called, the softening process of civilisation, was extended to many things besides manners—to qualities of character that ought never to be softened at all. Principle was softened, Honour and Integrity and the Love of Truth were softened, and many a trait that ought to have fibre and strength became weak, nerveless, unsubstantial, prone to melt away into selfish refinement and into habits of thought and life unhealthy and unnatural. Modern civilisation, like that of old, does no doubt, in a certain way, soften manners; but it seems to us to do this by taking out of them all sincerity and earnestness. Friendships are cooling down into acquaintanceships; courtesy is being substituted for kindness, and ceremonious "calls," in which neither thoughts nor feelings ever pass from mind to mind, are taking the place of free and hearty intercourse. The machinery of civilisation is grinding away the life of society. The rage for sport and amusement has risen to the point of fever heat. Even literary men are to be found who, through the medium of sporting magazines and newspapers, devote genius and talent exclusively to the record, description and glorification of racing, boating, cricketering, bicycling and things of that kind—all innocent enough as occasional and incidental modes of relaxation, but not innocent when pursued as if they were the chief and primary purpose of human life and "the whole duty of man." Violent sport and feverish gaiety are now rooting into national habits, and becoming elaborated into system; and judging from the example of certain royal and aristocratic leaders of society, one might imagine that to go to races every day and to theatres every night were the best and most natural means of advancing the well-being of men and the greatness of a nation.

True civilisation has cheerful characteristics, and does not repudiate beautiful and elegant forms of harmless gaiety. "Erycina ridens, quam Jocus circum volat et Cupido" need not be utterly banished, and many a fascinating grace may entwine around stern and difficult duty; but this is a somewhat different thing from the modern habit of killing time instead of utilising it, and of making life intensely sensuous and sensational. True civilisation should be marked by bright and beautiful intelligence, by sweet and gentle feelings, by kind and sympathising manners, by simplicity of habit, by justice, honour, truth, and a constant desire and effort to uplift the lower strata of humanity. As for all this noise and show and excitement, this excessive eating and drinking, horse-racing, boat-racing, theatre-going,—this straining after vulgar distinctions of title,—this hunger for wealth, this extravagance and false taste in its expenditure and display; this incubus of luxury; this flimsy æstheticism which intrudes into even public worship and loads the altar with many gifts from the purse, but very few from the heart, all this may be called civilisation, but it is a false, unhealthy and ultimately a destructive thing. If, as many politicians suppose, it be the destiny and duty of England to carry abroad our civilisation to other lands, it behoves us to pause and ask whether the recipients of this kind of thing are likely to become much the better for it. The late mutiny in India, the recent war in Kaffir and Zululand, and the present disturbances in Egypt, seem to indicate a strong natural reluctance of foreign races to be improved except upon their own lines of natural development. They do not like our civilisation.

The state of civilisation must depend on human nature and its capacities. Is this the grand and beautiful thing that some optimists have talked about, or is it the bundle of "filthy rags" over which some Calvinists have mourned? Unitarians and Liberal Thinkers generally incline to the bright view, and we have heard some of them talk eloquently about the "dignity of human nature," and the "innocence of childhood." It has always seemed to us that they have begun to rejoice a little too soon; for though we believe in the capacity of human nature to rise, however low at present, we think that "self-complacency and gratulation should be deferred until it has actually risen, at least a little higher than its present level. It is time enough to talk about the dignity of human nature when after a long life of moral effort we have really made our natures dignified. Because the theological doctrine of "the Fall" is unhistorical and unreasonable, there is no necessity to rush into the opposite extreme, and deny that multitudes of men, women and children around us have fallen, and are still falling. Self-conceit in ourselves, too, is a quality not unlikely to induce descent of character. He that hath ears to hear, and eyes to see, and any amount of self-knowledge or power of self-inspection, must perceive, we think, that the falling processes of human nature are nearly as active as the rising ones, though the victory at last remains, we hope, with the latter. As we take our "walks abroad" and hear the blasphemy of horrid oaths continually repeated in the common speech of many of the labouring classes; as we pass gin-shops and public-houses and hear some loud-tongued virago with bruised and battered face, torn raiment and dishevelled hair, screaming out torrents of filthy abuse against some rival of her own sex or some faithless paramour of the other; as we observe the selfish wrangling of boys in the street, and the still more offensive sight of youth not yet out of their teens wandering about with pipes in their mouths and larking coarsely with young girls as immodest as themselves; when we hear all this wrangle and noise; when we smell all this human liquor and smoke, and other exhalations of nastiness; and when we see the countless abominations that arise wherever two or three of the more animalised members of humanity are gathered together, we are very far indeed from being impressed with the dignity of human nature. At such times it seems to us that the alleged miracle of old was, in our days, in process of being reversed, and that instead of humanity entering into the swine the swine had entered into humanity. Thousands of them are still running down the steep of degradation to be overwhelmed in seas of sin. Circe, it would seem, is no fabulous person, but a living enchantress occupied at this very hour in turning human beings into beasts; and we doubt if there is a single one of us on earth who has not felt at some moment or other the creeping in of some low passion or horrid instinct overpowering for an instant every better element of character and transforming humanity into something dreadful:

"Fit lupus, et veteris servat vestigia formæ:
Canities eadem est; eadem violentia vultu;
Idem oculi lucent; eadem feritatis imago."

We are not Pessimists. We believe in Him to whom a thousand years is as one day, and who will not leave any human mind in Hades for ever to grow familiar with nothing but corruption. He who decreed human nature has also decreed something higher into which human nature may gradually transform and rise. Where the weeds now grow there may by-and-by be flowers. Human nature, like other natures, is in process of evolution, and the stage of growth at present reached is not very high. But then it goes on growing, and therein is our hope. We would not discourage any cheerful thought or spiritual aspiration. We only protest against premature jubilation and self-contentment at our present moral condition; at the tendency to cry out, "What a good boy am I;" when in fact we are not yet good boys at all, nor likely to become so until we are a little more humble-minded, and have a deeper sense of our deficiencies than of our attainments. We protest, too, against those perversities of our so-called civilisation which have arisen out of the present low condition of our nature, and against that national conceit which assumes that we English people are at the top of the human race destined to civilise the whole world after our own fashion. Undoubtedly our civilisation has some traits that are good and beautiful; but it has also some that are very evil. It would be well if we purified it a little before sending it abroad to Africa or India. When it has become better and purer it will, we incline to think, quietly diffuse itself without the aid of annexations, protectorates, dual controls, fleets, armies, and other irritating agencies hitherto adopted by political Christians and diplomatic and financial civilisers.

"NATURAL RELIGION."—IV.

The practical mind of the Englishman has an unvarying question to all suggestions for change—what good will it do? This is fully recognised by the author, not only as a fact, but as by no means an improper question. By way of introduction to the second part of his book,* he states with great fairness the kind of criticism that is bestowed on all schemes of Natural Religion, and professes to ascertain whether the system he has propounded is strong and substantial enough to withstand them. In the first chapter, entitled "Religion and the World," he starts with the assertion that "the practical question of the present day is how to defend the very principle of religion against naked secularity," and points out how greatly are the conditions of the contest changed from what they were in a preceding age. It was not religion, so much as its corruptions, that was challenged, but now the fundamental conceptions of duty are impugned in the current philosophy. In the older contest religion invoked the aid of supernaturalism. When secularism preached the doctrine "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," religion admitted that this was right enough, but for there being another world. But now that the tide of thought is running against supernaturalism the old arguments have lost their force, and the secularist position seems stronger. Is there, then, a Natural Religion? "May we, without pledging ourselves to any belief in miracles or in an invisible supernatural world, continue to protest against secularity, continue to affirm that 'one thing is needful,' and to ask 'What doth it profit a man if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul?'" Our author maintains that we may, and he proceeds to prove this by the following arguments.

There are two "reasoned ideals of life" adverse to the old system, which "appear at first sight" to be directly irreligious. There is the artist's ideal. He cherishes a secret grudge against morality, believing that it is owing to this that the modern world is prevented from rivalling the arts of Greece. Then there is the ideal of the scientific investigator, who, "consumed by the passion of research," has little or no time for "the activity of virtue." These two ideals are indebted for nothing to either theology or any spiritualist philosophy. But admitting that these theories are capable of refutation, is it quite clear that they are so opposed to religion after all? Do not they rather tend to show that religion is the one thing needful? Is it not rather against a particular form of religion, rather than religion itself that these men protest? "The popular Christianity of the day," says our author, "is for the artist too melancholy and sedate, and for the man of science too sentimental and superficial; in short, it is too melancholy for the one and not melancholy enough for the other. They become, therefore, dissenters from the existing religion; sympathising too little with the popular worship, they worship by themselves and dispense with outward forms. But they protest at the same time that in strictness they separate from the religious bodies around them only because they themselves know of a purer or a happier religion." Both the artist and the scientific man denounce the mere worldling, the man who has no soul; and here they concur with the moralist or religious man, though they differ in their mode of censure. Neither Science nor Art lead to secularity; indeed, "against irreligion, against secularity, Art, Science, and Christianity are, or ought to be, united." Taking the New Testament in our hands, we find there the kind of thing that is meant by the world, and the kind of thing which is opposed to it. We learn that "the world is the collective character of those who do not worship," and life without worship is irreligion. All this leads our author to maintain that there never has been a time when the necessity of religion in the broad sense of the word has been so clear, even if there has never been a time when its value in the narrow sense has been so much disputed. "If," he says, "we understand that all culture alike rests upon religion, religion being not simple, but threefold, and consisting of that worship of visible things which leads to art, that worship of humanity which leads to all moral disciplines, and principally the Christian, and that worship of God which is the soul of all philosophy and science; if we recognise, on the other hand, that secularity is the absence not of one of these kinds of worship, but of all; in other words, that it is the paralysis of the power of admiration, and as a consequence, the predominance of the animal wants and the substitution of automatic custom for living will and intelligence, then we shall recognise that it is not favoured, but very emphatically repudiated by the spirit of the time."

* "Natural Religion." By the Author of "Ecco Homo." London: Macmillan.

Against the gross, materialistic, unideal spirit that prevails so largely in England, and which finds content in that sordid notion of well-being that arises from amassing wealth, as if that were the one thing needed, our author protests eloquently and vigorously. Where is the remedy? He says:—

"The Christian Church, one would think, is here to cure all this. It is here, and has by no means lost its hold on the community. Wonderful is the effect produced by any religious utterance which seems to ring true. But its system is full of survivals, its text-books have been left too long without revision, its teaching is so archaic as to be in great part scarcely intelligible without the aid of ancient history, while the method of tests and exclusions has drained it of intellectual vigour, and has left it mainly under the control of anxious, nerveless minds; so that it is hardly listened to by men of the world except on the ground that Anility and Puerility after all are forces, and might do untold mischief if they were needlessly provoked. The religious world, which ought, one would suppose, to cherish the high ideal that the community wants, has in fact an ideal almost lower than that of the community. It applies the rudest standards, such as the Hebrew prophets denounced in the infancy of the world. Unblushingly it pronounces a man religious because he practises religious observances, figures in religious societies, talks much and unctiously about religion. 'Thousands of rams,' as the prophet would say, 'and ten thousands of rivers of oil!' But real religiousness, which, as he tells us, shuns parade, which in fact consists mainly in a quiet devotion to the sort of work which is permanently useful, and an infinite solicitude to do such work as well as possible, does not pass with the religious world for religiousness at all.

"Meanwhile the great writers, who, often in different or hostile to orthodoxy, have been the prophets of the present age, have denounced secularity as earnestly as the prophets of old time. Insincerity and conventionalism have been the objects of their attack, cant in religion, dilettantism in art, shams in society, party commonplaces in politics, in all departments the tyranny of opinion destroying individuality. But to have an individuality is to have an ideal, and to have an ideal is to have an object of worship, it is to have a religion. Thus it is that modern teaching does but repeat, in these days when it is said there is no agreement about religion, the maxims which have always made the basis of the religion of Christendom—that 'there is one thing needful,' and that 'it shall profit a man nothing if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul.'"

The great antidote to secularity is, our author thinks, Culture, which is not, as some of its adherents seem to imagine, dissimilar nor unfriendly to religion, unless indeed religion is held to be identical with ecclesiastical Christianity. While there has been a revival of the old Hebrew indignation against anthropomorphism in science, and of New Testament Christianity in the worship of humanity, "Religion has been revived under the artificial name of Culture," a word which is often misleading, because it suggests the machinery of training rather than the thing trained. While

"Culture is properly a direction given to the development of life, religion is the principle of life itself." Nevertheless, culture is not "mere morality," but embraces a larger field, while it includes morality. "Culture," says our author, "is summed up by Goethe in the formula, Life in the Whole, in the Good, in the Beautiful. Here Morality, under the name of Life in the Good, stands between Art, which is Life in the Beautiful, and Science, or the knowledge of the law of the universe, which is Life in the Whole." It is in culture that we find that system which has grown up side by side with the opposition to ecclesiastical Christianity, a system free from the one-sidedness of the latter, and reconciling the three elements of Art, Science, and Humanity.

In the returning love of Art and the new love for Science, we see a sort of Renaissance added to the acquisition of a sense of reality, which is "analogous to the growth in cheerfulness and healthy worldliness which comes to the youth as he grows accustomed to manhood," and throws off sickly self-consciousness. For both Science and Renaissance we may be grateful; to the former for saving us "from those heroic mistakes of which the Catholic centuries were so fruitful, from unworlship ending on the one hand in squalor and pestilence, on the other in greedy mendicancy, from pity creating pauperism, and chastity by reaction producing vice," and to the latter because it "will redeem the lower levels of life from the bald barrenness of money getting, and give Humanity the fond gaillard that may carry her through the troubles in store for her." But the modern spirit must not be carried too far; as in a healthy manhood there must be an element of the ideal of youth combined with the sense of reality, so if the latter take a too firm hold, enthusiasm and ardour are apt to decay and old age sets in. Is this true also of Humanity? Having learned our limitations, that enthusiasm cannot have its own way entirely, that ideals are only realisable under certain conditions of possibility, are we to give up all hope because often those conditions seem too rigorous? To this question, which is that of the Pessimist, our author replies, "It need not be so if the service of Necessity may become freedom instead of bondage, if the Power above us which so often checks our impatience and pours contempt on our enthusiasm can be conceived as not necessarily giving less than we hope for because it does not give precisely what we hope for, but perhaps even as giving infinitely more."

One of the most interesting chapters in the book is that entitled, "Natural Christianity." May not we look for a revival of the essential part of Christianity, and hope for a religion preaching righteousness and truth, justice and mercy as solemnly and as exclusively as Christianity does, without shocking modern views of the universe? This question involves a further one, What is the essential character of Christianity? Like all concrete religions Christianity consists of much beside religion. The essence of religion is in worship, and the fruits thereof are art, science, and morality. This latter is also connected with law, and Christianity, in so far as like other religions it "has upheld morality by a system of rewards and punishments supposed to be administered by an invisible judge, has acted not as a religion but as a law." This legal view of the universe is not peculiar to Christianity, and thus it is that "religion in its concrete form" being usually blended with a supernatural law, the latter is supposed to be the essence of religion, and that religion simply has "to supply the sanctions of morality." Christianity in this form is not likely to have a revival just now, as it is not Natural Christianity. It is evident that the old notions of a future judgment have passed away, to a very large extent; what, then, remains of Christianity beyond mere morality? Natural Religion being "simply worship of whatever in the known universe appears worthy of worship," and lying at the basis of all art and science, "is there not similarly," our author asks, "a religion hidden under morality," which may be termed Natural Christianity? Conventionalism is the opposite of all religion; "rules" in art are opposed to "genius" and "inspiration," though, no doubt, in all good works of art there are certain fixed rules. In the drama, too, the work that may most strictly conform to rules is less likely to live, is worth less than that which owes its origin to free inspiration. So in morality; that kind of it which is based on rule, and becomes conventionalised, is less likely to endure than that which is the result of free inspiration. Morality resting on law or prudence is without religion, and that whether the law be supernatural or not. But as it is not every religion that prompts to virtuous action, and as virtue can only show itself in our relations to our fellow men, so it follows that "the religion that leads to virtue must be a religion that worships men." "If," says our author, "in God Himself we did not believe qualities analogous to the human to exist, the worship of Him would not lead to virtue; the worship of God not as we believe Him, but as we see Him in non-human nature, would be likely, taken by itself, to lead to pitiless fanaticism." He maintains that wherever the higher morality shows itself, humanity is worshipped, in various forms no doubt, but "most of all when, passing by an act of faith beyond all that we can know, we attribute all the perfections of ideal humanity to the Power that made and sustains the universe." At the basis of all true morality lies a religion, and such a religion may take shape and become organised. Is not this true of Christianity, or is it only a religion in the sense of supernatural law? This question is best answered by carefully considering what we find in the Old Testament, not what we read into it. Now we find scarcely anything about a future state in this; the doctrine is, however, to be found in the New Testament, though but little of a descriptive kind. But the main idea running through both parts of the Bible is that of morality inspired and vivified by religion. "The idea of a future life is one which we ourselves read into the Bible; the idea which we find there, pervading it from first to last, is one which belongs altogether to practical life, and which must seem just as important to the sceptic as to the most believing supernaturalist; it is the idea summed up in an antithesis which takes many forms, the antithesis of letter and spirit, law and grace, works and faith." We read in the Bible the history of a nation, disciplined by law, till at last there springs out of it a morality free, active, and energetic, because founded upon an ideal humanity.

We are far from saying that we agree with all that we have here summarised of the author's argument. But that he has said much which affords food for reflection is clear. We by no means think that the supernatural is excluded from the history of the Jewish nation, or what comes to the same thing, a belief in it. We reserve, however, to another article a closer examination of our author's position.

LETTER FROM HUNGARY.

KOLOZSVAR, AUG. 3.

Any one who enters the book room of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London will at once be struck by the picture of a dark-looking but very mild and amiable man hanging on the wall just opposite the door. After a short inquiry he will be informed that it is the portrait of the late bishop of the Hungarian Unitarians, John Kriza. It is hardly likely that anyone will ever forget this unaffected and singular face. Bishop Kriza was a man who captivated everybody by his first appearance, and whom, on that account, everybody liked. How great he was, and what a prominent place he occupied in Hungary as a poet and as a bishop of the Unitarians was shown at his sudden death, in 1874, by the general mourning which pervaded the whole country. But how many are there whose memory also is buried in the grave with the body! This was not the case with Bishop Kriza. He was known by many, and this knowledge was not a common one. The Secklers, whose popular poems he collected with untiring zeal, loved him because he was interested in what is most dear to them, their language and their national songs, which they sang by day amidst their hard labour, and by night by their fireside. And this Kriza has done a time when they had to suffer under foreign oppression, the aim of which was to eradicate everything purely Magyar.

Kriza spent about twenty years in collecting the original Szekler folk-songs, ballads, fables, and such like. Nobody ever imagined till then what a rich store of productions of the Hungarian mind was hidden amongst those simple Szeklers. Some of the pieces are supposed to be four or five hundred years old, and are on that account very valuable for linguistic purposes. The fountain of these beautiful and very interesting songs is not yet dried up, and I myself have a fair collection of the more modern ones, all of which are very rich in deep feeling, in comprehensive thought, and in wit. Had Kriza done nothing else besides the production of a volume of these "Wild Roses," as he termed them, he has done quite enough to procure a lasting memory for himself.

We had only to wait eight years after his death and this was most effectively shown. The students of the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár began last year to raise a sum for erecting a memorial tablet on the house where Kriza was born, and the collection had such a good result that we were able to place it there on the 30th of July with the most appropriate solemnities.

Nagy Ajta, the native village of Kriza, never witnessed such a large gathering of Hungarian literary men and of the people from all parts of Transylvania as at this time. The "Hungarian Scientific Academy" and the "Kisfaludy Society," of both of which he was a member, and the "Kolozsvár Museum Society," sent a representative. All the Unitarian Church districts and colleges were represented, and placed a garland beside the memorial stone, with appropriate mottoes.

The festival began by a sermon which the Rev. Péterfi preached on Unitarianism. Professor Kovács opened the ceremony by a fine address, after which the veil was drawn away from the beautiful dark marble stone by Alexis Jakab, corresponding member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Jakab read a very interesting paper on "The Life of John Kriza." The effect of his paper was grand. A great many newspapers gave it in full, and spoke of it as well as of the whole proceedings in high tones. At the end a beautiful ode was read from our youngest Unitarian poet, Josef Györfy, who has just finished his college course, and who has already written some very fine pieces of poetry. It is worth mentioning that a "Kriza Fund" will be raised for literary prizes.

I think it could hardly have been said that this was a Unitarian festival, although it was conducted entirely by Unitarians, and though a single Unitarian minister's house was honoured with a lasting memorial; yet we Unitarians have the most reason to rejoice over it: yes, because it is the first time that the merits of a Unitarian Churchman has been so generally acknowledged.

As a Unitarian minister—for he bore this honourable office for some twenty years—and perhaps not less so as a Unitarian bishop, he had to struggle for existence, as Mr. Jakab remarked, and therefore it was a drawback for him to belong to such a small denomination. But few men ever heard a voice of any kind of complaint from his lips. As a poet he was raised up to the skies; but as servant of Christ he was as humble as the lowliest. No Hungarian Unitarian ever knew Channing better than he did, and I think no one appreciated him more and was more like to him than Kriza. On religious matters he did not write much, but what he wrote was full of deep feeling, and showed his great knowledge of theology.

He was worthy that the Hungarian Unitarians should have been proud of him—he was worthy to be so honoured after his death by his nation. Let all Unitarians rejoice that we had such a man as he was.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 74d. and 1s. 14d. labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Occasional Notes.

DEATH OF THE REV. W. A. POPE.—We deeply regret to record the death of the Rev. W. A. Pope, of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, by a fearful accident on the Great Gable in Cumberland. We understand that Mr. Pope and a number of friends, including the Rev. C. J. Perry of Liverpool, the Rev. F. Summers of George's-row, London, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot of Leeds and his family,—twelve in all—went up the Great Gable from Sty Head Pass, on Monday afternoon, August 7. As they approached the summit light mists came on, obscuring the surrounding heights. The track and the piles of stones guided them easily to the top. There Mr. Pope (who had shown himself a very active walker) resolved, with one of his companions, to descend on to Green Gable, with the view of reaching Honister Pass. The rest of the party returned safely by the way they had ascended. Mr. Pope and his friend mistook the direction in which Green Gable lay, did not find the track, and left the guiding piles of stones. The descent led them down the precipitous rocks hanging over Ennerdale, until, having passed several difficult places, they were within fifty feet of the grass slopes which they saw below them. There, in attempting to pass across a sloping shelf, Mr. Pope slipped and fell backwards. His body was found early on Tuesday morning; the only injuries were on the head, and indicated that death, if not instantaneous, must have been very speedy. He was buried yesterday in the churchyard at Rosthwaite.

The venerable C. T. Brooks, formerly minister of the Unitarian Church at Newport, Rhode Island—Channing's birth place—writes that it is proposed to devote a chamber in the Sunday-school house, in the rear of the church, to the purpose of a Channing Cabinet, for the preservation of such memorials of Dr. Channing as the kindness of his friends may help us to obtain. Copies of all his works in their various editions; of books once owned by him; letters or other autographs of his; likenesses of him, whether bust, portrait, or profile, or pictures of places interesting by association with any period of his life,—any such relics will be gratefully accepted.

COLONEL RAMSAY, in his "Recollections of Military Service and Society," tells two good stories of Pio Nono:—"Not long before his death a very stout lady went to see him week after week. Being at times irritable from the state of his nerves, he said on one occasion, 'What, madam, are you here again?' 'Yes,' she replied; 'faith brings me here, your Holiness.' 'Ah!' said the Pope, 'you English know your Bibles well. I suppose you remembered that it is written there that faith removes mountains.' Upon one occasion an Englishman went to pay his respects to him who could speak no language but his own. Prior to going he had endeavoured carefully to commit to memory the terms he was told he should address him in. However, on presentation, he got into a terrible state of nervousness, and forgot everything. Sacred, in English, was the only word that would come to his memory. This he attempted to translate into French, and what he eventually succeeded in calling the Holy Father, who burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, was 'Sacré Père.' The former of these anecdotes is hardly equal to the similar one which is told of Dr. Mountain, who was chaplain to George III. The Archbishop of York had died suddenly, and the King was telling his chaplain of his difficulty as to appointing a successor. 'Sire,' said Dr. Mountain, 'if your Majesty had faith as a grain of mustard, you would say to this Mountain, 'Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea.'"

COLONEL RAMSAY gives some amusing selections from the sermons of Watson, Bishop of Calcutta. This is one extract:—"But, my brethren, there are sinners everywhere. There are sinners even amongst these dear little children [pointing to the Sunday-school children right and left of him], and there are a vast number of old sinners in front of me," waving his hands over the heads of the Governor-General and staff, Members of Council, heads of departments, &c. The following story of Lord Beaconsfield's early youth is probably new. It was told to Colonel Ramsay by an old lady, who, perhaps, was a little ill-natured:—"When a girl she used to dine with her parents at an annual Christmas dinner given by Mr. Murray, of Albemarle-street, to his literary friends. D'Israeli the elder and his family were always there. After dinner the children were allowed to play a round game together; but after the first year they all refused to play with Master Ben because he cheated so."

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY had a caustic saying about the majority of preachers, "They aim at nothing, and they hit it." Mr. Mozley, who tells the story, adds, "Is it possible to describe better his own Episcopate?"

ONE of the best Greek puns we ever saw is recorded in Mr. Mozley's "Oriental College Reminiscences," reviewed on another page. It was made by one of his schoolfellows at the Charterhouse, the late G. R. Marriott, brother of the more famous Charles Marriott. Seeing Mozley making a map, he glanced over the work with the sarcastic comment, Μὰψ, ἀνὰ οὐ κατὰ κόσμον.

A VALUED correspondent writes:—"It is scarcely credible that Mr. Lowell, the recipient, and the American consuls, the donors of a birthday present, referred to in your 'Occasional Notes' last week, should all have been ignorant of the period of life signified by the term, 'the grand climacteric.' The climacteric year is always some multiple of seven, and the grand climacteric is sixty-three, which appears to be Mr. Lowell's age."

A GOOD story is told of Bishop Burgess, the "gig-bishop," as he was styled, because he had been met making the round of the diocese of St. David's in a vehicle of that sort. He was brother of the well-known manufacturer of sauces and pickles in the Strand, and is said to have suggested as a suitable motto when he set up his carriage, Gravi jamdudum sarcia cura.

WE are glad to learn that the prospects of University Hall, under the new Principal's management, are as good as they possibly can be. Besides the divinity students of Manchester New College, several lay students of University College have entered their names, and the Hall will certainly open in October with its full number of thirty or thirty-one students, and probably have a few outside applicants waiting for vacancies. The only matter for wonder is that the present plan was not tried many years ago.

WE are glad to see that an association is to be formed to bring about the abolition of the absurd Blasphemy Laws, which are a disgrace to an enlightened age. The Rev. W. Sharman, F.G.S., is taking the lead, and has issued a circular, from which we quote the following paragraphs:—

"The vindictive and malicious attempt of a member of the House of Commons to revive an obsolescent statute for purposes of partisan political persecution calls attention to the dangers to religious liberty that will arise from time to time so long as such statutes are unrepealed. It is therefore proposed to form an association for the purpose of procuring the repeal of all laws relating to heresy and blasphemy. A meeting to complete the organisation of the association will be held in London shortly after the re-assembling of Parliament."

The treasurer, pro tem, is Dr. J. Merrifield, F.R.A.S., of Gascoyne-place, Plymouth.

LORD DERBY, having been invited by Mr. Sharman, to become a vice-president of the association, has written declining at present to ally himself with the society, but adding, "I agree with the object you have in view, and will support it in Parliament." Professor F. W. Newman also, in a letter to Mr. Sharman, writes:—"I heartily concur with you as to the desirableness of the utter repeal of the laws against heresy and blasphemy. I agree with a Hebrew Psalmist and with Tiberius Cæsar, that vengeance for sins committed against God belongs to God."

But if it were otherwise, no existing English Court could be trusted to administer such laws. Therefore, if an association rise limited to the object of their repeal, I shall wish it success."

WE learn from the Boston Christian Register that the tenth meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches will be held at Saratogo Springs in the week beginning September 18 next. The Council will meet at eight o'clock on Monday evening. The Conference will assemble in the Methodist Church on Tuesday morning at ten o'clock. The Rev. Grindall Reynolds, the chairman, will read the report of the Council, and will be followed by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Leicester, England, who will read an essay upon "Jesus Christ's Unfulfilled Ideal of Religious Unity." At half-past seven p.m. of Tuesday the Rev. Charles G. Ames, of Philadelphia, will preach the convention sermon. Other essays will be given by the Revs. George Batchelor, John C. Learned, and Francis G. Peabody; and each of them will be immediately followed by a discussion, to be opened by designated speakers. Wednesday evening is set apart for a public meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Association, and Thursday evening for the consideration of the religious education of the young. Among the more important of the subjects demanding the most serious and thoughtful deliberation of the Conference will be the proposition of Mr. J. H. Wade, of Cleveland, to endow a theological school in his city, and the bearing of this offer upon the future of the Meadville School; and the report of the committee appointed "to consider how the National Conference and the American Unitarian Association can more effectually co-operate without sacrifice of the advantages belonging to either."

THE Rev. Brooke Herford and Mrs. Herford gave a farewell reception to their parish at Chicago on the 6th July, on which occasion they were each delightfully surprised by the gift of a gold watch from their generous people.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND WALES.—The report for 1881 of the Committee of Council on Education (England and Wales) has been issued. It states that in the year ended August 31, 1881, the inspectors visited 18,062 day schools in England and Wales, to which annual grants were made, these furnishing accommodation for 4,389,633 scholars, or rather more than one-sixth of the population. There were on the registers the names of 4,045,362 children, of whom 1,268,250 were under seven years of age, 2,573,081 between seven and thirteen, 157,584 between thirteen and fourteen, and 45,727 above fourteen. These figures show some improvement upon the returns quoted in the last report, the accommodation having increased by 148,880 school places (or 3.51 per cent.), and the scholars on the registers by 149,538 (3.84 per cent.). The average attendance also has increased by 112,619 (4.09 per cent.), and, the number of children individually examined by 91,465 (4.8 per cent.). The annual Government grant to elementary day schools rose in the year from £2,180,009 to £2,247,507, or from 15s. 5½d. to 15s. 8½d. per scholar in average attendance; while the grant for the current financial year is estimated at 16s. per head. The number of voluntary schools is now 14,370, with accommodation for 3,196,365, and an average attendance of 2,007,184; while the number of Board schools is 3,692, with accommodation for 1,194,268, and an average attendance of 856,351. The expenditure per scholar in average attendance was for the whole of England and Wales £1 14s. 11½d. in voluntary, and £2 1s. 6d. in Board schools. Of the latter the highest was London (£2 15s. 10½d.), and the lowest Hull (£1 9s. 11d.—1s. 9½d. lower than the Roman Catholic, which are the lowest of the voluntary schools); whilst Bradford was £2 6s. 6d., Liverpool £2 3s. 3½d., Manchester £1 19s. 0½d., Birmingham £1 18s. 1½d., and Leeds and Sheffield both £1 17s. 6½d.

THE TUNKERS have been in convention in America. Disputes have cropped up, and this primitive body of Christians is split up into three parties, each with a separate existence. The law of the sect is that every one shall engage in feet-washing, but many members have fallen away from the practice. Others are conforming to the world in the matter of dress, even committing the unpardonable offence of wearing jewellery.

Reminiscences: Chiefly of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement. By the Rev. T. Mozley, M.A. Two Vols. Longmans. 1882.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

Next to the great personality of John Henry Newman Blanco White is to us the most interesting sketch in the gallery of portraits which stand out in so life-like a way in these fascinating volumes. But Mr. Mozley was not at the time of the Oxford movement in theological sympathy with Blanco White, although there are many indications that subsequently he himself also passed through the valley of the shadow of doubt, and accepted the orthodox position rather as a refuge from universal scepticism than because it wholly satisfied the demands of his intellectual nature. The portrait of Blanco White is not altogether pleasing, and scarcely presents him in his best aspect.

He was residing at Oxford, a member of the University and of Oriel College during the early stage of the Oxford movement, and he brought to the common-room no small contributions of literary gossip, scholastic lore, and philosophy. He was always ready to talk about Spain and the Church he had left when asked about them. Mr. Mozley one day asked him a question respecting the smaller religious houses in Spain. The answer was that in Spain you knew that there were friars in a town, and you knew that there were pigs, and that was all that you cared to know about either. His stories of Allen, Lord Holland's "tame Atheist," whom Macaulay has immortalised in his Essay on Holland House, are stated to have been amusing, but far from pleasant. That personage, our author charitably adds, must, however, have been a kind as well as a very pleasant man. Soon after he had become a member of the University he preached once at St. Mary's, and occasionally assisted at the services; but "it soon became manifest that he was neither physically nor mentally in a state to perform service in the Church of England." Music was his chief solace; for he would almost forget himself when listening to Beethoven, but it was with a smile of depreciation that he described the old ladies at a concert beginning to beat time when they heard their own familiar Handel. He gave a very interesting lecture at the Ashmolean, illustrated with a great variety of instruments. Both Newman and Blanco White were violinists, and Newman's love of that instrument has been mentioned in our former notice. With Reinagle and an amateur Newman and Blanco White had frequent quartettes at the latter's lodging, where Mozley was all the audience, and most interesting it was, he says, to contrast White's excited, and indeed agitated, countenance with Newman's sphinx-like immobility, as the latter drew long rich notes with a steady hand. Mr. Mozley thinks it probable that during the whole period of Blanco White's Oxford residence he was the victim of an inward struggle; and indeed if we remember rightly, that is evident from Mr. Thom's memoir, although the most important part of his Oxford life was left a blank, owing to the refusal of Whately to allow his own letters to be included in the Memoir. "With frequent impulses to religious acts, whether in public or in private, he never gave way to them without the immediate sense of a check that made it impossible to complete the act. As he painfully relates, he could not bless a child, or utter a short prayer, without the instant recurrence of the question, 'Is there a God, and does this mean anything?' About the year 1829, together with Whately, Arnold, Senior, and others he started the London Review. Newman wrote for it an article on poetry, evidently with an aim to make it a ladder of faith; but the Review soon came to an end, followed to the grave with lamentations on the stupidity of the British public. Some anecdotes are told of his life at Oriel, but none of any interest or importance. The following is the most characteristic.

"When his health at all permitted he attended the University sermons, but got little comfort from them. They never admitted a question, not at least in his own direction, for he had been born and bred in a controversy generally going one way.

Edward Churton preached one Sunday a sermon designed to recall and settle the troubled spirits of Oxford, of all schools, in what to him was the faith and practice of his forefathers. 'That man must have brains of cast iron,' was Blanco White's first ejaculation on meeting his friends, and he was evidently more exasperated by the singular quietness and confidence of the preacher than he would have been by the most inflammatory tirade. It was pouring oil on the volcanic heat of his own nature."

The generous nature of the man is indicated in Mr. Mozley's remark that nothing could exceed his kindness to those who would receive favours from him, seek information, and show that they valued his opinion. But he found individualities at the University as strong as his own. "He had passed years of his life in continual dissolution. At Holland House everything was questioned, though with one foregone conclusion. At Oxford his best and most congenial friends found that they must take a stand, and from that time there was a widening chasm between them and Blanco White." In June, 1835, he gave to the world from Liverpool his "Observations on Heresy and Orthodoxy"—recently republished by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—announcing his rejection of the whole patristic theology, and his profession of Christianity as a Unitarian. "Blanco White enjoyed conversation, even with much younger men, from whom he could learn but little; but it frequently occurred that he brought a topic suddenly to a close, gently intimating that he did not think it fair to say all he had to say when the hearer might not be duly prepared for weighing it."

The old story of Hampden's now forgotten "Bampton Lectures," and the condemnation pronounced upon them by men who had never read them, including Bishop Wilberforce and Mr. Gladstone, is told again in a most interesting way. Blanco White brought the scholastic philosophy with him from Seville, and at the time the lectures were written was the only man in Oxford who knew anything about the subject. Hampden, his intimate friend from the first, was thrown a good deal into his society, and was qualified to enter into Blanco White's favourite subject of comment and denunciation.

"They saw one another almost daily, and Blanco White's spirits rose as the time approached for the doom of orthodoxy. Most feelingly did he express his disappointment when he heard that the lecturer had stopped short of that decisive blow which he held to be the legitimate conclusion. The difference between the two men was great, for Blanco White was singularly destitute of judgment, decision, and self-control, whereas Hampden, while ready to make a plunge, yet knew where to land himself."

Mr. Mozley brings forward little actual evidence that Blanco White really had a considerable share in the Bampton Lectures; but his statement amounts to this, that Hampden derived from his friend material assistance in the way of information, authors to be read, and general insight into the subject, in view of the lectures he was about to deliver on the "Scholastic Philosophy Considered in its Relation to Christian Theology." But as the author justly adds:—"What are universities made for, if not to bring students together, and to enable them to compare notions and render mutual services?"

The Oxford movement was in its origin at least a reaction from the old Evangelicism which had outgrown its early reality and earnestness. In the Evangelical scheme both High Churchman and Broad Churchman saw nothing but a system of dogmas framed to create a groundless self-confidence and to foster spiritual pride. "The man inwardly sure of his own salvation and of his Christian sufficiency, and equally sure of the damnation of most people around him, particularly of those he did not like, Whately used to compare to the self-sufficient stoic of the Roman satirist. Such a man was naturally indifferent to further knowledge and improvement, being, indeed, as good as he need be, and only in danger of being so good as to rely on his own merits."

There was a marked contrast between the High Church clergyman and the Evangelical—even more marked in those days than now. The High Churchman was seen daily in his parish visiting the sick and poor, mingling in the active life of his parish with high and low. He was well read in comparison with his ordinary parishioners, was sometimes a peppery polemic, and looked down on Dissenters as an inferior order of creatures. When Sunday came he delivered a cut-and-dry sermon, often in such a tone as to imply that what he was saying was hardly worth your attention. The Evangelical preacher, on the other hand, assumed that the great mass of the people committed to his care were utterly bad or hopelessly trusting in good works. Anyhow, he could discard them altogether from his consideration. He had delivered his message, and that was enough. Relieved thus from close parochial work he preached and heard preaching; frequented platforms, was the star of missionary and philanthropic societies. "The Evangelical preacher very soon discovered that his vocation was not in cottages and hovels, or in farm-houses, or in garrets and cellars, far up and down, in dirty lanes and courts. Very soon, too, did he discover his own great spiritual superiority to the rank and file of the Church, consigned to the only drudgery they were capable of." The doctrine thus everywhere preached was simple enough, and its preachers rejoiced in the simplicity which excluded everything else. "You were to be quite sure not only that you had received a special revelation that Jesus Christ died for you in particular, but also that your salvation was now such a certainty as to place you above all further anxiety. You might have your faults, but you were saved. Your neighbours might have their virtues, but, wanting this personal assurance, they were not saved. They were not even one step on the way to salvation." Mr. Mozley sat under this sort of preaching at Derby up to the time of his ordination, and it is no wonder that afterwards he took refuge from it in the more scholarly and ethical High Church movement. He sums up the effect of this preaching in words which are just as applicable to the vulgar Evangelicalism of the present day, both in and out of the Established Church.

"The impression of the system on my mind, after many years of such sermons, with hardly any relief whatever, was that it put the character of Jesus Christ entirely out of account, and that it reduced the Sermon on the Mount, all the discourses of our Lord, and all the moral arguments and exhortations of St. Paul and other apostles to mere carnalities that no real Christian need have anything to do with. All that is tender, all that is touching, all that appeals to our higher and nobler feelings, all that by which Jesus Christ is the object of unbounded love and adoration, even to those who shrink from the attempt to fathom the mystery of His being, was thrown aside—behind, I should rather say—trampled upon, as likely to lead us astray from the real point at issue, viz., whether we ourselves are personally saved to our own certain knowledge. As to the effect of this preaching, repeated Sunday after Sunday, it was simply none. The sermon was brutum fulmen. Humanity and common sense revolted against such teaching, and it could really no more reach the understanding than so many letters of the alphabet shaken out of a bag upon a table."

We have seen the skill with which Mr. Mozley can describe a character. In a large portion of the second volume he shows that he can analyse doctrines quite as skilfully, and probe to the very foundations the accepted traditions and dogmas of the Church without losing faith in the essential realities. As an Anglican Churchman, who was himself one of the leaders in the great movement he so well describes, he remained steadfast in the golden mean, resisting alike the temptation to be tossed in a sea of doubt with Blanco White, and the still greater temptation to search after an impossible infallibility in the delusive rest of the Church of Rome in company with Newman, Manning, and Faber. Many of the topics he discusses in this volume are concerned with abstruse mysteries of theology, with the authoritative foundations of ecclesiastical orthodoxy, and with the essential distinctions between Anglicanism and Romanism. On first entering a Roman Catholic chapel he feels that "this was truly worship: there was the sense of a Divine Presence; all hearts were as one." He is evidently too just and clear-sighted to tolerate the popular Protestant theory that Romanism is nothing but a sublime system of shams and impostures. Reviewing in the calmness, and with the clear judgment of advanced age, the claims of his own Church, he expresses his impatience of its demand for the reception by its members of an elaborate dogmatic structure, formally disclaiming infallibility, yet professing that every part rests on an equal basis of Biblical certainty. Even in the earliest stage of the Movement he was impressed with Blanco White's searching questions, "What did people mean when they talked of the Church? What was it? Who was it? Where was it to be found? Did it signify more than certain persons agreed to act together, and to make the same profession?" It was Keble, he says, who began at Oriel what some people think the worship of the Church as the mother of us all; and he ingenuously adds—"For my own part I will confess that I had to use great force in regarding the Church as a mother, though there was no gainsaying the fact that I was born in her." Many will feel that if a mother at all she was rather the dura mater. Continuing his confessions, Mr. Mozley tells his readers that he cannot remember the time when he liked the Thirty-nine Articles, or thought them anything else than articles of peace, and worth about as much as articles of peace generally are. The Church Catechism has been the sorest trial of his life, from youth to age the wheel on which he has been racked and tortured. Speaking generally of the Articles, the Catechism, and large portions of the Prayer Book, he suspects them to be "the work of men without knowledge of human nature, without bowels of compassion, working for promotion, and getting it." The Apostle's Creed he thought he understood, but not the interpretations. As for the Athanasian Creed, he says that he could not describe the chaotic medley of notions and sensations that document always raised in him to a very late date. "Reverence long prevented me from saying anything about the Creed, but the less I said the more I felt. The notion of an eternal and hideous punishment, not for one's own sins alone, but for the misfortune of being descended from Adam, lay for at least half my life as an incubus on my soul."

There are deeply interesting chapters on The Sacramental Theories, The Trinity, The Saints, Mariolatry, Holy Writ; on all of which our author ingenuously confesses that he entertained, and apparently still entertains, doubts affecting what are regarded as the essential Orthodox verities. His final position appears to be rather a suspense of faith than actual scepticism or implicit belief. In his last chapter he comes to the following conclusion, with which the advocates of genuine Liberalism generally will heartily concur:—

"Forms, words and customs cannot have that terrible significance which controversialists are apt to give them. There cannot be so much virtue, or so much mischief, in either the positive or the negative side. It cannot make so very much difference whether a man believes the consecrated wafer to be the Body of Christ, or believes it no more than what came from out of the oven; whether he invokes the Saints and the Blessed Virgin, or believes that they cannot hear him, and that they can do him no good; whether he believes there is a virtue in Orders, or nothing but edifying forms; whether he believes in a purgatory or a dead sleep till Judgment Day. A man may, I hope, be 'liberal' as regards such questions, which certainly have a lesser place and rank in Revelation."

One qualification we must add, which the venerable author, whose Reminiscences we have perused and re-perused with so much interest and instruction, will not dissent from, that, whatever a man believes or disbelieves should be after careful examination, and with thorough and conscientious conviction. Then, indeed, it "cannot make so very much difference" as regards his acceptance with God, however closely it may affect his present happiness and spiritual well-being.

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

In the Nineteenth Century this month the most interesting paper is unquestionably Mr. Matthew Arnold's, on "Literature and Science," in reply to Professor Huxley, on which we commented in a leading article last week.

There is but one article relating to theological matters—"Parliamentary Oaths," by Viscount Sherbrooke, who, we are glad to see, is much more radical in religion than he is in politics. His lordship deals in his usual trenchant style both with Lord Redesdale's absurd proposition to create a new declaration of "belief in the existence of a God" in place of the present oath, and the Duke of Argyll's attempt to substitute a solemn affirmation for what Lord Sherbrooke justly styles the "execration" and "blasphemous imprecation" required by the present Parliamentary test. After a conclusive process of reasoning the writer comes to the conclusion that the whole system of oaths, whether consisting of declarations of religious opinion, or involving the vengeance of Heaven on the swearer if he swear falsely, is equally immoral and degrading; that we teach an evil lesson when we accustom people formally on any condition to renounce the aid of a higher Power; that the truth is best attained the less we mix it up with refinements and subtleties; that therefore we ought to go back to the precept which declares that our conversation should be "Yea, yea," or "Nay, nay," and the duty of a citizen to tell the truth in a court of justice will be best enforced by treating it as an obligation which every citizen is bound to perform without any contract, oath, or promise, but subject to severe punishment if he violates or evades it.

These are truly enlightened views, and indicate the immense progress which is made on this vexed question. At first even many of our own friends were in favour of retaining the oath, but allowing an affirmation to those who desired it. This was soon discerned as creating an invidious distinction, and the principle was widely adopted among religious liberals of substituting a simple affirmation for the present oath. We are now advancing one stage further, and begin to see that even an affirmation is quite superfluous, and that all that is needful is simply the signing of the parliamentary roll, for as Lord Sherbrooke justly says—"Every peer who enters Parliament, every commoner who enters the House of Commons, is already bound by the law of the land to be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen. That obligation is imposed by law and implied by the acceptance of every office of trust or dignity which devolves upon a subject. All the execrations in the world cannot make it the more binding; all the promises that can be uttered add nothing to its force."

Mr. Laurence Oliphant's paper, "The Jew and the Eastern Question," is rather political and social than religious; but it is written in the largest spirit of liberality, and is a fine protest against the Christian fanaticism of the Judenhetze. Incidentally it is remarked that the liberal Jews are "gradually abandoning or neglecting the rites of their religion and its ceremonial observances, and in America especially are manifesting a disposition to obliterate the last traces of tribal distinction, and by intermarriage to amalgamate as simple Deists or Unitarians with such of the general community as repudiate the doctrines of Orthodox Christianity." Mr. Oliphant is strongly in favour of the Jewish colonisation of Palestine, and shows that under favourable conditions Jews will take to agricultural pursuits with success. But the chief objection is that Jews themselves, generally speaking, are quite content with their lot in the various countries of their adoption, provided only that full religious and political liberty is conceded, and would regard emigration to Palestine as almost equivalent to expatriation.

In the Contemporary there are three theological papers, the opening one of the number, on "The Salvation Army," in three parts, to which three writers contribute, William Booth, the "General" of the Army; Frances Power Cobbe, and the Rev. Randall T. Davidson. Mr. Booth, as "the person who has had the best possible opportunity of knowing all about the Salvation Army," gives a very interesting sketch of its origin and subsequent course during the last seventeen years; and his account certainly confirms the favourable estimate we have before expressed of this remarkable movement, widely as we differ from many of its doctrines and methods. It is a movement which is evidently exercising a most beneficial influence on multitudes of persons who have not been reached by existing religious agencies, and ought to be regarded by liberal thinkers with at least as much interest and sympathy as most thoughtful observers now regard the early Methodist revival of Wesley and Whitefield. Miss Cobbe, writing under the heading, "The Last Revival," is more cynical and less sympathetic than we expected, and characteristically thinks that Mrs. Booth is "the soul of whatever is best in the movement." She seems to be more impressed with its irreverence and extravagances than with the admitted practical results, and evidently regards it rather as another form of fetishism than a revival of the spirit of true religion. The last sentence of her article, which is also its key-note, seems to us eminently unjust:—"When all is said, there is no doubt that the mischief done is deplorable, when Prayer and Praise are parodied in the streets, and Repentance turned into the standing jest of a gin-palace." But whose fault is that—the sincere enthusiasts of the Salvation Army, or the parodists and publicans? Under the heading, "The Methods of the Salvation Army," the Rev. R. T. Davidson writes in a much more sympathetic tone, and, writing from personal attendance, and careful study of its publications, points out some of the principal causes of the success of the movement, candidly acknowledges the character, ability, and zeal of its leaders, and next shows the inherent danger and weakness of the present system as a permanent power of good. After the frankest and fullest criticism he, nevertheless, says in conclusion, as we are inclined to say, "I believe in its high aims; I believe in its great possibilities; I believe in the earnestness and power of the leaders at its head; I pray that God may give them, by his Spirit, a right judgment to direct its progress and to reform its faults." We confess that we prefer Mr. Davidson's tone to Miss Cobbe's. The other theological articles are "The Turning-Point of the Middle Ages," the second part of Mr. W. S. Lilly's sketch of Hildebrand and his age; and "Church and Democracy at Geneva," by Canon Fremantle, whose general conclusions are stated as follows:—

"1. The Christian Church does not necessarily lose its characteristics by being without obligatory forms, creeds, articles, liturgies, and subscriptions. Some of these things are good, some bad, some indifferent, none essential. He who believes Christianity to be the ultimate expression of man's relation to God and of human morality may justly infer from the Genevese experience that it is possible for the Church without any of these adjuncts still to flourish, and that the people may still recognise it as an organ of the Divine beneficence. We may put away all fear on this score, and adapt our institutions boldly to the wants of our day. If the extreme system of Liberalism which has been adopted at Geneva has not ruined the Church, nor even seriously impaired its stability, the much more moderate reforms which are demanded in the English and Scotch Churches need cause us no alarm.

"2. But this does not imply that we should be careless about such things. The Church at Geneva has suffered from the meagreness of its liturgical, perhaps also in its confessional, elements. We should be careful not to do away with these needlessly. We should be still more careful not to bind ourselves to an anti-popular theory. And most of all, we should be careful not to present Christianity as a scene of discord. If we are neglectful of these things, the Christian institutions, though they may not be destroyed, may suffer great loss and run great danger in our hands.

"3. Lastly, we may learn to put away all irrational fears about the 'manifest destiny' or 'evident drift' of Liberalism, either away from Christianity or towards the destruction of Christian institutions. We may appeal to the Democracy to judge fairly; and if Christian institutions are shown by their real service to mankind to be worth preserving, we may believe that popular movements and free discussion will bring this out, and establish Christian teaching and Christian ministries on a basis firmer than in any former age—that is, in the minds and the affections of an instructed and willing people."

In both the Reviews the crisis in Egypt is a prominent feature. In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Edward Dicey, writing on "England's Intervention in Egypt," repeats the views he has previously expressed in the same Review, advocating a European Protectorate, with the restoration of the Khedive as an independent ruler. He does not conceal his preference for direct annexation to England if that were at all likely to be adopted, and we are not sure that the irresistible progress of events will not force us to that solution of the difficulty, almost against our will. In the Contemporary, Professor Sheldon Amos, who has resided for some time in Egypt, in an article on the same subject, advocates very similar views, repelling the assumption that all revolution against the Khedive's Government should command popular sympathy in England; maintaining that the time must come when the slender link between Turkey and Egypt must be snapped asunder, and that it will be far preferable for the future to entrust the supervision of the country to one Power alone rather than to two or more—that Power, of course, to be England, ruling through the Khedive with its ordinary diplomatic representative exercising the peculiar powers entrusted to a British Resident in a native Indian State. "Of course, it is a sine qua non that the present Egyptian army be broken up, its organisation wholly reconstructed, and its numbers reduced to the limit needed to guard its frontiers, and preserve internal order."

In the Nineteenth Century the most attractive article next to those we have mentioned is that entitled "An American View of Ireland," by E. L. Godkin, an Anglo-Irish American, who justifies the Irish side of his nationality by his fervid eloquence and frequent exaggeration. He candidly acknowledges in limine that "there is nothing in English history finer than the efforts of Englishmen of late years to deal with the Irish question, without regard to their own very strong prejudices;" while at the same time he greatly overstates "the anti-Irish feeling of the great body of Englishmen—a feeling composed of dislike and contempt in about equal parts." While avowing his repugnance to the methods by which Irishmen have of late been seeking to dissolve their connection with England, he also states that he has until recently underestimated the strength and prominence of Irish hatred of England which the English hatred of Irishmen has at last produced. We hope, as we have said, that this is greatly exaggerated, as also the statement that in America this hatred is apparently cultivated by the Irish as a sort of religion, and is transmitted to the second generation, which knows Ireland only by hearsay. There would be more reason if it were limited to the landlord class, who have for the most part done their best to ruin the country and keep the people in a state of hopeless degradation. There is much in this painfully interesting article that calls for careful attention, but almost the only part of it with which we entirely agree is that which shows the utter unfitness of good Mr. Forster of Bradford, to play the part of a despotic dictator of Ireland.

The remaining articles in the Nineteenth Century, which we can do little more than barely enumerate, are "A Cry from the Indian Mahomedans," by Syed Ameer Ali, who shows that they are in a depressed and despairing condition as compared with the Hindoos, and that every hope for the regeneration of India now depends on the spread of English education and the diffusion of Western ideas; "Homes of the Poor in London," by Sir R. A. Cross, who gives a good deal of valuable information, but who, we may remark, is the author of the unworkable Industrial Dwelling's Act of 1875; "The Royal Academy of Music," a concise statement by Professor G. A. Macfarren of the efforts made in recent times for the advancement of music in England, and a plea for strengthening the existing institution rather than originate a new one. "Comets," a popular scientific essay by Mr. Huggins, F.R.S.; "The Laws of War," a discussion of the law of "Maritime Capture," by the eminent Belgian Economist, M. de Laveleye; and "Cetshwayo and Zululand," a fervent plea for justice to a weaker race, by Lady Florence Dixie, who concludes with the dismal prediction that "if the Zulus learn that England will not award them justice, they will rise, and in the struggle which will ensue be read the bloodstained letters of a cruel policy."

In the Contemporary the remaining articles are "The Poems of William Morris," a discriminating criticism by A. Lang; "Canada as an Emigration Field," a couleur de rose sketch by Dr. James Macgregor; "Medical Women for India," by Dr. Francis Hoggan, who points out that there is a fine future for practice among native women; "Co-operative Agriculture in Germany," in which Mr. John Rae shows from the remarkable experiments at Posegnick and elsewhere that co-operation is better adapted to agriculture than to most other branches of industry, while it has hitherto been less applied to it; "The Official Expenses of Elections," a timely appeal for economy, by Sydney C. Buxton; "The British Lion," not that of the heralds, but a geological sketch of the antediluvian king of beasts when he first appeared in Britain, by Professor Boyd Dawkins; and finally, a poem by Alfred Austen, entitled "Off Mesolongi," in memory of the closing scene in the life of his "earliest master."

On the whole the Nineteenth Century this month bears the palm.

Literary Notes.

DR. SCRIVENER has in the press a third edition of his "Introduction to the New Testament," the new features of which will be an account of all fresh materials for textual criticism to the present date, including the recent researches of the Dean of Chichester, and fresh information respecting the Egyptian versions, contributed by the Bishop of Durham. The chief alterations introduced into the received Greek text by the revisers of the New Testament will also be examined in their relation to the critical principles of Profs. Hort and Westcott.

At the recent tercentenary celebration of the University of Wurzburg, in Bavaria, the honorary Doctor title was conferred on the following Englishmen on Wednesday week:—The Postmaster-General (Mr. Fawcett), Professor Frankland, Professor Huxley, Professor Lister, Sir John Lubbock, Sir James Paget, Dr. Purking, Charles William Siemens, all of London, and Alexander Bell, of Edinburgh.

MR. F. E. COLENSO is about to publish a pamphlet entitled "Sir Bartle Frere's Last Attack on Cetewayo." It contains a reply to an article hostile to the ex-King, which Sir B. Frere has lately written in a Plymouth journal.

We learn from the New York Publishers' Weekly that the Postmaster-General at Washington has officially directed that Mr. Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" be allowed to pass "unmolested through the mails." This cancels an order for its suppression which had been issued by the postmaster at Boston.

THE General Conference of the Lutheran Church in Germany will be held at Schwerin, from the 15th to the 17th of August. One of the debates will be on the question of a Lutheran "Book of Common Prayer."

THE first issue of reply post-cards will be made to the public on the 2nd October next. Foreign reply post-cards will also be issued, and they will be applicable for transmission to all countries within the Postal Union.

THE Academy says that another famous library is to be dispersed. The Books and MSS. at Towneley Hall, Lancashire, are to be sold by auction in London. The transcripts made by Christopher Towneley in the seventeenth century have proved a mine of information for the antiquaries and historians of later generations. The Towneley Library is, in fact, a memorial of one of the most notable families that Lancashire has produced.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND CO., of Boston, U.S., have in the press a large number of books, which they will publish during the autumn. Of these we may mention the following as of interest to readers on this side of the Atlantic. The most important is a new edition of the works of Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in six or eight volumes, carefully revised and edited by the author himself, who is giving special attention to "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," annotating and enlarging it from a great amount of material accumulating for years. Among the others are:—A new edition of Hawthorne's works, in twelve volumes, with bibliographical introduction to each novel, by Mr. G. P. Lathrop, son-in-law of Hawthorne; a complete collected edition of the poems of Mr. Aldrich, with thirty illustrations (including a portrait of the author), designed and engraved by members of the "Paint and Clay Club" of Boston; "The Letters of Mrs. Lydia Maria Child," with biographical introduction by Mr. Whittier, and an appendix by Mr. Wendell Phillips (these letters cover a period of half a century, from 1830 to 1890); "Wit and Humour of the South, from the various Southern Humourists of the last Half Century," compiled and edited by Mr. Henry Watterston, the editor of a well-known newspaper at Louisville; "The Life of Fenimore Cooper," by Prof. T. R. Lounsbury, of Yale College, a volume in the "American Men of Letters" series; Lives of President Andrew Jackson, by Prof. W. G. Sumner; John Randolph of Roanoke, by Mr. Henry Adams; and President Thomas Jefferson, by Mr. J. T. Morse, Jun., these forming parts of the series of "American Statesmen"; "Notes on Men and their Books," by Mr. James T. Fields, edited by his widow; "Dr. Zay," a new novel by Miss Phelps, now running in the Atlantic Monthly; and "The English and Scotch Ballads," a complete variorum edition, collected and edited by Prof. Child, of Harvard College, parts I. and II., to be completed, at short intervals, in eight parts in quarto.

THE book on "Lambeth Palace and its Associations," by the Rev. J. Cave-Browne, which has been so long announced, will be published by Messrs. Blackwood this month. It will have illustrations, and an Introduction by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN has a volume of lyrical poems in the press, which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. in the course of the autumn under the title of "Soliloquies in Song."

THE first volume of a large work on the electric light will shortly be published at the office of Engineering, written by several contributors under the general editorship of Mr. James Dredge.

M. RENAN has finished a complete index to his "History of Christianity," in seven volumes. He has already commenced a new work, of which the subject will be the history of the Jews before Christ.

MR. MURRAY will shortly publish two books about India—"Religious Thought and Life in India," by Professor Monier Williams, and "Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social," by Sir Alfred C. Lyall.

A WHITE marble tablet has been placed upon the house in Paris which occupies the site of that in which Pascal died.

PROFESSOR MINTON is preparing an article on John Stuart Mill for the Encyclopedia Britannica, which will contain some particulars hitherto unpublished concerning Mill's connection with the Reader, and his life at Avignon.

MR. SAINTSBURY'S "Short History of French Literature" will be published in September by the Clarendon Press. The author aims at presenting a complete but succinct history, with full biographical and historical details, of the whole course of French literature, compiled from an examination of that literature itself, and not merely from previous accounts of it. Illustrative specimens are given only in Book I., which deals with mediæval literature, the illustration by extract of the later literature, from Villon to Hugo, being reserved for a separate volume, which is now in preparation.

MR. BOSWORTH SMITH is well advanced with his "Life of Lord Lawrence," but the complete work will probably not be published until the February of next year.

THE next volume in the series of "Philosophical Classics for English Readers" will be Sir "William Hamilton," by Prof. John Veitch, of Glasgow.

DR. J. A. LANGFORD, of Birmingham, will soon have ready "The Bright Birthday Book;" selected and arranged from the speeches and letters of the Right Hon. John Bright, M.P. It is proposed to issue this book as a souvenir of the commemoration of Mr. Bright's twenty-five years' connection with Birmingham.

HORSHAM.—A congregational pic-nic in connection with the Free Christian Church took place on the Bank Holiday, at Handcross Park, the seat of John Warren, Esq., who had kindly offered his extensive and beautifully situated grounds for the purpose. Notwithstanding several previous engagements and counter attractions, a party of between fifty and sixty arrived at Handcross about twelve o'clock, and after being cordially welcomed by Mr. Warren and friends, entered into the full enjoyment of the varied natural beauties, objects of interest, and of games which had been provided for the entertainment of the guests. The proceedings terminated with appropriate words of thanks to Mr. Warren for his kindness, spoken by the Rev. J. Taylor and Mr. W. Nash, and endorsed by the hearty cheers of the company. The party was deeply indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, with whom the suggestion and organisation of this most happy social meeting mainly rested.

THE POLITICS OF SCHOLARS.

The Literary World writes:—

Scholarly men are, as a rule, somewhat tepid politicians; and strange as it may seem, lean as often as not to the side of reaction and authority. We need not quote the well-known cases of Hume and Gibbon, both of whom combined political absolutism with religious free-thinking. Their Liberalism exhausted itself in pulling down the popular religion, and left them no taste or temper for the popular ideas as to government. Their religious scepticism seems to have generated a kind of political cynicism. The people who were such fools as to accept a certain superstition about "one Jesus who was dead, and whom Paul affirmed to be alive," could not be worthy of political liberty. If they were given it they would make away with it as a monkey would with a watch. They are not to be trusted with such a precious machine as a constitutional system; and so, political reaction was the inevitable sequel of religious scepticism in their case as in that of Hobbes. The race of Hobbists never was so numerous as in our day. In Germany it is the same; though Hegel, not Hobbes, is the name these cynics profess to follow. France, if we may judge by M. Renan, is no better off. If we had to put it to the vote of the Forty Immortals of the Academy, we fear the Republic would have short shrift, and another Cæsar would be brought back in the hopes of bringing back with him what has been described by those who cheat themselves with phrases,—the Augustan Age of Literature. This is why, and we say it with regret, Universities are not as a rule the best nursing mothers of sound political thought. Oxford is not exceptionally unfortunate in its tendency to produce a race of Hobbists, or Hegelians, as the case may be. Other Universities also tend to foster the same type of cynicism and scepticism, though it must be admitted that the flavour of Oxford cynicism is peculiar. There is sweetness and light there:—the Philistine, as he is called, is slain there weekly by dear little Davids with a sling and a stone of Saturday Reviewing; the Matthew Arnold tone of contempt for the middle class in general, and Dissenters in particular, is caught up to perfection, and this is passed off in mutual admiration circles as Culture. Bildung is the correct High Dutch term for this new cant of the age fresh from the land,

Which produced one Kant with a K,
And many more cants with a C.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND MORTUARY FEES.

The Times writes:—

The Report on Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees has not quite so wide a subject as the title seems to promise. Indeed, while mortuary fees are a very rare legal curiosity, all that the Select Committee has had to do with ecclesiastical fees has been to show that the fees in question are not ecclesiastical. As it stands, however, the report is an interesting contribution to what may be called the most anomalous chapter in the story of our earthly existence. That chapter is the little cloud of absurdities, superstitions, extortions, and weaknesses that always hovers round the disposal of our poor mortal remains. The occasion is like that fog which the bard describes as more convenient to robbers than night itself. The pomp we pass by; it is the service and the grave and the memorial that this committee had to do with. The old canon law, still in force upon the clergy, absolutely forbids burial fees, and, as a fact, in the great majority of parishes the clergy do not receive burial fees. But various customs have grown up, with more or less justification in the circumstances, and in some cases for reasons not apparent, though probable. The origin of the burial fees is found in the fact that something is actually done, and something is actually given, at a burial. A grave is dug, and a piece of ground given for a shorter or longer term. For these two things it is proper that payment should be made. The case of the sexton is clear; not so that of the soil. Under the extravagant fiction that the churchyard is the parson's freehold, he has made it a marketable commodity, and sold it in lots to those that bid high enough. A clergyman may refuse burial to non-parishioners—that is, to persons dying out of the parish—and he may, therefore, put a price on his consent. There is no harm in the price if it be properly applied; but when the consent rests with the clergyman he is under some temptation to favour those who come with pompous funerals and order brick graves, iron rails, and monuments in the churchyard or the church. But this leads to what really must be called the enormous abuse of a churchyard, quite sufficient for reasonable burial for all time, being so occupied with massive structures as to exclude the poor crowd content to die and be buried. A churchyard may have been added to from time to time out of the rates, but the whole is an acre of monumental slabs and altar tombs, with the exception of a small corner turned up again and again for the poor. Such is the material aspect of the abuse. The ecclesiastical is worse. All this ground really belongs to the parish, the clergyman being only the trustee for its proper use. But now for so long a period that custom has indurated into a right he has been pocketing the price paid for "breaking of the ground," as it is called, and the higher prices for the perpetual appropriation, that is alienation, of the ground. By the same rule he has been receiving the price for wall space, and even floor space in the church. A "perpetual appropriation" is assumed in the bargain, but the Select Committee points out that upon every new claim for interment the clergyman may order it in what part of the churchyard he judges to be best, without respect to old interments, if in the course of nature they are no longer in the way. It is obvious that the wages of the sexton and the price of the soil for a few years, or for a hundred, are not ecclesiastical fees, and that the clergyman really has nothing to do with them.

In the present century these abuses have reached a second stage, showing the superstructure that can be raised on any basis of error. It is now half a century since the formation of Kensal-green Cemetery by Act of Parliament, followed in five years by the Act authorising Brompton Cemetery. The cemetery companies provided the ground, the labour, and the service when required. They were, therefore, wholly independent of the parochial clergy. The latter, however, successfully maintained a claim to burial fees, though it had never before occurred to any clergyman to claim a fee for a body carried out of his parish into another for burial. As the Select Committee observes, the greater part of this fee was claimed in respect of what belonged to the parish, not to the clergyman, while the canon law forbade him to demand a fee for his own ministration. It further calls attention to the fact that no burial fee has ever yet been recovered from any one refusing to pay it. He may be brought into the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the custom may be successfully pleaded against him, but when the court has ordered him to pay and he refuses, all it can do is to notify the fact in Chancery, which can do nothing in the matter. The metropolitan clergy, however, are a powerful body, and they succeeded in obtaining a statutable right to a large fee in respect of every person dying in their parishes and buried in a public cemetery, though they found neither soil, nor manual labour, nor ministration. During the last five years Kensal-green has paid £434 in these fees; Brompton Cemetery, £3,984; and Woking, £467. As Brompton Cemetery is now the property of Government, there is nobody, except the general taxpayer, to complain of the figure it makes in this reckoning. Thirty years ago parochial cemeteries were authorised by two general Acts, respectively for the metropolis and for the rest of England. Nothing could exceed the animosity these measures had to encounter, and the odium incurred by their advocates. They introduced unconsecrated burial grounds all over the country, and Nonconformist services side by side with conformity. They enabled Nonconformists to be buried without the ministrations of the Established Church, and in that case without paying a fee to its ministers. If, however, the Nonconformists preferred burial in the consecrated portion, which they had helped to buy and lay out for interments, they were bound to pay a fee to their parochial clergyman, though having no use of his services. It is very clear that fees paid for nothing at all, that is for things not contributed by the person claiming the fee, will always be unpopular and a source of trouble. Nor will the matter be mended by reducing the fees very low. In the old books on Christian morality burying the dead is one of the seven works of mercy that is of the acts of free kindness done by the richer to the poorer. It would be much better that the Church should not be left in the invidious position of demanding even so little as two shillings for the burial of a poor creature who did not leave a shilling in the world, and to whose survivors that trifle is a consideration. However, it is not the amount; it is the tribute to the religion established by law that generally constitutes the grievance. If Church people could only put themselves in the place of Dissenters, they would see that the two shillings are hardly worth the ill-feelings roused by the demand.

Mortuary fees are curiosities; indeed, very few have ever heard of them. They are sums to be paid on any death to the clergyman of the parish, according to the supposed property of the deceased, as estimated by some rough rule. The custom varies, and is found in very few parishes. Anti-quarians have asked what the payment could be for, and they have suggested that, as the Church had to do a good deal immediately upon the death, and, in fact, did much that now falls to the undertaker, the fee was a security. The custom is not popular, and when it has lost its reason has lost its defence. The lawyers cannot even plead in such a case that the custom presumes an equivalent, though we do not happen to know what it was. The report also deals with another curiosity, surviving in the Principality, where you may either pay a fee or give an offering. As one penny is offering enough and dispenses with a "fee," it seems hardly worth while to advise upon such a trifle. The Select Committee, by a bare majority, recommend the abolition of all burial fees, reserving the rights of living recipients. They anticipate, however, that some livings will lose much by the abolition, and the efficiency of the Church be thereby affected. What is to be done? The answer to this question will not meet with universal approbation. Looking about them they note that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have an unappropriated balance of two-thirds of a million sterling. They think this might be drawn upon in the interests of justice and peace. On a similar suggestion, Bishop Wilberforce exclaimed, "a good many people are bringing their pails to that cow." Large as is the unappropriated balance, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have a good deal to do with it, and with the interest too. There are thousands of clergy who are much poorer than those concerned in the retention or abolition of burial fees, and they have a prior claim to consideration, for there is no taint of injustice or of abuse in their plea. Any withdrawal of income will affect the calculations on which the Commissioners make their grants. The question suggested by the Select Committee will then necessarily present itself, and the decision need not to be forestalled by an enactment which would have a tendency to cripple, not to say paralyse, their action. So much for "burial fees," considered as a part of the clerical income, though prohibited by canon law, and not recoverable by any law. There remains the distinct question of payments for burial—that is, for the ground, the enclosure, and the memorial. All these are out of the property of the parish, and generally they entail future cost to it. It is the parish, through some proper organisation, that should make the concessions of ground or wall space required, receive the proper payment, and administer the proceeds.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.—On Monday last (Bank Holiday), Miss J. D. Smith, of King's Ride, Ascot, with Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Lawrence, entertained the teachers of the three London Domestic Mission Sunday-schools and the teachers of a few other schools, numbering in all nearly 200, at King's Ride, to dinner and tea; also most generously defrayed all the costs of the rail to Ascot and back. The day was spent in their fine grounds in a most enjoyable way. During the afternoon the Stepney teachers gave a concert on the lawn. After tea and the singing of a hymn, several hearty cheers were given to Miss Smith and also to Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Lawrence. On leaving the grounds Miss Smith presented every visitor with a very beautiful bouquet. It will be a day long remembered by the London teachers.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are securities of health to all nations of whatever clime. They have given hope, relief, and comfort to millions. In constitutions debilitated by excesses of any kind, or in general prostration of the system, their effect is tonic and restorative. They eradicate from the system the mortal cause of ailment, and renew in the frame its pristine animation, health and vigour. They greatly increase the appetite, give tone to the stomach, assist the digestion, and impart elasticity to the spirits; their essence enters the circulation, and carried through its course exerts its cleansing power over every organ. In the lungs they effect most striking changes, converting the impure venous into pure arterial blood, by which the whole frame is recruited and interstitial deposits removed.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Owing to the death, by a most lamentable accident, of the Rev. W. A. Pope, our valued friend and missionary at our Spicer-street station, the Committee have begged their old friend Mr. Corkran to take charge of his former station for the next few weeks. In the kindest way he has consented, and will receive all communications connected with the Mission at Spicer-street, or at 28, Colveston-crescent, West Hackney.

"AGNOSTIC SERVICES."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The Inquirer of 29th ult. was received by me in a distant part of the country too late in last week to enable me to reply to Mr. Jeffery's letter. Indeed, I do not know that I should have had occasion to trouble you with an answer to it had not that gentleman stated that I have "entirely evaded" his question, or as he should have said, two questions, for he asked two, involving words such as "prayer," "worship," "God," "Unitarian service," of which many definitions may be given, and which cannot, therefore, be answered by "saying yes or no," as if they related to a mere matter of fact. But it is clear that I gave the best answer that could be given, for we now learn that Mr. Jeffery has attended Mr. Conway's services, and what impressions he has received from them; and as those impressions are widely different from those they made on me, it is evident that it was better to refer the matter to your respected correspondent's own judgment than to trouble him and your readers with mine. Mr. Jeffery uses the expressions I have quoted above in both his letters, and appears to think that no one can attach any other meaning to them than he does, though he ought to know that they are all susceptible of being variously understood. Your correspondent seems also to suppose that there is some special form of religious service which alone constitutes what he is pleased to call "Unitarian service;" but I have yet to learn that the free, creedless, and progressive churches, whose theological opinions and methods of action have been various and continually changing for two hundred years, have adopted any creed or any common form of service to be used by every congregation under penalty of being deprived of the name of Unitarian. The fact is, that this is another attempt to give a dogmatic character to Unitarianism, or, as a minister of one of our larger churches put it the other day, Mr. Jeffery's contention amounts to this:—"If you pray you are a Unitarian, if you meditate you are not."

Mr. Jeffery disputes the accuracy of my recollections of the services of Mr. W. J. Fox, and of my statement that they were substantially (not identically) like those now conducted by Mr. Conway. I did not hear Mr. Fox until 1841 (when his rejection of the Christian miracles had placed him out of harmony with the Unitarianism of that day), but when I had that privilege then and on some subsequent occasions, the tenor and the general effect of his introductory service and lecture were very similar to those of the services and addresses of the present Minister of South-place Chapel. And in confirmation of this I may add that anyone who will compare the chapters on "God" and "The Religion of Humanity" in the "Religious Ideas" of Mr. Fox with that on "Anthropomorphism" in Mr. Conway's "Idols and Ideals," will see how much alike is the underlying thought in both, notwithstanding the difference of phraseology, consequent on the lapse of forty years of marvellous change in the speculative opinions of Europe and America.

Permit me before closing this letter to express my objection to the title, "Agnostic Services," that has been given in the Inquirer to my correspondence with Mr. Jeffery. Such a title pre-judges the question at issue, and is unjust to Mr. Conway, who does not consider himself an Agnostic, as this short extract from one of his works will suffice to show. He says, "It has become the custom to label everybody with a party-name, and they who refuse to personify God are called Agnostics—a word meaning one who does not know, but often held to designate one who worships the Unknownable. But for myself I decline to affirm that anything is unknowable. Nor do I worship the Unknown. What I worship is my ideal as perfect as I can make it. Love, Reason, Right, Beauty are blended and consummated in it." I am quite sure that you do not wish to misrepresent anyone, and as we Unitarians are sometimes annoyed by being called Socinians, we should be careful not to annoy others by giving them names which they repudiate.

LITURGIES AND TESTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Agreeing as I do with the broad and generous tone of the Inquirer, I cannot but regret that your pages so often advocate a liturgical form of public worship. Without mentioning many objections to this form of religious service, I may suggest that a liturgy is the practical imposition of a creed upon both congregation and minister. Personally, I have suffered so much discomfort from the use of liturgies not in harmony with my own religious convictions that I have resolved to decline all engagements to conduct services in which the reading of a liturgy is indispensable; and thus, unfortunately for myself, I am excluded, by a theological test, from a large number of Unitarian pulpits.

Not long ago I found myself engaged to use the following expressions, which to my mind are utterly dishonouring to our highest thoughts of the Divine character: "Remember, we beseech thee, thy ancient mercies; and though we have not shown the love and duty of sons, yet do not thou cast off the kindness and compassion of a father." "For the sake of thy great love in Jesus Christ, we beseech thee to have mercy upon us."

Eight years ago I left the church of my fathers, because I found it was no longer possible to use such phrases; and to maintain the thorough sincerity in thought and word, so essential in a minister of divine truth, I must regard all churches where a liturgy is used as closed against me by a theological test.

LIBERALISM IN PARIS.

We subjoin the principal portions of a letter from Dr. Pressensé, in the Christian World of this week, relating to the liberal religious party in Paris:—

A very significant incident has taken place in connection with the installation of the new pastor of the Church of the "Oratoire," M. Vigié, who, as your readers are already aware, has been appointed to give satisfaction to the Church of Paris, which has not for many years had a pastor whose views were in harmony with its particular opinions. This nomination took place as the result of the triumph of the so-called Liberal party in the elections of the "Oratoire." We approved the nomination, because it was a simple act of equity in a Church united to the State, which has no right to exercise the voluntary principle. Our objections do not refer at all, therefore, to the nomination of M. Vigié, who is an excellent man, justly esteemed by all, an eloquent preacher, and, on the whole, one of the most moderate representatives of the advanced school. His preaching is always characterised by a fervour and earnestness which communicates itself to his hearers. No better choice, therefore, could have been made under the circumstances of the Reformed Church of Paris. The mistake, as it seems to us, was made by the Consistory of Paris, which is the highest ecclesiastical authority in each Church in taking advantage of the fact that the Evangelical party still has the majority in the Consistory which represents all the parishes of the district, and attempting to impose doctrinal conditions on M. Vigié. We do not for a moment doubt that this was done with the best intentions, and from a sincere desire to carry out, as far as possible, the resolutions of the Synod of 1872 as to the religious conditions required of those who are entrusted with the pastoral office. It was easy, however, to foresee that these demands would either be met by a refusal on the part of M. Vigié and his friends, who are not men lightly to change their opinions, and in this case the Consistory would enter on a hopeless struggle, or would have to content itself with an equivocal acceptance of its terms, to which each party would attach an interpretation in accordance with its wishes. This is really what has taken place. The Consistory of the Reformed Church of Paris did not dare to demand adhesion to the Synodal Confession of Faith; it contented itself with asking M. Vigié to pledge himself to read the Liturgy and to teach nothing contrary to the facts therein contained. In order to understand the significance of this condition, we must remember that the Apostles' Creed is the central point of the Liturgy of the Reformed Church. Now the Apostles' Creed expresses in the most categorical manner faith in the supernatural, in the miraculous birth, the Divinity and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Adhesion to the facts contained in this creed is thereby equivalent to the most explicit declaration of the acceptance of the supernatural. Now the party to which M. Vigié belongs has always declined to accept such a declaration as the constitutional basis of the Church. Many of its adherents, and M. Vigié himself, do, as a matter of individual belief, accept the supernatural, but they refuse to make it the credo of the Church, because by doing so they would exclude from its pale those of their friends who do not hold the same opinions. They have had recourse, therefore, to an ingenious mode of satisfying at once the Consistory of Paris and the Liberal party. M. Vigié has replied in the name of his Presbyterian council, that his teaching shall be in harmony with the truths contained in the liturgies. This substitution of truths for facts is a very important change. Adherence to the facts of the Apostles' Creed is something definite; adherence to the truths, as differentiated from the facts, opens the door to all sorts of interpretations. From a doctrinal point of view such a pledge is really worthless, so little does it signify. If any doubt existed on this point, it was dispelled on the day of M. Vigié's installation to office. I can speak with authority on this point, for I was myself present on the occasion. The ceremony was a very imposing one. The church was crowded. For the first time for many years there met within its walls a numerous representation of both sections of Parisian Protestantism, which have been so long at deadly feud. As Pastor Decoppet said, all felt as if a new era were beginning. M. Vigié's sermon was a triumph of eloquence, and displayed his best qualities. But I want to call your readers' attention to the following passage, which seems to me to be the true comment on M. Vigié's adherence to the truths contained in the liturgies. He did not wish to allow his opinions to remain at all ambiguous, and we admire his candour. Speaking of the attitude which the Protestant Church needs to take in view of the demands of the day, he especially urged on it fervour, spirituality, and breadth. In the passage which follows we have in substance his definition of the two latter graces.

"Our religion wants more and more to free itself from the letter which kills, that it may become truly spiritual. We consequently grieve and wound ourselves by the letter, and we hinder and repel those who would come and join us. Instead of holding fast the substance of our dogmas, which alone gives them vitality, we cling to their superannuated form, their repulsive philosophy. In like manner with the Bible, the history of Jesus, for example. Too often we take these artless and poetic narratives to be literal records, instead of eliciting the eternal truth which underlies them. Our liturgies are regarded as if they were exact formulas, which they are not. Our theory of prayer is that it ensures, or ought to ensure, answers from God, while the true conception of prayer is the spontaneous upspringing of a devout heart Godwards. Lastly, with regard to the breadth of charity which ought to characterise the Church, we have been much occupied of late years in purifying the Church—in casting out those who are not worthy of its membership. It would better become us to be seeking those who need to be brought in. The Church should be open to all. Let us transform this fortress with frowning battlements into the Father's house, hospitable, and always standing open. Let us return to the pattern of the Primitive Church, in which so many divergences existed side by side, because high over all rose love to Jesus, the Saviour, the Exemplar, the Truth, the Life."

This, then, is all that the Consistory of Paris has gained by its dogmatic conditions. After all that has been said about its fidelity to principle and adherence to the orthodox resolutions of the Synod of 1872 it has only succeeded in obtaining an equivocal assent. It would have escaped all this difficulty if it had been content to ratify M. Vigié's nomination as a simple matter of equity. We do not mean to impugn the loyalty to truth of either party. Both are acting conscientiously. It is the situation itself which is false, and it is well that this should be recognised.

Can the Evangelical majority of the Consistory affect to believe that the guarantees offered to it by the Presbyterian Council and by M. Vigié are equivalent, or nearly so, to acceptance of the declaration of faith of 1872? Can it adopt the strange course of holding out the hand of brotherly fellowship to the masked, or at least gloved, liberalism of M. Vigié, while it still keeps the door of the Church closed on such a man as M. Dide, whose Liberalism is open and avowed? Instead of concentrating its efforts in securing the outward unity of the Reformed Church, and thus throwing a delusive veil of orthodoxy over its heresies, would it not be a more honourable course to avow frankly that the recent decisions of the French State have once and for ever set aside the fiction of the spiritual unity of the Reformed Church?

E. DE PRESSENSE.

ECCLIASTICAL AND MORTUARY FEES.—The report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees have now been issued. It recommends the immediate repeal of all Acts authorising mortuary fees, saving the rights of existing incumbents. As to burial fees, if they are to be retained at all, the Committee are of opinion that they should be retained only in cases where the Church of England burial service is actually read by or on behalf of the incumbent demanding the fee. There are, it appears to the Committee, two alternative courses open to the Legislature on this subject:—(1)—the abolition of fees for the burial of parishioners within prescribed hours, saving the rights of existing incumbents; and (2) their reduction to a reasonable amount, saving the same rights. In the event of abolition, the Committee suggest that in cases where burial fees form a substantial part of the income of an incumbent the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be empowered to supplement the income so reduced by a payment out of the funds at their disposal; and if the alternative of a reduction of fees should be adopted, the Committee think that 2s. should be the highest amount allowed for the burial of a parishioner, any deficiency in the income of future incumbents to be met by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, as already suggested. Whichever course is adopted, it will be necessary to amend various parochial, local, and proprietary cemetery Acts. Ecclesiastical fees for the burial of parishioners the Committee consider objectionable, and recommend their abolition. The Committee recommend the discouragement by the burial authorities of the use of brick graves and leaden coffins in all graveyards, with a return to the natural mode of interment, and suggest that no incumbent appointed in future shall be allowed to demand any ecclesiastical fee on account of the use of a brick grave or a leaden coffin, or on account of any monument or memorial inscription erected or placed in the parish churchyard or in a parochial cemetery, subject always to his income being supplemented by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in proper cases. A special charge for these privileges might, however, be properly levied by the burial authorities for the purpose of raising a fund in aid of the maintenance of the churchyard. They also recommend that fees to incumbents when an iron railing is placed round a grave or a monument should be disallowed, together with the right of an incumbent to allow animals to graze in his churchyard.

ALTRINCHAM.—The Rev. E. S. Howse, who has resigned the pulpit at Dunham-road Chapel, has been presented with a purse containing £106, subscribed by his friends in Altrincham and Hale. He has been minister in Altrincham for the last fourteen years, and his resignation was received with great regret by his congregation.

LIVERPOOL.—The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Hale, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, Beaufort-street, Toxteth-park, in succession to the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A.

EMERSON'S GOSPEL.

THE RELIGION OF NATURE.

(Concluded from last week.)

[The following discourse was delivered in All Souls Church, New York, on Sunday, May 28, 1882, by the Rev. R. Heber Newton.]

IV. Another step the seer takes. Nature is not only, in its one substance, Mind: it is Character. Law is to him a series of concentric coils, wheel within wheel, as in the symbol of Ezekiel; and the innermost coil, the main-spring of the whole mysterious movement, is Moral Law.

A purpose of good is at the core of creation. An energy working towards goodness is stored in the filmy threads of bioplasm. All growths string on this crystallising form. When we climb up through the slow progress of life, the Moral Law is the law which issues as the crowning and commanding principle of action; the power recognised in the highest life of the highest product of nature—man—as throned above him for his unquestioning loyalty; the force evolved in the organic ascent of life, which at once upon its appearance on the field ranks all other forces, and every most imperious power feels its master come. This law, this force, is ruling, working through every stage of nature's development, so that we can reduce its terms from ethics down through chemics and physics, and find the adumbrations of social ideals in the crystallisation of the rocks, the fertilisation of the flowers, and the associations of the insects, and know that we have really gotten a scientific statement of the power in nature as capable of verification as any other proposition in our imperfect knowledge, when, in Matthew Arnold's famous phrases, we speak of this "stream of tendency" flowing up through life as "a power not ourselves, making for righteousness." This is the truth Emerson saw and voiced. He is not blind to the anomalies of nature, viewed as a moral order; its severities and savageries, its free fecundities and libertine longings, its indifference to character—the sun shining on the evil and on the good, the rain falling on the just and on the unjust. He knows full well that in these facts men, themselves unlifted into spirituality, have ever found hints and excuses of evil, and that the lower forms of nature worship have been rituals of righteousness, sacraments of sensuality, propitiations of powers wrathful and withering, apotheoses of desire and dread. He sees, however, back of all this that is unmoral in nature awakening the immoral in man, the traces harnessing these blind powers and brute impulses to an ethical purpose, a spiritual will driving resistlessly on towards the education of man, and already drawing after it into the paths of virtue the truly human men. He finds in actual life that nature is a spring and source of virtue, that her influences are inspirations. This careful picker of adjectives declares that "Spring is strong and virtuous."

He finds that

"None can tell how sweet,
How virtuous, the morning air."

Intent on the building of a man, he chose accordingly his home among the "sacred pines," where he might be ever nigh to nature. Wordsworth before him had found that

"One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can."

And he, too, had gone to school among the Westmoreland lakes.

Thus, the noblest spirits have ever found, "Pure, vigorous nature," sighed the dying Froebel, drawn up in his arm-chair to the open window, that he thence be strengthened for the last ordeal. The perfect man grew amid the Galilean hills. This influence of nature upon man is the forth-flowing from a heart that beats to the rhythm of a moral force.

"The Moral Law lies at the centre of nature, and radiates to the circumference. It is the pith and marrow of every substance, every relation, and every process. All things with which we deal preach to us. . . . Every animal function, from the sponge up to Hercules, shall hint or thunder to man the laws of right and wrong, and echo the Ten Commandments."

"This ethical character so penetrates the bone and marrow of nature as to seem the end for which it is made." No supernatural revelation is needed to introduce man to virtue. Nature is a revelation of virtue, a teacher of conduct, a trainer of character. If true to nature, man will be virtuous. "Virtue is the adopting of this dictate of the Universal Mind by the individual will. Character is the habit of this obedience." The Moral Law is thus throned by nature over life, and the true man owns "the sovereignty of ethics." Conscience is the vice-regal faculty, ruling the individual in the name and by the authority of the Most High. Its counsels are commands, its suggestions are laws. At whatever cost, it is to be obeyed. Only in absolute loyalty to Duty is there real and abiding happiness for man. The final argument is, "I ought."

"Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
'Tis man's perdition to be safe
When for the truth he ought to die."

In this insistent push of Force through nature and through man toward character, he feels the presence of a spirit rightly to be called the Holy Spirit, the recognition of unity and progress leading on to the perception of mind, and this mind revealing itself as Goodness, he bows and dares to say "God."

"The next age will behold God in the ethical laws, as mankind begins to see them in this age, self-equal, self-executing, instantaneous, and self-affirmed, needing no voucher, no prophet, and no miracle besides their own irresistibility, and will regard natural history, private fortunes, and politics, not for themselves, as we have done, but as illustrations of those laws, of that beatitude and love. Nature is too thin a screen, the glory of the One breaks in everywhere."

It is thus by steps in the granitic order of nature that Emerson climbs to the mount of vision, whereon he sees God.

V. Emerson, therefore, has no fears about the future of religion. While oxygen and hydrogen continue and meet in the currents of electricity, there will be water. While nature and the soul continue and confront each other in the common thrill of the Power working in them both, there will be religion. It is the instant result of this relation, where no untoward circumstances hinder. Religion is not in lodgings on earth. It came with the first human man (Mr. Chadband's "human boy" is no longer tautological), opened his eyes in wonder, and it came to stay.

"Let others wrangle, I will wonder," was a saying of Augustine, of which he was fond. Himself a

"Wonderer at all he meets, Wonderer chiefly at himself."

Wonder always leads her sister Faith after her. Nay, faith is simply wonder become conscious. One who has learned much of Emerson tells us that

"Faith and wonder and the primal earth
Are born into the world with every child."

While wonder lasts and leads on to these high cognitions, faith will not fail. Wonder's other name is Worship. Linnaeus on his knees before the Scotch heather in bloom, Kepler concluding the researches which led to his third great law with a sublime prayer, sign the natural posture of the soul before the Infinite Mystery forth from which such light gleams, and symbolise the secret Emerson had seen. "The last thing to fear for is religion."

"The whole state of man is a state of culture, and its flowering and completion may be described as religion or worship." He was not unaware of the great change going on in religion, of the decay and death of old forms of faith going on all round him. His finer sensitiveness detected the fact, and measured its force before the mass of his contemporaries had become conscious of any change, and before any save a few had appreciated its full significance. But he saw that which a generation later we are all coming to perceive; that the present "ooze and thaw" of belief, in which most find symptoms of a coming catastrophe, is the washing away of an effete order to lay the foundations of a new and higher order; that the drying up of dogmas is only the extension of envelopes, which have served their end by the swelling buds within the ancient formularies; that the change is in the line of growth toward simpler, freer, nobler forms of religion.

"You say there is no religion now. 'Tis like saying in rainy weather there is no sun, when at that moment we are witnessing one of his superlative effects." He sees a new church arising, whose walls the toiling hosts of students of nature are rearing, whose gospel knowledge will preach by the altars where Imagination lifts her worship:—

"There will be a new church founded on moral science, at first cold and naked, a babe in the manger again, the algebra and mathematics of ethical law, the church of men to come without shawms or psalters or sackbut; but it will have heaven and earth for its beams and rafters, science for symbol and illustration: it will fast enough gather beauty, music, picture, poetry."

The creed of this coming church we are not yet ripe to write.

"I am too young yet by some ages," he says, "to compile a code." Yet he does not hesitate to offer a tentative expression of the faith that is in him:—

"I am ready to give the first simple foundations of my belief: that the Author of Nature has not left himself without a witness in any sane mind; that the moral sentiment speaks to every man the law after which the universe was made; that we find parity, identity, of design through nature, and benefit to be the uniform aim; that there is a force always at work to make the best better and the worst good."

Bald as this confession of faith may seem, it is the baldness of the root, needing only time and right conditions to put forth leaf and bud, and blossom, and flower, and fruit. It is what Catholics would call implicit faith. It holds in latencies more than it has developed, just as the similar faith of the old Hebrews held Christianity, wanting only a Jesus. It is what Catholics would call implicit faith. It is a potential theology. When this simple ethical religion begins fairly to work upon the problems of our earthly existence, it will find, as Emerson foresaw, that the old Schoolmen had not conjured up the mysteries that exercised their ingenuities. However antiquated their interpretation of those mysteries, there were facts at the core of their fine-spun metaphysics. Those facts exist today as of old. They will insistently solicit man's attention, demanding explanation. The new statements may differ from the old as widely as the redity differs from the federal headship of Adam, as Mr. Spencer's law of organic retrogression differs from original sin, as natural selection differs from election, as natural consequences in character differ from the doctrine of hell. In some form, however, the old problems will reappear in thought. "Natural Religion," writes Emerson, "supplies still all the facts which are disguised under the dogmas of popular creeds."

VI. Without curiously conning the pages of the future's thought, which are not fully open yet, let us note that which touches us more,—how, in Emerson's religion of nature, hope blossoms on this simple faith.

However dark the problems of existence may look to him who studies them in detail down in the valleys where the savan works—to the seer, who from the sunlit summits sweeps the horizon's circuit, all looms light. This was Emerson's view. As I look up to French's fine bust, and note the characteristic smile, I think of that subtle touch in Spencer's personification of Hope—"She always smyle." That smile seems to say, "I see more than I can tell." This was the secret of his optimism—the persuasion that an infinite will had the job of earth in hand. "A sublime confidence is fed at the bottom of the heart, that in spite of appearances, in spite of malignity and blind self-interest, an eternal, beneficent necessity is always bringing things right; and though we should fold our arms, which we cannot do—for our duty requires us to be the very hands of this guiding sentiment and work in the present moment—the evils we suffer will at last end themselves, through the incessant opposition of nature to everything hurtful." Thus, unwrangling any human sorrow, he could breathe the desire of the Dial—"We wish it may resemble that instrument in its celebrated happiness, that of measuring no hours but those of sunshine." He was sure he caught truly the secret of evolution. Evolution is the grandest of prophets, its voice a lofty strain of expectation like the second Isaiah's—"Comfort ye, comfort ye my people."

"Under gentle types, my Spring
Masks the might of Nature's king,
An energy that searches thorough
From Chaos to the dawning morrow;
Into all our human plight,
The soul's pilgrimage and flight;
In city or in solitude,
Step by step, lifts bad to good,
Without halting, without rest, Lifting Better up to Best."

The organic ascent of man is not completed. Man is but the embryo of the man that is to be, if this majestic movement of nature goes on in the upward lines along which our vision already flies. "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God." This is the song of nature Emerson overhears:—

"I sit by the shining Fount of Life,
And pour the deluge still;

"And ever by delicate powers
Gathering along the centuries
From race on race the rarest flowers,
My wreath shall nothing miss.

"But he, the man-child glorious,—
Where tarries he the while?
The rainbow shines his harbinger,
The sunset gleams his smile.

"My boreal lights leap upward,
Forthright my planets roll,
And still the man-child is not born,
The summit of the whole.

"I tire of globes and races,
Too long the game is played;
What without him is summer's pomp,
Or winter's frozen shade?

"I travail in pain for him,
My creatures travail and wait;
His couriers come by squadrons,
He comes not to the gate."

This coming man is "the semi-god whom we await." It is none less than the World-Soul, who

"Forbids to despair;
His cheeks mantle with mirth;
And the unimagined good of men
Is yearning at the birth."

Nor does this prophecy of nature merely mean to him the continued development of the race on earth. He is sure it means also the continued growth of individuals in other spheres. He is, as he says all right-minded men should be, incurious about this future, content with hope as the substance and not the form of things to come. But his own secret trust creeps out through all his aversion to the speculation which he saw had grown flamboyant in the Churches. "After science begins, belief of permanence will follow in a healthy mind. . . . In nature, the implanting of a desire indicates that the gratification of that desire is in the constitution of that creature that feels it. . . . I have heard that, when we pronounce the name of man, we pronounce the belief of immortality. All great natures delight in stability; all great men find eternity affirmed in the promise of their faculties. . . . As soon as virtue glows, the belief confirms itself. It is a kind of summary or completion of man. . . . Our dissatisfaction with any other solution is the blazing evidence of immortality. . . . Everything is prospective, and man is to live hereafter. That the world is for his education is the only sane solution of the enigma. . . . I am a better believer, and all serious souls are better believers in immortality than we can give grounds for." In his last volume of essays, the old man, nearing the great mystery, dropped his reserve and spake out his matured conviction in strong though restrained language. But this conviction was no late ripening of his thought. In early life he lost a darling boy, "a genius of so fine a strain" as the world seemed "not ripe yet to sustain." When the morrow of his great loss had "dawned with needless glow," and other morrows after it, tiding him at length beyond "the blasphemy of grief," he wrote that thrilling Threnody, wherein he whispers to his soul the comfort he had learned in the darkness:—

"Wilt thou not ope thy heart to know
What rainbows teach and sunsets show?
Verdict which accumulates
From lengthening scroll of human fates,
Voice of earth to earth returned,
Prayers of saints that inly burned,— Saying, *What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again.*"

VII. Faith and Hope hold the hand of their divine sister, Charity; and the greatest of these three sits shined serene within the temple Emerson rears for worship. It is needless to illustrate at any length the spirit which shines from each page he has written, which breathed in all his life, making every word and deed fragrant with gracious, gentle love. There was one thing he could not be drawn to do—controversy. He voiced the truth he heard within him, and left others to voice the truths re-vented to them, trusting "the vast Soul that o'er all planned" to harmonise the strains. In all that he has written there lives no word to hint the long years of suspicion, distrust and misrepresentation through which he walked unsoured. Not even when popular prejudice railed round him most unkindly did his ink curdle in the least. He swept all classes within his sympathies. His intercourse with Carlyle dropped when the savage howl against "the nigger" came across the sea. No most abhorred creed could part a good man from his soul. The churchman shut not from him the man.

"Why should the vest on him allure
Which I could not on me endure?"

No differences of race prevented him from feeling with another people's faiths and hopes. He was one of the first to introduce to our people the sacred books of the East, and to welcome the "accent of the Holy Ghost" in foreign idioms,—

"What are Moslems? What Giaours?
All are Love's, and all are ours."

To him, the Power working in nature and in man is Love. Back of the Infinite Mind is an Infinite Heart. The pine-tree whispers that "Perfect nature's every part Is rooted in the mighty Heart."

The Sphinx hints that in nature

"Love works at the centre,
Heart heaving away;
Forth speed the strong pulses
To the borders of day."

Monadnock finds a voice to tell him of the Building Intellect,

"Whose throbs are love, whose thrills are song."

The "Threnody" sums the impossible when it asks,—

"Wilt thou freeze love's tidal flow, Whose streams through nature circling go?"

VIII. The nature where faith and hope and love find altars reared is thus to him a temple of the living God, wherein "all wisdom and all good abide," and whereof "man is the façade," a temple whose rhythmic strains this seer articulates in worship.

IX. I am not unaware of the limitations of Emerson's religious thought as a theology. He was probably conscious of its limitations himself. His theism verges dangerously upon what, in spite of Carlyle's savage ridicule, is no light confusion—pantheism. With this follows a tendency to regard evil as only negative, a defect of immaturity in nature, and thus to blur the ethical distinctions, as in some noted passages. The real dangers of pantheism have been lately pointed out by so dispassionate a critic as Le Page Renouf, in the conclusion of his Hibbert lectures on the religion of Egypt. They haunt the religion of nature. Emerson's attitude towards Jesus Christ seems to me largely part of his surroundings, as he came into life amid the revolt from the unnatural Christ of the Churches. His profound reverence for Jesus, his recognition of him as a supreme teacher sent from God, "our best, our dearest saint," it is needless to recall. Of his divineness he would have said,—

"Draw if thou canst the mystic line,
Which is human, which divine."

The doctrine of the Incarnation held for him a profound truth, which in other times he might have been more anxious to affirm than to deny. But this immanency of God in man, of which Jesus is the sacred symbol, had been in his view materialised in the usual way of sacraments. Men's reverence for the symbol and sacrament had made it no longer a transparent spiritual truth, but an opaque metaphysical truth. Instead of holding Jesus up to the light and looking through him to God, studying the divine nature as caught upon this prism, and thus entering into the consciousness of oneness with God which was at its full in him, the churches he found to be busied in looking at Jesus, disputing over him, intent on magnifying him, and thus missing the secret of his life. "The idioms of his language and the figures of his rhetoric have usurped the place of his truth; and the churches are not built on his principles, but on his tropes." Alas! that this was and still remains so near the fact. Pity that Christianity has adjourned its Master's work of regenerating human society for the disciples' work of determining his personality, that it has substituted truth about Jesus for the truth of Jesus. Thus it came to pass that so reverent a soul should have to say, "The way to preach Christ to our age is to be silent about him." As, with the really growing spiritual and ethical life of the Churches and their mental emancipation, his charge shall cease to be true, his attitude will cease to be necessary; and the way will open for a rational and reverent recognition of the supreme authority of Jesus Christ as nature's most authoritative utterance, "the highest, holiest manhood," and thus the crowning consciousness of life.

His negative attitude did not reveal his truest thought. He was a living embodiment of his constant counsel, to affirm and let the affirmation carry its own denials. The man reveals the positive, constructive character of his thought,—nobly, beautifully good; profoundly, simply religious; never withdrawing his name from the register of the church in Concord; showing where he had been and of whom he had learned by the confession he drew from hosts besides old Father Taylor,—"He is more like Jesus than anyone I have ever known"; a man of whom we can best say, he "walked with God and was not, for God took him."

The light in which we are to regard Emerson as a religious teacher is that of the attempt forced upon our age to get back within the florid overgrowths of institutional and dogmatic Christianity to that severely simple substratum of all religion which lies below controversies and questionings, grounded in the facts of nature, whereon Science lays deep and strong the foundation-stones of faith, while Imagination waits impatient to lift the walls which shall blossom into the beauties of faith and hope and grow vocal with the harmonies of worship.

A grand mission, grandly fulfilled. Already, we can see the advancing lines of that cathedral of humanity which the Religion of the Future is to open for men's worship, into whose chapels shall be welcomed the devotees of all true knowledge and all lofty life, whose walls all arts shall beautify, and whose rituals poetry shall write; while over its central altar shall shine the face of God breaking through upon the flesh of Jesus Christ. And when in gratitude and wonder our children shall ask, Who first taught your age to build thus nobly, when the old structures seemed tumbling into ruins? we will answer, Emerson.

MANCHESTER: CROSS-STREET CHAPEL.—At this the oldest Nonconformist chapel in Manchester, the Rev. W. Gaskell entered last Sunday on the fifty-fifth year of his pastorate. Among the congregation were many former members, who had come from various distances to mark their esteem and affection for Mr. Gaskell. The chapel was decorated with flowers, the appropriate offerings mostly of the younger portion of the flock. At the close of his sermon,—the text being the 7th verse of the 63rd Psalm—Mr. Gaskell said:—"Remembering that to-day I enter on the fifty-fifth year of my ministry, and naturally looking back over the past, I cannot but feel what reason I have to make the pious sentiment of the Psalmist my own, and say with him 'Because Thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of Thy wings will I rejoice.' Young and inexperienced as I then was, and fresh from college, it was not without serious misgivings that I took up the work to which I had been appointed here; but I had the happiness of being associated with an excellent colleague, who was ever ready to give me such assistance as I required, and to help me over any difficulties which rose in my way; and throughout the long period that has since elapsed the kindest consideration has always been shown me by the members of the congregation, who have done not a little to lighten my labours, and cheer me with their sympathy, for which I feel deeply grateful. Though I acknowledge my shortcomings, I can truly say that I have ever anxiously desired to quicken your religious thought, and deepen your religious feeling, and in this respect I humbly trust I have not altogether failed. Nothing could afford me purer satisfaction than to feel assured that in some degree at least this has been the result of my labours amongst you. I have seen in many sad and trying circumstances the power which our simple faith has to sustain and strengthen the spirit, and I can wish you, dear friends, no better wish than that you may make full proof of its power."

PORTSMOUTH.—The Rev. John Ellis has in consequence of ill-health resigned the pastorate of St. Thomas-street Chapel, Portsmouth, after eleven years' ministry.

A bust of the late Mr. George Dawson was unveiled on Tuesday in the Church of the Saviour, Birmingham, by Mr. J. S. Manton. The sculptor is Mr. T. J. Williamson.

Obituary.

SHOCKING DEATH OF THE REV. W. A. POPE.

We record with the deepest grief the shocking death, by a fall from a precipice, of the Rev. W. A. Pope, one of the ministers of our London Domestic Mission, and one of the gentlest and most amiable of men. It appears from the account in the daily papers that Mr. Pope was staying with Professor Estlin Carpenter, at Borrowdale, Cumberland, and that a party left that place on Monday afternoon for the purpose of ascending Scawfell Peaks and Great Gable, two of the highest mountains in England. While the party were at the top of Great Gable Mr. Pope left the rest, and he was last seen standing on a rock at the edge of the precipice. Although the ill-fated gentleman did not again join the party his absence did not create alarm, as it was thought that he might have gone back home by another route. The party then went back to Borrowdale; but as Mr. Pope did not appear a search party was organised, and he was found dead at the foot of the precipice. The deceased fell a distance of nearly five hundred yards, the body striking against a number of rocks in its descent. Dr. Ring, of Keswick, gathered up the remains, which were conveyed to Scathwaite. The deceased leaves a wife and six children. Next week we hope to give an account of Mr. Pope's most useful and self-denying labour as a country minister, and a missionary in the metropolis.

An inquest was held at Scathwaite, on Wednesday, before Mr. J. Simpson, Deputy Coroner for St. Bees' District. Edgar Frupp, a student at the Manchester New College, London, deposed that of a company of ten or twelve persons the deceased and he were first to reach the top of Great Gable, on Monday. They intended to return by way of Green Gable, but the weather becoming misty they passed two cairns of stones which marked the way, and so diverged to the left on the Ennerdale side, where they came to a projecting rock, about 300 feet in declivity. Here Mr. Pope, after giving witness his walking-stick, jumped to a green sward below, alighting on which he seemed to lose his balance, and fell backward over the precipice. Witness went for assistance, and they searched till darkness stopped the party, who had to remain on the mountain all night, and renewed their exertions the following morning. The body was found at the foot of a precipitous rock about seven o'clock. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death.

DEATH OF THE REV. HENRY GILES.

We learn from the Advertiser of Boston, U.S., that the Rev. Henry Giles, at one time widely known as a lecturer, died on Monday, July 20, at his home on River-street, Hyde-park. Mr. Giles has been confined to his house about eleven years by illness, resulting from a shock of paralysis, which was the primary cause of his death. He was a native of Ireland, and was born at Cranford, County Wexford, Nov. 1, 1809, receiving his education at the Academy of Belfast. Though bred in the Roman Catholic Church, he became a Unitarian, and entered the ministry of that denomination, filling pastorates at Greenock and Liverpool. When the celebrated controversy between the Episcopalians and Unitarians occurred at Liverpool in 1839 Mr. Giles delivered four of the thirteen lectures that were delivered. The Revs. James Martineau and J. H. Thome were the other controversialists on the Unitarian side. In 1840 Mr. Giles came to the United States, and soon became well known in the larger cities by the excellence of his preaching and his brilliancy as a lecturer. He made lecturing his avocation, and was thoroughly successful in it. Fifteen or sixteen years ago he gave before the Lowell Institute a course of lectures on the "Genius and Writings of Shakespeare," the lectures being so warmly received as to compel their repetition on the afternoon following each evening of their first delivery. Several years later they were gathered into a volume and published under the title of "Human Life in Shakespeare," which, after being some time out of print, was republished not long ago. Previous to the publication of this volume Mr. Giles had published "Lectures and Essays," in two volumes, 1845; "Christian Thought on Life," 1850; and "Illustrations of Genius," 1854.

He also wrote much for magazines and periodicals. Mr. Giles was a man of broad sympathies, and in the active period of his life was always ready to respond to the call of charity, delivering many lectures in aid of charitable objects, and making no charge therefor. He was outspoken in his opposition to slavery, but did not connect himself with any of the associations which existed prior to the war for the extinction of that evil. He always retained a warm feeling for his native land and his fellow-countrymen; and his last public lecture for a charity was to aid the family of Sergeant Tom O'Neill of the Mexican War, afterwards Major O'Neill of the Union army, which was delivered in Bcston. Mr. Giles has been during his later years in need himself of that generosity which he once so freely extended to others. The American Unitarian Association has helped him as it could in a quiet way, and others have taken it upon themselves to see that want should not make his old age harder to bear than age and illness naturally are. Among these is a relative living in Bucksport, Maine, to which place the body of Mr. Giles was taken for burial. Mrs. Giles died a few years ago.

Mr. R. M. CARTER, who represented Leeds in Parliament from 1868 to 1876, died on Wednesday morning, after an illness lasting five weeks, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. The deceased was formerly an alderman of the borough, and at the time of his death occupied a seat in the town council. He was a member of the Mill-hill (Unitarian) congregation.

NEW CHURCH CONFERENCE.—The seventy-fifth annual session of the general conference of the New Church "Swedenborgians" formally commenced on Tuesday morning in the St. Andrew's Hall, Granville-street, Glasgow. The preliminary proceedings necessary for the constitution of the Conference had been to some extent completed on the previous evening. On Monday evening also the new Church Temperance Society held its annual business and public meetings. The latter was addressed by several of the society's leading members, and also by the Rev. A. H. Johnstone, of the United Presbyterian Church. On the assembling of the Conference on Wednesday, the Rev. R. Storry, of Heywood, was elected president; the Rev. John F. Potts, of Glasgow, vice-president, and the Rev. Eli Whitehead, of Dalton, Secretary. The Rev. A. T. Boyesen, of Stockholm, was welcomed as a visitor, and was invited to take part in the proceedings. A communication was received from the American Convention of the New Church asking for the assistance of the Conference in the production of a new edition of Swedenborg's works in Latin. It was resolved that the Conference meet next year in the Camden-road Church, London; that the Rev. Dr. Bayley, of Kensington, be nominated as its president; and that the Rev. T. Mackereth, of Bolton, preach the Conference sermon. The Rev. T. Child, of Bath, was appointed to prepare the address from the Conference to the New Church in Great Britain. At noon the Conference adjourned in order that the various committees might meet and prepare the business entrusted to them. In the evening the Conference sermon was preached by the Rev. John Presland, of London, to a large congregation. On Wednesday the report of the National Missionary Institution furnished several matters for discussion. In 1883 the New Church will attain the one hundredth year of its existence, and it was decided suitably to celebrate the event. £8,000 having been subscribed within the year to be applied in various ways for the benefit of the New Church it was determined to apply a considerable portion of the money to the building of a church and the support of a minister at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The treasurer's accounts showed that the total amount now in the possession of the Conference in trust for various purposes is £55,204. The statistics showed a net increase of 298 registered members during the year. In the evening a public lecture was delivered by the Rev. T. Child, of Bath, on "The Bible and Modern Criticism, with special reference to the position of Professor Robinson Smith and others."

THE DECAY OF FAITH.

IN casually referring to the Westminster Review last week we spoke of the article it contains on the "Decay of Faith" as a "mournful" one. We propose now to follow the writer's argument in this and a succeeding article, in order to indicate the fallacies which have, in our opinion, led to such a mournful conclusion. The subject presents itself in the paper in question under two naturally distinct heads; the decay of supernaturalism with the consequent modification of religious opinion in the past, and the possible or probable decay of existing religious beliefs in the future. Unlike Mr. HERBERT SPENCER, who sees in the elimination of superstitious beliefs which come under the dominion of the intellect a fuller and grander scope for the great central mystery of religion, our author infers from the decay of the former beliefs the ultimate destruction of the latter. The Westminster has always been distinguished by an advanced or sceptical tone, but it has rarely, if ever, lent itself to so rude an attempt at iconoclasm as it does in the present paper. The writer is passionate in his condemnation of the doctrine of immortality, which he calls "as baseless a phantasy as ever beguiled the human judgment." It is a "pleasant dream," but then life would be incomparably richer if men woke to a consciousness of their delusion. Now we frankly admit the physical and metaphysical difficulties which beset this great central doctrine of Theism; to do otherwise would be to evidence our utter want of fitness to deal with the question. All we contend for is that when the whole subject is calmly and dispassionately discussed in the light of the physical and moral worlds there is a balance of evidence in its favour. But our author knows nothing of moral evidence; he would reject it as merely subjective, and deny to it all validity. He forgets, too, that the physical roots itself everywhere in the metaphysical, and that there is thus room for the moral and physical worlds to find a grand synthesis in nature. If we mistake not, he has cast aside the slavery of authority and tradition to substitute the bondage of the intellect. His mind, indeed, is in a ferment of revolt against the old beliefs; an awakened intellect has destroyed their form, and the growth of spiritual insight has not as yet revealed their substance in a more modern guise. Hence he speaks with a recklessness and bitterness utterly unworthy of the great theme he has undertaken to discuss. Had he possessed a spirit of philosophical candour he would have acted differently. Those who have read Mr. MILL'S calm and dispassionate discussion of this subject, and happen to turn to our author's pages will be struck with the difference. It is all very well to sneer at the doctrine of a future life when the intellect has attained its meridian brightness, and when prosperity scatters flowers over our path, and the sting of deep sorrow has never pierced our hearts. But what of the suffering and the sorrowing whose life is shrouded in darkness they did not create and cannot dispel? Beliefs that resemble mere fair weather craft are not enough; humanity outside the coterie of positive scientists or philosophers wants a faith that will stand the storm of sorrow in the voyage of life. And though the altruistic tendency of the positive spirit is to be welcomed as a scientific rendering of a noble Christian doctrine, we contend that the spirit in question is inadequate as a stay for human life. It assumes the existence of an earthy paradise, and then turns round and says—see how perfect the present life is, and therefore how superfluous it is to look for another! Alas for the dream of the "positive spirit"! It is only necessary to look at the closing years of its chief apostle to see it vanish. If the life of COMTE was crushed by a sorrow "without hope" as he bent over the tomb of his dear departed friend in Père La Chaise, what are we to expect from the mass of humanity?

Turning, however, to the earlier portion of the Westminster paper we are told that the process of decay in matters pertaining to faith and the supernatural has been a double one—"the gradual and silent abandonment of forms of emotion or belief incompatible with the social tendencies and intellectual acquirements of recent years, and the attaching of new meanings to old doctrines and creeds, when that course could be adopted without too gross a violation of the rules of propriety and grammar." This statement forms a sort of starting point in our author's application of the historical method, and he goes on to say that if, after tracing the social and intellectual influences under which these narrations have been brought about, "these determining conditions continue apparently operative, we may assume the continuous and uniform modification of religious belief in the future as in the past, and forecast the probable ultimate fate and form of religion as a legitimate inference from these historical facts." In other words, if it can be shown that the critical and scientific spirit which has already destroyed all belief in witches and demons, miracles and special revelations, be still operative, we may naturally infer that it will destroy all that remains of religious belief to-day, over and above what is sanctioned by Positivism as the religion of humanity. This we venture to condemn as a false inference from the historical data presented. It is certainly not the inference Mr. SPENCER draws, in spite of his Agnosticism, as we have already intimated. His exact words on this subject are: "Each higher religious creed rejecting those definite and simple interpretations of nature previously given has become more religious by doing this. . . . And so religion has ever been approximating towards that complete recognition of this mystery (that traceable in the rudest fetishism) which is its goal. . . . Thus the consciousness of an inscrutable power manifested to us through all phenomena has been growing ever clearer, and must eventually be freed from its imperfections." And "our great philosopher" adds, "All accountable or natural facts are proved to be in their ultimate genesis unaccountable and supernatural. And so there arise two antithetical states of mind answering to the opposite sides of that existence about which we think. . . . While our consciousness of nature under the one aspect constitutes science, our consciousness of it under the other aspect constitutes religion. . . . How truly its central position is impregnable Religion has never adequately realised." This statement, though postulating no specific belief, leaves room for all the doctrines of a reverent Theism.

Our author takes the fifteenth century as his historical starting point. "It exhibits," he says, "the maximum development of supernaturalism in modern times. This life which so interests the sympathies and absorbs the activities of the nineteenth century failed to satisfy the hopes and energies of our forefathers, who looked with the most intense longing towards the immortality awaiting humanity beyond the grave." This may be true. Still there seems to have been a good deal of fighting, not for heavenly but for earthly crowns, and though the penny post and the telegraph, with numerous other products of modern civilisation, did not exist in the Middle Ages, the people of those times seem to have enjoyed life fairly well, and to have instituted innumerable sports and pastimes for that purpose. No doubt this frail tenement of clay, carefully tended by us, and in which our whole hopes are bound up, was viewed three centuries back as a clog upon spiritual progress" and even as a "source of contamination." But these views were not universal, and much less did they prevent human nature from exercising its beneficent sway over the minds of the masses. Besides, is it not a mere begging the whole question to say that "our whole hopes" are bound up in this frail tenement of clay forming the body? It is true there was no conception at that period "of regular sequence, order and law among natural phenomena and human history." Hence the belief in devils, sorcerers, witches and the like, in short, a gross form of supernaturalism which ignorance had called into existence, and which knowledge has dispelled. The fact, therefore, that miracles, portents, and apparitions were of every day occurrence in the fifteenth century, and yet that nobody believes in them now, is not to the point, because they lay within the province of the intellect, while the central and purified conception of spiritual religion wholly transcend its powers.

Having shown how the resuscitation of many of the best literary productions of ancient Greece and Rome, and the high civilisation of the Moors in Spain, called the European intellect into play, our author goes on to indicate the special channels through which its energies have subsequently flown to the destruction of the preceding superstition. First came new astronomical ideas from which "the conception of a personal Creator and Ruler of all things, if it increased in sublimity became also more difficult effectively to realise." And thus "the sense of the near presence of a Father in heaven became dim and obscure," while the opinions which were displaced "lay at the root of the whole conceptions of theology." Yes, but theology is not religion. The doctrine of the Deity of CHRIST which was certainly rudely shaken by this means has only a very indirect relation to the central truths of religion. To talk, too, of the near presence of a Father in heaven becoming dim and obscure in consequence of enlarged astronomical conceptions is to show an utter want of power to discriminate between spiritual and material relationships. Then as to geology, "that science showed that the cosmic conception contained in the Book of Genesis was fundamentally erroneous. It placed the creative period vastly further back in time. True, but the philosophical Theist does not consider time as an element in the life of the Deity, and much less does he confound religion with the transient cosmic conceptions of the Hebrew race. Still "the sciences of astronomy and geology have had even less influence over the decline of supernatural beliefs than inquiries more intimately associated with human history." Assuming the success of MR. DARWIN in establishing the evolutionary theory, continues our author, "several very awkward questions crop up at what time did man come to have an immortal soul? Why should man have that inestimable privilege any more than other animal forms? Where is the line to be drawn at which the mere animal merges in the man?" The Theist's answer to these queries is, that man does not possess, but is an immortal soul, and that the line between the animal and the man is drawn with the utmost definiteness in nature. When the inferior animals write history, build churches and create an ideal world of science and art then the comparison between them and man will be valid. But so long as they remain bound by the chain of necessity, and are no more than the play of natural forces make them, while man is a free co-worker with the eternal in modifying the world and shaping his own destiny, we see no reason to abandon a doctrine which is based on that enormous difference. Then, again, the rise and progress of the comparative sciences have also, we are told, exercised a very powerful and unfavourable influence over all forms of supernatural belief. The result is the formation of a scheme of thought which shows "that at a certain stage of barbarism a spiritual or supernatural conception of events and phenomena is universal, natural, and in its main features uniform and identical." But "after a certain stage of civilisation is reached, the history of supernaturalism is one of silent yet certain decay," since "the natural takes the place of the supernatural, the material excludes the spiritual." This is true of the superstitious accretions of supernatural belief. When science gives light and leverage to the intellect, whatever comes under the dominion of the mind falls away. But though the verstand thus sweeps away the grosser forms of supernaturalism the vernunft with its mighty and unassailable ideal-world remains. The dust from the conflict obscures this latter for a time, but the clouds soon roll away, and there is to be seen a "supernatural natural," as M. RENAN calls it. This is the law of change in the individual, and as he represents the species it must hold good for the race. Our author admits that the old supernaturalism is "universal and natural" at a certain stage of barbarism, but his vicious use of the historical method prevents his seeing with MAX MULLER and others that a new and purified supernaturalism will become equally universal and natural at a certain stage of civilisation, judging from the legitimate analogy of individual development.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

THE details given by us last week will have sufficiently acquainted our readers with the circumstances of Mr. POPE's sudden and lamentable death. There is something peculiarly distressing when such an event takes place in the heyday of holiday enjoyment of the most innocent kind, when no indication is given, no fear exists, no apprehension felt of any impending catastrophe. The very buoyancy of spirit that possessed our poor friend after dwelling for months amidst the dreary monotonous surroundings of East London, and suddenly turned loose into the exquisite scenery of the Cumberland lakes and mountains, made "more exquisite still" by the genial hospitality of his host and intercourse with the kindred friends he had gathered together to spend a portion of their vacation leisure, all these things acted upon, and impelled an ardent impetuous nature into the very danger that proved so fatal and calamitous. Sickness and pain, loss and disappointment, the ordinary wear and tear and toils of human life often blunt and dull the feelings to that degree that death does not look wholly dreadful in its sure and steady approaches. Nay, death may often prove a welcome release where the strain of life has reached the verge of human endurance. It adds to the sadness in MR. POPE's case that he had well-earned his few weeks' respite from the arduous duties to which he had devoted himself. For he had only quite recently organised and led a large party of his own people and their children to Epping Forest, promoted and heartily shared in their rich and unbroken enjoyment during a day of brilliant sunshine. In the mysterious providence of GOD, however, it was permitted that one such day, the last in his own life, should terminate in clouds and darkness, and become a day of deep gloom to his mourning family and friends.

The mere external biography of such a man as MR. POPE has nothing in it of very wide spread interest, save for those who stood related to him more closely. In his case the interest is of a mental kind. His is the story of a gifted mind, true to itself, seeking and finding inner light from Him who is Light, and following its leadings to what he believed was everlasting truth, a rock upon which he could build as a sure foundation for his trust and hope. Of his family history not much is known, but it is evident he received an education of a better kind than ordinary by the positions he filled when he grew to manhood. He gave all the evidences of a mind of more than common power, widened and mellowed by superior culture. He appears to have passed through many phases of religious belief, and was successively connected with the Established Church, the Congregationalists, and before his junction with Unitarians, with the Society of Friends. It was while in connection with this body, and acting as a teacher, and, indeed, as a kind of missionary amongst the employés of a large firm of manufacturers, worthy philanthropic members of that excellent body of Christians, that his growing divergence from their modern Evangelical views became manifest. This divergence led to a friendly separation between them, and an open avowal on his part of the views that he ever afterwards held as a Unitarian minister. MR. POPE was essentially a truthful man, having the courage of his convictions; these he followed, and was, we believe, to the last prepared to follow to his own worldly loss. Both in the north and east of England he occupied Unitarian pulpits, the last at Chelmsford, where, as missionary to the East Anglian Unitarian Association, he succeeded in founding what promises to be a prosperous little church, full of life and activity. It was from thence, some three years ago, that he came to fill the vacant post of domestic missionary at Spicer-street. His credentials were on the whole superior to those of any other candidate, and his marked culture and personal ability commended him to the committee. They would indeed have preferred, other things being equal, a younger man, especially one whose antecedents had been a preparation for a position that requires a variety of special qualifications. The ordinary religious minister can manage fairly well if he preaches once or twice a week, and now and then pays a somewhat semi-professional visit. It is optional with him to conduct a Sunday-school, or to give public lectures, or organise entertainments and excursions once or twice a year. The domestic missionary has to undertake all this systematically, and much more besides. His very title indicates that he must be a constant visitor, not to the homes of the well-to-do and the rich, but the poor and the working-classes. He is to seek them out, that he may be their friend, helper, comforter, and, if possible, their pastor, their guide to the highest and holiest life. He is also to take an interest in their secular well-being, and institute, promote and foster ways and means that may add to their well-being in this world. In ST. PAUL's words, in a more modern sense, he must be "All things to all men," and to children as well. Provision for, and the careful training of the young, are two most important elements in the work of the missionary. Again, he should possess some capacity for promoting what we venture to call the fine Art of Recreation; to make and keep it pure and healthful, as at once an enjoyment and a social necessity. And to urge him on and sustain him in his manifold arduous duties he should be an enthusiast—at once human, religious, and christian,—not simply taking to his work as a dry duty, nor as a mere means of gaining a livelihood. Mr. POPE had already given proof of his devotion to and love of truth, and his practical interest in the working classes. He entered upon his labours with great earnestness, but amidst some serious discouragements. The Spicer-street Mission was not what it had been in former years; there was in it an arrest of life. It needed quickening, and it needed the personal help the want of which had caused it to languish for some years. Still Mr. POPE had a fair share of this. The teachers remained faithful to their modest work, and did much to sustain the heart and hands of their new chief. Nevertheless, Mr. POPE's sanguine temperament soon felt the difficulties he had to encounter, and he was the first to announce to his Committee his dissatisfaction with the little progress he was making. Indeed, frequent moods of depression caused him to look at matters in a much more gloomy light than facts warranted. There was a great deal of solid good being done both by himself and others, but not, as he conceived, in proportion to his efforts and expectations. Coming fresh from Chelmsford, where, indeed, he continued to reside for a few months while carrying on the Mission work, the close air of the crowded dwellings he visited affected him keenly, and led him to propound views in his occasional monthly reports, notably in his last annual report, that certainly clash with our ideas of property and its rights. Such dwellings, and such rents as were exacted for them, ought not, he thought, to exist, and "Society" was to blame accordingly. He was also at the outset of his career disposed to give over freely from his poor's purse; but was taught caution and discrimination by one or two deceptions practised upon him. Latterly he brought special cases under the notice of the local organisations of charity.

Mr. POPE was, we think, more successful as a popular lecturer than as a popular preacher. His special psychological studies rendered his mind somewhat rigid and his language too simply ethical to secure the continued sympathies of his hearers. His manner was, if possible, too solemn, his voice too sustained, and his words too emphatic for such an audience as he had constantly to address. His discourses were, perhaps, too full of "strong meat for men," and too little of "milk for babes." The true thing we conceive for a Domestic Mission congregation is to reverse this order, and feed them chiefly with the "pure milk of the Word." On the other hand, Mr. POPE was always affirmative, he "believed and therefore spoke." He rarely illustrated by anecdote or otherwise. When he did, his discourse was sure to interest and impress. But his deeply religious nature, his ever-speaking from within, and his solemn earnestness impressed those who could follow him, and gave that bent to their minds which it was ever his aim to secure. Some of his congregation have borne warm testimony to the writer of Mr. POPE's power in this respect. When he gave a popular lecture, often illustrated by drawings made by himself, he always interested his audience. Here, as it were, the subjective and objective combined produced a happy effect.

The Mission has lost in Mr. POPE a man of considerable ability, deep earnestness of purpose and high aims, who was acquiring slowly but surely greater aptitude for his work, and who leaves behind him the sweet savour of a good name, if not the copious fruits of marked success. C. L. C.

"NATURAL RELIGION."—V.

In the preceding articles we have traced down in the form of a summary the argument used by the author of the book* under review, to prove that, apart from supernaturalism, there is not only a natural religion, but that this is the basis of all that is true and lasting in Christianity itself. It only remains to refer very briefly to the two closing chapters on "Religion and the State," and "Religion and the Church." In the sketch of Natural Religion given by the author it would seem that there is little room left for the consideration of it in relation to either the State or the Church, seeing that, as defined by him, religion would appear to be so purely a personal matter. But this is not his view; he bids us look beyond Christianity, and note the "social character," and the "organising power" of religion in the various forms it has assumed, and asserts that history "shows us religion as the principal influence by which men are organised in the communities which afterwards ripen into states." And with regard to Christianity itself, it is a mistake to represent it as a set of philosophical or quasi-philosophical opinions, or as being a quiet spiritual influence wholly removed from the turmoil of public disturbances, and spreading invisibly from heart to heart. The province of religion is much more natural and political, much less personal than is commonly supposed: between the spirit of nationality and that of religion there is a close affinity, so close, that to the patriot his country becomes to him a religion. "Italy," said Mazzini, "is itself a religion." And so it is with religion, "whenever it works freely and mightily, either giving birth to and sustaining states, or else raising them up to a second life after their destruction." There is in the contest between Church and State not so much a struggle between an embodied religion and a secular power, as one between an old and a new "yet undeveloped Church." The link between Church and State is nationality. But the idea of the nation is less wide than that of Humanity, and gives place to the idea of a Universal Nationality, and this, "like all nationalities, will require both a State and a Church." What kind of Church will this be? Universal civilisation, says our author.

Religion in the individual he has identified with culture; so religion in its public aspect is identical with civilisation. How is this civilisation to be spread? By teaching the scientific spirit of observation and method which is the worship of God, "whose ways are not as our ways, but whose law is eternal, and in the knowledge of whom alone is solid well-being;" by teaching humanity, the spirit of which is Christianity, "supplemented by several other forms of the worship of Man which have grown up around it;" and by teaching delight and confidence in nature, which "enjoyment of the visible world is a fragment saved from the wreck of Paganism." There is a vast work for this modern religion to do, thinks our author. He says:—

"The children of modern civilisation are called to follow in the footsteps of Paul, of Gregory, of Boniface, of Xavier, Eliot and Livingstone; but they must carry not merely Christianity in its narrow clerical sense, but their whole mass of spiritual treasures to those who want them. Let us carry the true view of the universe, the true astronomy, the true chemistry and the true physiology to polytheists still lapped in mythological dreams; let us carry progress and free-will to fatalist nations, and to nations cramped by the fetters of primitive custom; let us carry the old doctrine of a rational liberty into the heart of oriental despotisms; in doing all this—not, indeed, suddenly or fanatically, nor yet pharisaically, as if we ourselves had nothing to learn—we shall admit the outlying world into the great civilised community, into the modern City of God."

Upon this passage it occurs to us to remark that those who are imbued with the spirit of modern civilisation indicated by our author need not go so very far afield in their missionary zeal.

* "Natural Religion." By the Author of "Eccle Homo." London: Macmillan.

There is plenty of work for such labourers in this country without attacking Oriental despotisms or fatalist nations.

In order that modern civilisation may become missionary, it ought, in the opinion of our author, to embody itself in something of the nature of a church, not indeed a church like that of which the conception usually current is familiar to us, but "a vast communion of all who are inspired by the culture and civilisation of the age," as yet unconscious, a church whose clergy "would be subjected to no tests of opinion, but only to tests of character and competence," and in which liberty of opinion would be the first condition of their efficiency as teachers. Against the notion of a church based upon dogmas, unless indeed it is merely a philosophical school, there are some pungent remarks, which are well worth repeating here. After exclaiming, "Imagine a state resting upon dogma!" he says:—

"Suppose we had formulated in the sixteenth century the principles or beliefs which we supposed to lie at the basis of our national constitution. Suppose we had made a political creed. Perhaps the doctrine of divine right and the power of kings to cure disease, perhaps the whole legend of Brute and the derivation of our state from Troy would have appeared in this creed. Once formulated, it would have come to be regarded as the dogmatic basis upon which our society rested. Then in time criticism would have begun its work. Philosophy would have set aside divine right, science would have exploded the belief about the king's evil, historical criticism would have shaken the traditional history, and each innovation would have been regarded as a blow dealt at the constitution of the country. At last it would have come to be generally thought that the constitution was undermined, that it had been found unable to bear the light of modern science. Men would begin publicly to renounce it; officials would win great applause by resigning their posts from conscientious doubts about the personality of King Arthur; and those who continued orthodox would declare that they felt more respect for such persons, much as they deplored their heresies, than they could feel for other officials who continued to receive the emoluments of the State, when it was suspected that they had altogether ceased to believe in the cure of the king's evil, and when they explained away with the most shameless laxity the divine right of the sovereign. If any of this latter school, whom we may call the Broad State, should argue that the State was a practical institution, not a sect of people united by holding the same opinions, that it existed to save the country from invasion and houses from burglary, they would be regarded as impudent sophists. 'Was not the creed there? Were not all officials required to subscribe it? How, then, could it be affirmed that the State did not stand upon community of opinion, upon dogma?' And if any of these sophists were evidently not impudent, but well-meaning and high-minded, they would be regarded as wanting in masculine firmness and the courage to face disagreeable truths. It would be generally agreed that the honest and manly course was to press the controversy firmly to a conclusion, to resist all attempts to confuse the issue, and to keep the public steadily to the fundamental points. Has the sovereign or has he not, a divine right? Can he, or can he not, cure disease by his touch? Was the country, or was it not, colonised by fugitives from Troy? And if at last the public should come by general consent to decide these questions in the negative, then it would be felt that no weak sentiment ought to be listened to, no idle gratitude to the constitution for having, perhaps, in past times saved the country from Spanish or French invasion; that all such considerations ought sternly to be put aside as irrelevant; that as honest men we were bound to consider, not whether our constitution was useful or interesting, or the like, but whether it was true, and if we could not any longer say with our hands on our hearts that it was so, then, in the name of eternal truth, to renounce it and bid it farewell!"

The Church that desires to be a living organism and not a machine must get rid of the trammels of formularies and articles, but there is no need to destroy the existing church. Rather it wants to have a new life sent through it, the life of science and history. Why should not the Christian Church open itself to the modifications required by the age? Of all forms of religion, the Christian, more than any other, takes account of the claims of time, and, unless it has lost the secret, there is no reason why a great reform should not take place.

We must, however, bring these articles to a close. We have tried to place before our readers the line of argument adopted by the author: it has not always been easy to do this, and if we have erred we claim to have done so without intention. It seems to us that in the numerous processes of revision to which the work has been subjected paragraphs have been inserted which have at times tended to destroy the logical flow of the argument. With the author's object of reconciling, or at any rate trying to find a common basis for the teachings of Science, Art, and Religion, as it is usually conceived, there must be, in the minds of all who recognise the good in each, complete sympathy. We fear, however, that he expects too much concession from the professors of each party; certainly it is scarcely to be expected that those who have hitherto maintained that Religion is supernatural will be content with the natural element in it alone, even when they may admit that such an element exists. They will not allow that his definition of religion suffices. That religion is worship, and the worship of an ideal something higher than the worshipper, is hardly likely to satisfy those who have hitherto regarded religion as involving a belief and a faith and a life in accord with such belief and faith. But the question is not so much whether these persons will be satisfied, as whether, when all belief in the Supernatural has passed away, there really is any religion, or any reason for it left. Now, we confess that our author has not made it quite clear to us whether he means by Supernaturalism simply the belief in what are ordinarily called miracles, or the belief in a power outside nature, yet working through nature. Sometimes, as it appears to us, he uses it in one sense and sometimes in another. He admits that the revelations of science are not satisfying, and that a supernatural religion supplementing a natural one may be not only precious, but indispensable; but he asks that it shall also be admitted that religion deals in the first instance with the known and the natural. When this has been done, he considers "we may well begin to doubt whether the known and the natural can suffice for human life." This doubt gives rise to numerous questions, which are not, as it seems to us, answered, except by Supernatural Religion, and a belief in another life or existence. We stated in our first article that the author of this book has been called an Agnostic; we imagine that the account we have given of it will satisfy most fair minded persons that, however unsatisfactory to them some of his conclusions may be, it is not as an Agnostic, or an admirer of that philosophy, that the author has addressed himself to the task of describing and recommending "Natural Religion." We cannot suppose that the book will have anything like the widespread fame of its predecessor, but it is a book which is not to be set aside as of little permanent value. On the contrary, it is an honest attempt to grapple with a question which every day is coming more and more to the front, pressing for solution. That he has succeeded in solving it we do not say, but none the less do we welcome all such earnest endeavours to that end as is shown in the book we have been describing.

"THE THIRD DAY, HE ROSE FROM THE DEAD."

There are some who have rejected the notion of the immortality of the soul as a vain delusion and an idle fable, and some who are pursued with a sickly dread lest so dear a hope should prove nothing but a fond dream. Probably even in these days, when Agnosticism is fashionable, and Pessimism the religion which contends on no unequal terms with Ritualism and æstheticism, their numbers are not large. In any case, the following remarks are not addressed to them, but to those who retain a belief in immortality as an essential and fundamental element of their spiritual life.

To those, then, who hold the doctrine of immortality it requires no proof to believe that Jesus rose from the dead, just as each of us will rise from the dead, as our forefathers rose from the dead, and as the generations before the Christian era rose from the dead. In that sense nothing is demanded of our faith. But when we speak of Christ rising from the dead, we mean much more than this. We mean, in the language of the Prayer Book, that Jesus overcame death, and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life. We mean, in St. Paul's words, that Jesus hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light. And inasmuch as the first disciples of our Lord must have attained to this truth through the evidence of their senses, we mean that Jesus must have manifestly appeared to them after death.

Some will say, "No: Jesus did not bring immortality to light. It was known before his time. It was a conception familiar to the pagans. Throughout the Old Testament there are a great many dark hints of a belief in a life after death; and after the captivity, and the lessons taught in the captivity, the hints become clear, and rise to certainties."

But this account of the matter seems so painfully deficient, so perversely contrary to the lessons of history, as almost to incur the charge of wilful blindness. The Pagans did not recognise sin in the same light as the Jewish and Christian world looked upon it. Crime they understood; but what we think of as sin they regarded as error, or weakness. Consequently their conceptions of retribution and life after death were entirely different from those of Christendom. Virgil, in a well-known and beautiful passage, rises to a high ideal, but his remarks are scanty and unformed, and his atmosphere chill. Cicero expresses the noblest aspirations in most touching and eloquent language, but he never dares reach higher than a hope. "Post mortem quidem sensus aut optandus aut nullus est." And again:—"Quod si in hoc erro, quod animos hominum immortales esse credam, lubenter erro; nec mihi hunc errorem quo delector, dum vivo extorqueri volo." And as for the Jews, one of their latest writings before Christ expresses in one passage (though it is contrary to the general tenour of the book, and evidently copied from the Psalms) an absolute denial of immortality:—"Who shall praise the most High in the grave, instead of them which live and give thanks? Thanksgiving perisheth from the dead as from one that is not: the living and sound in heart shall praise the Lord."

For the son of man is not immortal. . . All men are but earth and ashes." Moreover, the secret of the success of the early Christians was their intense belief, and the belief they imparted to others, that they had the key of heaven and hell. Many other causes co-operated, but Christian authority would never have seated itself on the throne of the Cæsars and wielded its sceptre in the eyes of the whole world in a short three centuries had not the world believed in its possession of the gift of everlasting life and death. It cannot, therefore, be airily questioned by any reader of history that "Jesus brought life and immortality to light."

Some again will say:—"It is no straining of metaphor to grant that Jesus brought life and immortality to light, but it does not follow, nor is it credible, that he appeared to his disciples after death. This is a later myth, variously related with extravagant details by the Evangelists. It does not stand on the sober basis of the rest of the narration. It is to be coupled with the myths which gathered round the supposed miraculous conception of Jesus. The object to be served—to convince the gainsayers—is manifest. But Jesus could no more show himself after his death to his disciples than we could to our nearest and dearest friends."

To this the answer has been fairly returned, that the credulity of scepticism is sometimes as great as the credulity of the grossest superstition. For every effect there must be a cause; for a great, a universal, an abiding effect, rapidly extending over the whole known world, changing the polity of states and transforming the social habits of men, sharply dividing the history of the world into two parts, there must be a corresponding and adequate cause. If the above objection holds good, such a cause is not to be found, or at least has never yet been stated. To most thoughtful students it has seemed to be beyond all doubt, that to deny that the apostles and disciples of our Lord were as absolutely certain that they saw and touched and held converse with Jesus after his death as they were of their own bodily existence, is to leave the great facts of Christianity without any worthy explanation. It might be a sufficient explanation for a mere moral teacher or a teacher of righteousness. Not so for a successful founder of religion whose bequest to the world was his own personality and his abiding presence.

"Are we, then, to believe that after three days the dead Jesus rose with his body from the grave: that his material body passed through closed doors, that he actually eat with the disciples, and that they touched his actual body; and that, finally, after many days his corporeal frame ascended with him up to heaven? Sooner than believe this, we would prefer to leave the difficulty unsolved."

To the writer it appears that these objections are entirely valid. It is perhaps worth while to give a few reasons very briefly out of many, confining the attention to the material ascension. In the first place, it is a question of testimony against the ordinary laws of nature whether a body heavier than the air should rise through the air without any mechanical aid, and in this case we prefer to abide by the known facts of the laws of nature. Next, we know that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor corruption incorruption. St. Paul himself would have refused to admit the words of the Latin Creed resurrectio carnis, or of "The Apostles' Creed," as assented to by so many of us in the Baptismal Service—"the Resurrection of the flesh." And lastly, heaven is not a place to which a material body can ascend. We know that heaven is a state or condition of spiritual existence, and that the kingdom of heaven is within us. The notion of a heaven "above" us, beyond the firmament (στερέωμα), agreed well enough with the astronomy (and therefore poetic feeling) of the time in which the earth was flat and the stars were punched into the solid sky, but is not so well suited to our present notions of a small nucleus of matter rolling a very subordinate and limited course through infinite space. For these and many other reasons we altogether decline to believe that the body of Jesus rose after death, or "ascended" in any way from the surface of the earth. We do not doubt that the body of our Lord mixed with common earth and was dissipated into its elemental gases in common with all other organic substances when what is called death comes, and dissolution takes place.

"But if all this be acknowledged, what is left of any value? Taking it for granted that the apostles and disciples of our Lord did not intend to deceive (an hypothesis that need not be seriously discussed), it remains that the appearances of Jesus, which they firmly believed they saw, were delusive visions and fantastic phantoms of the imagination. They were in a dis-tempered condition."

Yes; it may be freely granted that they were in a dis-tempered condition! They were intoxicated with the wine of enthusiasm. "These men are full of new wine," said the wondering multitude, and they spoke truly; but St. Peter told them of the vine whence the wine was trodden, the favourite symbol of the new faith. The fact is that the apostles saw realities whereas the world sees shows. Their hearts projected before them images of the unseen, whereas the multitude only perceived that a cowslip was a cowslip.

Like the baseless fabric of a vision.
The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve
And . . . leave not a rack behind.

Their minds were in what Dr. Carpenter calls a state of "expectant attention." The writer himself does not doubt that the physical condition of their retina was correspondent to that which holds when the eye perceives an objective reality; the retina and the brain were in accord, and duly informed each other. These men were in a state of nervous exaltation, and spiritual facts assumed visual shapes. Jesus was dead, but he had promised to return to them, and to be with them always. The grave could not hold the promises of God. Death is only of the body. Death is but the portal of life. They did not perceive this at once. They were stunned. But on the "third day" they recovered. That which is—the pre- sence of Jesus—was with them. Their spirits were in communion with his spirit, and they cried out in the warmth of the new revelation, "I have seen the Lord." And thus Jesus became the first-fruits of the dead.

The distinction here attempted to be laid down may be subtle, but it is not fantastic. The spiritual presence of Jesus was a reality. But no one can see a spirit. No material object was before their eyes, and yet they gave expression to a truth accordant with physiological facts when they said they "saw" Jesus. It will be observed that most of the occasions when they saw the Lord were occasions of great exaltation and expectancy of spirit; at the tomb, on the day of Ascension, on the day of Pentecost, when Stephen, looking up steadfastly into heaven, saw the glory of God, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God. Surely it will be allowed that in all these cases the Apostles were not deceived, but saw realities. They also saw angels and the bodies of saints that had fallen asleep—manifest visions. But what perhaps will be felt most convincing is that St. Paul, deeply exercised in spirit and moved by the vision of Stephen at his martyrdom, saw (with his companions) a great light from heaven and heard (alone) the voice of Jesus speaking to him. This led to his conversion. How natural is all this! The connection of some actual phenomenon with the voice of conscience, and conviction sounded in his ears as the accusing voice of Jesus. The voice of conscience was real. The presence of Jesus was real. The spiritual converse of Jesus was real. The actual waves of air caused by a voice speaking were non-existent, but that (to us who acknowledge the spiritual facts) is only physiologically of interest or importance. Consequently, St. Paul asserts without a trace of doubt, and without contradiction from the other Apostles, that Jesus was seen of him also last of all the Apostles. The objective and subjective phenomena were one.

We are told that Jesus rose from the dead on "the third day," that is, of course, an unimportant detail in the history, and may or may not be exact. The probabilities are that it loosely expresses a longer or shorter interval of time, not very definitely marked, as is not uncommon in the expression "many days," in the Old Testament. As seven is the sacred number, so three is the natural number, and it was very likely chosen because of Hosea's prophecy, "In the third day he will raise us up." But, in any case, this is not a matter worth dwelling on. The essential matter we have been considering—the spiritual factor on which depends the salvation of the world, is to know and believe that the Son of God rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sits on the right hand of God, and will come from thence to judge the world. The conclusion wearivable at is, that Jesus brought life and immortality to light, and that not till after his death could we be fully assured of the truth of the saying—"Mors Junua Vitae." H. C.

MR. MOZLEY'S CONFESSIONS AND CONCESSIONS.

In our lengthened review of the very interesting "Reminiscences of the Oxford Movement," by the Rev. T. Mozley, late Fellow of Oriel, and brother-in-law of Cardinal Newman, we alluded to some remarkable chapters in the second volume expressing his doubts and difficulties respecting what are usually regarded as "the cardinal verities of the Christian faith." It will be interesting and instructive to bring together some of the more prominent passages in these chapters, leaving them to produce their own impression, without comment on our part.

A chapter on "The Trinity, opens with the following sentences:—

"The doctrine of Transubstantiation, it has always to be borne in mind, has ever been inseparably associated with that of the Trinity. The Church of the Middle Ages spoke as awfully and as definitely of the consecrated bread as of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. The same controversy, and the same arguments, the same play of words, it may be said, touched the altar in our midst, and the throne in the Heaven of Heavens. . . Always wishing to believe as much as was believed by the best and most faithful Christian, yet always exercising a reason of my own, I have again and again entered on this great question with an ever-increasing wish to see the Church contenting herself as much as possible with the very words of Scripture, and stopping short of definitions in matter beyond human comprehension. Jesus Christ is the Son of Man and the Son of God. Why are we not content with titles so endearing, so elevating? Yet people are not content. Even the expression 'God the Son' is not the same thing as the 'Son of God.' What warrant is there for set prayers and hymns addressed to the Son simply as God, frequently without even a reference to the Father? I know that many Christians have been tortured in childhood, haunted through life, and pursued to old age with such questions as how could the Babe in Mary's arms be carrying on the work of the Universe—nay of an Infinity beyond our Universe—entering into the hearts of all men, into the nature of all living things, and into the secrets of this solid globe?"

Mr. Mozley confesses that while attempting more than fifty years ago with a dear friend to talk down his doubts, on the theory that they were bound to accept the authority of the Church, he was fixing a deep disquiet in his own mind, which, he adds, remained, and indeed still remains, all the more because he had never seriously addressed himself to its removal:—

"A thousand times I have wished and then resolved never again to let myself be plagued with the wish that the word 'person' could be banished from our Symbols and Formularies. I shall shock many of my readers when I say that the word has often suggested to me that the evil being who has certainly much to do in the affairs of the Church has intruded this word as the most effectual difficulty language and thought could supply to the simple and proper reception of divine truths. We should set down any one as either a madman or a very vulgar jester who should address either Father, Son or Spirit by the name of person, or should so refer to Him. I can only hope that Heaven in good time will send us some simple intelligible form, saving the Divine agency of Father, Son and Spirit, and the Divine Unity also. Again I ask, with all humbleness, where the idea of Threeness is expressed in the New Testament with a doctrinal sense and force? Where is the Triune God held up to be worshipped, loved and obeyed? Where is He preached and proclaimed in that threefold character? We read, 'God is one,' as, too, 'I and the Father are one;' but nowhere do we read that Three are one, unless it be in a text long since known to be interpolated. Nowhere in scripture is there the idea of numerical virtue or mystic number. The number 'Seven' indeed is often found invested with sacredness, such as in its application to the division of time, and the gifts of the Spirit; but that is very different from the introduction of number as an attribute into the Supreme Object of worship. To me the whole matter is most painful and perplexing, and I should not even speak as I now do, did not I feel on the threshold of the grave, soon to appear before the throne of all truth."

Premising that he has "no wish to be thought a single step on the way to Arianism," although, as a matter of fact, he is very far gone in that direction, the learned writer speaks of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds as follows:—

"In neither of these creeds, and certainly not in Scripture, do we find the expression 'God the Son,' or 'God the Holy Ghost.' Whenever I pronounce the name of God simply and first, I mean God the Father, and I cannot help meaning that if I am meaning anything. When, therefore, I immediately add 'the Son,' or 'the Holy Ghost,' I am conscious of a departure from the sense I opened my mouth with. The first invocation, namely, that to 'God the Father,' is to me intelligible and clear, for the words bear finite sense with infinite enlargement. But as the words stand, and in the order in which they stand, the other invocations are not to me intelligible. When I pronounce them I feel in a momentary maze, as if a dizziness had come on me, or as if I had slipped and were twisted round. I have had to execute a performance, and I have always done it ill."

Yet after these frank confessions this venerable clergyman, speaking as "on the threshold of the grave," concludes his chapter on the Trinity in the following cynical and thoroughly sceptical language:—

"I use the words 'God the Son' and 'God the Holy Ghost' both in public and in private. I have used them in private the very day I write this. I should not hesitate to perform the Marriage Service, though the words are there, the Church of England having taken that opportunity of inculcating its very 'highest;' that is, its most unintelligible doctrine. I have continually, up to the present time, used the Catechism for children, though I must say that if the question 'What dost thou chiefly learn in these articles of thy Belief' could be put for the first time to the entire Anglo-Saxon race, I feel quite sure that not one of them, young or old, would return the second and third answers (expressing belief in 'God the Son' and 'God the Holy Ghost'), or answers even like unto them. . . . Religious people are habituated to be random in their expressions. They speak in unknown tongues for others to interpret if they can."

On the Thirty-nine Articles and the Catechism Mr. Mozley is equally outspoken:—

"I cannot remember the time when I liked the Thirty-nine Articles, or thought them anything else than articles of peace, and worth about as much as articles of peace generally are. I do not think that anybody does like the Thirty-nine Articles."

"I could never understand why the Almighty is said to be 'without passions.' In the Bible he is described as loving and hating; as being jealous and indignant, and admiring his own works. Church of England writers tell us that these words mean nothing."

"The Seventeenth Article I always regarded as a piece of rigmarole, and nothing more."

"Speaking generally of the Articles of the Catechism, and of large portions of the Prayer Book, I used to suspect them the work of men without knowledge of human nature, without bowels of compassion, working for promotion and getting it."

"The Church Catechism has been the sorest trial of my long life. From youth to age it is the wheel on which I have been racked and tortured. To me it is a millstone tied to the neck of the Church of England. . . . Any Christian might repeat with advantage every day of his life the explanation of his duty to God and to his neighbour. All the rest seems to me a vulgar attempt to reduce the Gospel to portable and negotiable form. It cannot be the natural instinct of any true pastor to make such a string of abstractions the basis of a child's religious education. I could not help liking Charles Kingsley, and greatly admiring most of his works; but I will confess I never quite felt the same respect for his moral qualities after I heard him preach at Whitehall a most fulsome eulogy of the Church Catechism as the best possible basis of Christian teaching."

On the question of the inspiration of Scripture Mr. Mozley at an early period of his inquiries repeatedly found himself "in hopeless chronological and historical difficulties," and he was more startled than comforted when R. Wilberforce, brother of the Bishop, once said he did not believe in literal inspiration.

The Apostles' Creed he thought he understood, "not so the interpretations." The dogmatic statements even from childhood lay on the surface of his mind, neither accepted nor rejected, neither understood nor questioned, "as precious yet antiquated and cumbersome heirlooms or family relics, things kept because people cannot make up their minds to throw them away."

As for the Athanasian Creed, our author can hardly describe the chaotic medley of notions and sensations that document always raised in him to a very late date:—

"I used to be seriously distressed, indeed, depressed, at the sad but inevitable fate of the many myriads of poor creatures who for want of natural capacity or educational advantages would never be able to understand and accept that Creed, and who would therefore be burnt alive to all eternity. Could I say that I understood it myself? Reverence long prevented me from saying anything about the Creed, but the less I said the more I felt. The notion of an eternal and hideous punishment, not for one's own sins alone, but for the misfortune of being descended from Adam, lay for at least half my life as an incubus on my soul. To say that I quite believed it would be too much, but I could not quite disbelieve it. I was asleep, and it was a dream. I could no more argue against it than I could argue against a toothache. I might reason and talk, but there it was still. As to the Articles of the Creed itself, I never reconsidered them without a fresh sense of difficulty. The sonship of Jesus Christ appears most strongly, definitely, and tenderly on the very face of the Gospel, and, indeed, the whole of the New Testament. Not to speak now of the other Creeds, that Sonship becomes merely titular in the Athanasian Creed. . . Again, I could not see the propriety of the parallel between the union of the body and soul in man, and the union of God and man in Christ. I once mentioned my difficulty to Newman, and he made some remark on the point. As far as my memory can recall, it was that some one had very early made the clause a loophole for the intrusion of heresy."

As a rural clergyman, he tells us, he continually craved for lighter, more attractive, and more varied services:—

"I will own that I still think many of the prayers and other forms incurably wordy and tedious. Any man who, in private life, persisted in using two words for one, and in repeating himself continually, would be avoided as a nuisance and thought an empty-headed, cold-hearted man. On what ground can stupidities intolerable to man be thought the language fittest for the presence of God."

"No Anglican layman or divine was ever so wildly enthusiastic for his Church as to set it up as a model for general imitation. The men who composed the English ritual cannot possibly have had the least inkling of the future of the British Empire. Even the double-minded son of Beor, even the Pagan sibyls, priests, and poets, had more of the prophet in them. When 'its peculiar form of the gospel' is offered to the heathen world, it is humiliating to feel that the vast majority of its fellow-citizens at home will have nothing to do with it, and abominate it from one quarter or another of the theological compass."

These are remarkable concessions and confessions, and may be compared with very similar statements from a very different point of view by Mr. H. W. Beecher, of which we have given some account on another page.

WE are informed by the Astronomer Royal at Greenwich that a new minor planet was discovered by M. Paul Henry at the Paris Observatory, on August 12, in twelve hours Right Ascension, twenty-two hours one minute declination, South, 13 degrees 35 minutes. It had a small motion towards the south, and its magnitude was twelve and a half.

MONUMENT TO ARNOLD OF BRESCIA.—On Monday with great circumstance of state and amid much popular enthusiasm a statue was unveiled at Brescia of Friar Arnold, the great precursor of the Reformation, who was burned in Rome in 1154. The Ministry was represented by Signori Zanardelli, Baccarini, Baccelli, and Magliani; and deputations were there from the senate, the Roman Municipality, and many other public bodies. Some three hundred workmen's associations, with a glittering array of banners, testified to the interest taken in the proceedings by the operatives of the town and province. At eleven the Syndic unveiled the statue, which represents Arnold in the act of preaching, and a prolonged burst of applause betokened its appreciation by the assembled throng. The Syndic then delivered a speech thanking the Minister, Signor Zanardelli, as King Humbert's representative, for having come to do homage to the great thinker and agitator, who dealt the first blow to the power of the Popes and ushered in the Reformation. After several other speeches, Signor Zanardelli, himself a native of Brescia, referred to the part so readily taken by Rome and Milan in the erection of this monument to Arnold of Brescia. He said this was an Italian festival, a day of rejoicing for all Italy redeemed from the power of the Vatican. Arnold's monument would be to all Italians a shrine instilling love of liberty and civil virtue.

EPPE'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Eppe has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in packets labelled—"JAMES EPPE & CO. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Eppe's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

DECAYING CONGREGATIONS.

The Unitarians are unfortunate in that while the total number of their congregations is by no means large, the proportion of decaying ones is very considerable. It would be useful if an inquiry were made into the circumstances of these ailing and failing bodies, so that—their exact symptoms being known—appropriate remedies might be suggested. In some cases ministers and flocks repose upon little endowments, which operate as poppy pillows and soothe them into slumber. If by chance a somnolent minister should depart, and a wakeful one take his place, the elders usually object to his disturbing the dead calm which they have found comfortable, and he can thus do nothing to act upon families outside the little clique. There are congregations consisting chiefly of elderly people, with few young ones in their train, and insisting upon the services being conducted exactly as they were before modern criticism, science, and historical research had materially altered opinions about inspiration, the authority of the Bible, the probability of miracles, and the nature of the Divine government of the universe. Adhesion to the old plans does not attract new comers, and they take so little hold of the young people that marriages, more often than not, carry them off to the Church or some other orthodox body.

Cases frequently occur in which the energy of a minister is damped by forcing upon him the Ten Services, or some other wearisome and semi-orthodox liturgical compilation, and by leaving him no choice of hymns but from collections remarkably free from anything that can be called poetry, and formed upon Dr. Martineau's principle of excluding matter from other than professedly Christian sources. Through these limitations little is provided for the gratification of taste or idealism, and next to nothing for moral aspiration.

The right place of the Bible in a progressive service is a question practically shirked by the decaying congregations, and under this term should be included those which, though fairly well off to-day, have a poor look out upon to-morrow, as they receive no recruits to fill the inevitable gaps resulting from deaths, removals and other causes. Ministers in various parts of the country complain that congregations require the accustomed first and second lessons to be given in the old-fashioned way, and that reinforcing the best teachings of the Bible by readings from other books is not permitted. A retired minister, of considerable experience, relates that he found it extremely difficult to make biblical selections to the extent required for two services each Sunday upon this plan. Solemnly reading passages with accounts of miracles he did not believe, or verses expressing the ferocity of old Hebrew warriors, without a word of reprobation or explanation, he felt was not consistent with a clear conscience, nor instructive to the congregation.

A Liberal Unitarian desires a service to be distinctly religious, and thus differing from that which satisfies the Secularist, but he wishes it to be a means of culture, and, like the Secularist's ideal, positively connected with duty and progress. For the Orthodox, the one thing needful is to set forth the mythological scheme of salvation, and get it accepted. The Church Liturgy, admirable as a piece of literary work, makes the worshipper approach the Deity of the system as an Oriental goes to the Court of his Sovereign to ask a favour. Abundant professions of vileness on the part of the applicant, great compliments to the potentate, and enough iteration to obtain his gracious assent. A loftier conception of the Deity makes all this repulsive, and exalts prayer as the soul's aspiration to the Highest and the Best. The prayers of the Church Liturgy and of its imitations cannot be said, on the whole, to have this character, whatever may be the value of their best passages. The orthodox evangelical conception of religion severs it from culture; "believing the Bible true" is, according to its teachings, all the human soul requires, and it is of far more importance to be sure the whale swallowed Jonah than to imbibe the spirit of the finest secular literature.

Quite opposite to this the religious reformer sees and feels the importance of associating the highest attainable culture with religion. Science, art, and literature culminate in his religion, and its amplest development requires their aid. A service which has only a rhyme jingle in its hymns, tiresome tunes, deprecation in its prayers, and no literary culture in its lessons and sermons, cannot attract earnest minds out of other sects, or out of that huge limbo of indifference in which so many sink. But it will be said no Unitarian chapel provides services bad enough to deserve this description. Perhaps not, in its fulness of desolation, but the decaying congregations would be found to exhibit some at least of the faults specified in a greater or less degree; and that they do so is often the fault of conservative members rather than of the unfortunate minister they sit upon and depress. They are intolerant of new ways, and are content with the placid respectability of a routine performance that excites no intellect, and rouses no heart.

In the superstition of holy buildings the Conservative Unitarian is much narrower than the Baptist, the Independent, or the Scotch Presbyterian. There may be no room in his locality available for purposes of public utility and enlightenment, but he is quite content to let them suffer. His chapel must be shut all the week, and its walls never permitted to vibrate to the sounds of anything secular—nothing in literature or science attaining to the peculiar sort of sanctity to which the unfortunate building is exclusively dedicated.

As a rule, young people joining, or belonging to, a decaying Unitarian Congregation get nothing for their trouble but mental short commons upon dry crusts of theology. Is it wonderful that the places fail, and the body that will not grow visibly declines?

A model Unitarian church should provide services up to the best thought and aspiration of the age. Without change there is no progress, and congregations determined to anchor themselves fast to what suited their great-grandmothers may see the world go on while they repose, but will no more contribute to its motion than a snail on a fly-wheel, and at the end of each revolution they will be where they were before.

LIFE IS MOTION.

SAFFRON WALDEN.—The 171st anniversary of the General Baptist Congregation was held on Aug. 6, when two sermons were preached, in the morning by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, and in the evening by Mr. Joseph Clark, Evangelist, from Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London. The evening's discourse was an earnest and practical one, impressively delivered, and heard with marked attention by a large congregation. In the afternoon the sixty-second anniversary of the Sunday-school was commemorated, the sermon being delivered by Mr. A. J. Marchant, of East Surrey Grove Chapel, Peckham, whose address was singularly appropriate to the occasion. Special hymns were sung by the scholars both afternoon and evening.

THE ANTI-JEWISH CRUSADE IN GERMANY.—The anti-Semitic agitation, which appeared to have somewhat subsided recently, has, says the Berlin correspondent of the Chronicle, again broken out, in view of the approaching general election for the Prussian Landtag. As a measure of prudence it is understood that the Progressists will not bring forward any Jew as candidate in Berlin, but the anti-Jewish leaders affect to believe that Progressists of all sorts are alike in this matter, the Christians being mere "valets" to the Jews. This last choice phrase we owe to Dr. Heinrici, whose popularity does not seem to have diminished. This "Germanomania," as he is called, holds forth weekly amid the enthusiastic plaudits of a crowd numbering upwards of 8,000 assembled in a public-house saloon, demonstrating to his clear-headed and unprejudiced audience that there can be neither national dignity nor economic, artistic, nor literary prosperity in Germany so long as the Jews are tolerated. The famous Pastor Stöcker has also returned to the capital, and announces that he will immediately resume his sermons on the same subject. These addresses are delivered at the meetings of the Workmen's Christian-Socialistic Association.

THE Literary World states that the Congress has again postponed action with regard to the proposed new building for the National Library at Washington.

Occasional Notes.

MR. H. RICHARD, M.P., in his recent speech on the Egyptian crisis, relates the origin of the phrase "Peace-at-any-price party," on the authority of Sir C. Dilke. He says that "so far as he knows, it was first used by Friedrich von Gentz, the celebrated German political writer, and one of the secretaries of the Congress at Vienna, who, in 1815, applied it contemptuously to Lord Castlereagh and the Duke of Wellington a few months before the battle of Waterloo. It has been applied with the same want of discrimination ever since." It may be remembered that the Duke subsequently conceded Catholic emancipation rather than expose a country which he loved to those horrors of war which he knew so well. Mr. Richard warns us against a "War-at-any-cost party, who are always ready to inflame public opinion to the fighting point."

CATHOLICS have peculiar advantages in their power of purchasing vicarious merits. Mr. Broadley, in his recent work on Tunis, tells us how the head of the confraternity of "freres d'Afrique" put forth the following announcement:—"Our associates are aware that by paying the sum of 800 francs they can support for a year a missionary in Africa. They become in this manner partners in his works and meritorious actions, as well as in his crown of martyrdom, as happened in the case of the charitable benefactors who adopted the three missionaries who died for the faith on their road to Timbuctoo." We fear that those who can thus purchase a crown of martyrdom without any personal suffering must feel rather aggrieved when their missionary reaches Timbuctoo with a whole skin!

MISS PHELPS, the author of "Gates Ajar," and other thoughtful books, has a remarkable article in a recent number of the North American Review. In this article Miss Phelps, who is closely related—in more ways than one—with one of the oldest orthodox theological schools in America, sweeps away the old creeds with startling emphasis. She asserts that "we" or "a growing proportion of intelligent Christians, do not believe that the Bible teaches the doctrine of eternal hell at all," that the "majority of the human race are dammed," that souls are predestined to hell, that "babies go to hell," that "God gets angry," and that "Christ died to satisfy his vengeance," that "God made the world in six days of twenty-four hours each," and that "the Bible is literally and verbally inspired." "We do not believe, and our scholars do not teach us, that our Bible requires us to believe these things."

"WE do want here and there a touch of liturgy," says the Rev. Wm. C. Gannett, in Chicago Unity. "It will prove a touch of beauty." Our Congregational service has become as uncongregational as it well can be. It needs to be improved by securing the participation of the congregation.

THE Christian Register remarks on the question of responsive reading of the Psalms:—"Whether a liturgy is used in a service or not, pains should be taken to secure unity. If the Psalms are to be used in responsive reading, the selections should be carefully made. To read the Psalms at random, as they stand in the ordinary version, is to make minister and people say a good many things after each other which may have made sense in the Hebrew two thousand years ago, but which do not make any sense to-day. The imprecatory Psalms are not devotional, and not Christian in their spirit. Why should Christians pray that Jehovah would break the heathen with a rod of iron, or dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel, and then take up collections to send these same heathen the gospel of peace? Other passages are grotesque, and produce anything but a solemn impression. Thus, in the twenty-second Psalm, it is not impressive for the minister, if a lean man, to say, 'I may tell my bones: they look and stare upon me;' while, further on in the same Psalm, it is said, 'All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship.' Nor is it congenial to devotion for the people to collectively confess in the seventieth Psalm that 'Moab is my wash-pot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe.' Where the minister reads alone, he can judiciously omit such passages; but, in responsive reading, to skip is to produce a general disaster. A good selection from the Psalms should be free from such incongruities."

THE Christian at Work has become a Philistine of the deepest dye. In reply to Matthew Arnold's remark that the "Protestant idea of Heaven is that of a glorified, unending tea-meeting," it suggests that Matthew Arnold's idea of Heaven is that "of a place where a select coterie of literary gentlemen can criticise Almighty God to all eternity."

THE Church Times has been favoured with a definition of faith which it avers has just been formulated by a pupil at a young ladies' school, and which "must fill the editor of the Tablet and other votaries of the religion of authority with mingled envy and admiration." It is to the following effect: "Faith is the gift or faculty whereby we believe what we know is not true." Yet the Church Times and its party also require faith in a great many things which to the reasonable mind are altogether incredible.

UNDER the attractive heading "Memorable Residents at Islington, Barnsbury, and Pentonville," Notes and Queries of last week gives, among others, the following brief notice of a venerable friend who was in former years a frequent correspondent of the Inquirer:—

"Henry Taylor, the author of the Beekeepers Annual and other works and one of the inventors of the Humane Beehive, resided many years at 14, Halton-road, Canonbury-square. He was cousin to Harriet Martineau, the authoress, and also to Professor Edward Taylor the Gresham Lecturer on Music, and Edgar Taylor, who translated Kinder und Hausmährchen by the Brothers Grimm, 1823, illustrated with twelve etchings by G. Cruikshank. Henry Taylor, died March 2, 1869, aged eighty-one years."

ONE vestige of an obsolete system under which a legal fiction has rendered possible much practical injustice and wrong has been swept away by the enactment of the Married Women's Property Bill, which extends to every married woman the legal power, secured to the rich in exceptional instances by means of trust deeds and settlements, of exercising the control which rightfully appertains to her, as to property belonging to her at the time of marriage, or bequeathed to her in her married condition.

SATURDAY last being the anniversary of the defeat of the Spanish Armada, according to annual custom a short service was held, and a sermon preached in reference to the event at St. Mary-le-Bow Church, Cheapside, in accordance with the wills of certain individuals. The rector took for his text Joshua x. 42, "And all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time, because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel."

THE late Professor Jevons, whose loss is so deeply deplored, was the author of several works besides those mentioned in our obituary notice, and was also a contributor to the Academy, the Fortnightly Review, the Contemporary Review, and Monthly Notes of the Literary Association. While staying at Bexhill he wrote an article on "Reflected Rainbows," which appears in The Field Naturalist, a Manchester periodical, issued by Messrs. Abel Heywood and Sons. Some words at the close of this treatise, "Principles of Science," attracted great attention at the time, and will now be read again with increased interest. After saying, "I question whether any scientific works which have appeared since the 'Principia' of Newton are comparable in importance with those of Darwin and Spencer, revolutionising as they do all our views of the origin of bodily, mental, moral, and social phenomena," he proceeds to discuss the question whether the scientific method will "result in dissipating the fondest beliefs of the human heart," and comes to the conclusion that before "a rigorous logical scrutiny the reign of Law will prove to be an unverified hypothesis, the uniformity of nature an ambiguous expression, the certainty of our scientific inferences to a certain extent a delusion." He saw nothing destructive of theistic conception in the last results of time, and was not prepared to admit that the theory of evolution would alter theological views. "Theologians," he remarks, "have dreaded the establishment of the theories of Darwin and Spencer as if they thought that those theories could explain everything upon the purest mechanical and material principles, and exclude all notions of design. 'They do not see that those theories have opened up more questions than they have closed.' . . . My purpose, as I have repeatedly said, is the purely negative one of showing that Atheism and Materialism are no necessary results of the scientific method. From the preceding reviews of the value of our scientific knowledge I draw one distinct conclusion, that we cannot disprove the possibility of divine interference in the course of nature." The book came to a second edition in 1877, and the additional preface contained much interesting matter.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian World writes in the following interesting way respecting two of Tennyson's more obscure allusions:—

"In July, 1880, one of the Laureate's admirers—the undersigned—took the liberty of writing him, respectfully asking to what poet he referred in the first ode of In Memoriam, 'I held it truth with him who sings,' &c., and in reply he said: 'As far as I can recollect I referred to Goethe in the passage to which you allude.' He referred me to no particular passage, and I cannot oblige your readers with same, but I think his reply ought to be final. Longfellow's Ladder of St. Augustine was not published at the time—we may reasonably suppose the first ode of In Memoriam to have been written, i.e., shortly after the death of Arthur Hallam, in 1833; and again the passage from St. Augustine's writings, on which Longfellow's poem is founded, refers to the voices of men. The words are, 'De vitiis nostris scalam nobis facimus, si vitia ipsa calcamus,' taken from his sermon on the Ascension. In In Memoriam it is grief and not vice that is alluded to. 'It is possible that many of your readers do not know what poet is referred to in the following lines from Locksley Hall:—

'This is truth the poet sings
That a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.'

Readers of Dante will remember the tender expression which he puts into the mouth of Francesca di Rimini, when at his request, in the depths of eternal torment, she repeats the story of her guilty love for Paolo. It is found in the fifth canto of the Inferno. The poet and his guide, standing for a few moments in 'the wind swept circle of hell,' listening to the half-told story of the ill-fated woman, ask her to tell them more. The poem then goes on:—

Ed ella a mi: nessun maggior dolore
Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
Nella miseria.

"The sentiment is all contained in the above simple words, but the thought is older than Dante, and it may be found in Boetius, a writer eagerly studied by Dante—and, if I am not mistaken, in Chaucer. The literal meaning of Francesca's words, as given in Carlyle's prose translation, are:—'And she to me, There is no greater pain than to recall a happy time in wretchedness.'"

THE Municipality of Rome has let into the wall of the Hotel dell'Orso a marble tablet with the following inscription:—"S.P.Q.R. In this ancient hostelry lived the French moralist Montaigne, author of the 'Livre des Sages,' which contributed so much to the progress of the new philosophy. The Roman Senate conferred upon him the rights of a citizen of Rome."

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—Rheumatism, Neuralgia.—It is sometimes difficult to determine which of these diseases is afflicting the sufferer, but this ignorance will not matter if Holloway's remedies be used. They alleviate and cure all muscular, nervous, and spasmodic pains. In hereditary rheumatism, after bathing the affected parts with warm salt water, Holloway's Ointment should be well rubbed upon the spot, that it may penetrate and exert its soothing and regulating properties on the deeper vessels and nerves which are unduly excited, and cause both the pain and swelling. Holloway's remedies possess the merit of removing the disease without debilitating the constitution, which was the inevitable result of the bleeding, mercury, and colchicum practice formerly adopted in these complaints.

Reviews.

The Prophets of Israel and their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century, B.C. Eight Lectures by W. Robertson Smith, LL.D. Edinburgh, A. and C. Black. 1882.

This volume carries on the work begun in Dr. Robertson Smith's Old Testament in the Jewish Church. It has had a similar origin in a course of lectures "delivered last winter to large popular audiences in Edinburgh and Glasgow, at the invitation of an influential committee of gentlemen interested in the progress of biblical study." The lectures have, however, received considerable additions, and like their predecessors, are enriched with a valuable series of notes, containing critical and philological discussions, in which the writer has contrived with admirable brevity to handle a number of controverted subjects with a rich erudition and a weighty judgment.

The previous volume was chiefly occupied with an exposition of the principles and methods of historical criticism, applied especially to the origins of the Pentateuch. The results there exhibited are here assumed. Dr. Robertson Smith starts from the distribution of the existing five books of the law into three great groups of material; (1) A nucleus of ancient Torah, together with narratives embracing the patriarchal traditions and the history of the wanderings and the Conquest, and recognising the existence of a plurality of sanctuaries; (2) The Deuteronomic law, abolishing all loyal centres of Yahveh worship, and enforcing the unity of the sanctuary; (3) The Levitical law, assuming the unity of the sanctuary, and setting forth the rights and privileges of the Aaronic priesthood. The first of these may be referred to the eighth century, though its contents are of course far older; the second to the reign of Josiah, near the close of the seventh century B.C.; the third is now assigned, by a cumulation of evidence which in Dr. Robertson Smith's view amounts to positive demonstration, to the period of the Exile, or later.

It was with a just insight that Dr. Robertson Smith began his labours with this analysis; for the reconstruction of the history of Israel's religious life is impossible until it has been accomplished. In the lectures now under consideration, however, he is able to proceed to the more important task of describing the actual progress of the faith of the nation. The first lecture rapidly traces its early phases from the time of the conquest of Canaan to the consolidation of national unity through the struggle with the Philistines. In the second the writer passes on to the reign of Ahab, and the great contest of which Elijah was the hero. The third describes the preaching of Amos; the fourth analyses the teaching of Hosea; while the second half of the volume is occupied with the ministry of Isaiah and Micah, and the religious aspect of politics during the Assyrian invasions.

It will be seen at once that such a survey involves the discussion of some of the most difficult problems of Hebrew religion. Dr. Robertson Smith brings the same ample equipment as before; not the remotest paper in journals, of which many English critics have probably never heard the name, has escaped his attention. His wide range of knowledge, and especially his familiarity with Arabic writers, open to him a large variety of illustration from sources accessible only to very few; while his experiences of Eastern travel and the existing habits of the desert supply many a distinctive touch to his picture of Israel's life. More important still is his keenness of psychological analysis; witness, for instance, his discussion of Isaiah's vision (pp. 219 sqq.), and his delicate and subtle handling of the difference between the collective and national ethics of the Old Testament and the personal morals of the New. The points of contact between the primitive religion of Israel and of the neighbouring nations are exhibited with conscientious care. The numerous terms common to the ritual vocabulary of Hebrews and Phenicians, the similarity in the relations of the King of Moab to his god Chemosh, and the King of Israel to his god Yahveh, the common conceptions of death and the underworld, the adoption of many of the Canaanite rites, and especially the applications of the divine name Baal, all show the existence of tendencies of thought and feeling in Israel analogous to those at work among the surrounding nations. Many of Dr. Smith's remarks in his first lecture are full of illumination as to the religious value (during the ages succeeding the Conquest) of those local sanctuaries which the Deuteronomist afterwards so strongly denounced. They helped to bring Yahveh nearer to the people when their federation was weakened by the want of a central religious authority; and the cause of Yahveh, who had brought them out of Egypt, was the cause of liberty; the cause of Yahveh, who gave judgment through the priest, was the cause of law, and justice, and order. The effects of corruption, therefore, at these local sanctuaries were all the more serious, and it was these which called forth the denunciations of Amos and Hosea against the crimes of the priesthood and the general demoralisation of which they were at once symptom and cause. Dr. Smith points out with much force that Elijah and Elisha waged no war against these local sanctuaries, or even against the calf-worship: nay, Amos himself nowhere names this as the essence of the national sin; not till the time of Hosea is it singled out for reprobation, and then it is not on the ground of any divine prohibition, such as the second command of the Decalogue, but because it represented a lower order of thought incapable of being harmonised with the purity demanded by Yahveh. The transition from the fundamental ideas of Amos to those of Hosea is delineated by Dr. Smith with singular skill and felicity, and his whole treatment of Hosea's book is full of insight and sympathy. We wish he had dwelt at greater length on the rise of a prophetic literature on the passage from the ministry of action—such as Elijah's—to that of speech, in Amos. Everyone must feel how wide is the gap between the cycle of Elijah—traditions in the books of Kings, and the literary culture, the breadth and force of the first monument of Hebrew prophecy. This gap remains by no means wholly bridged over in the lectures before us.

Many readers, however, may feel a higher interest attaching to the second portion of the book, dealing with the writings and life-work of Isaiah. The problems of authorship are handled with brevity, but with decision (see, in particular, the criticisms of Mr. Cheyne's theory of two Assyrian invasions of Judah, one under Sargon, and the second under Sennacherib); and the exposition of the principal groups of the prophecies leaves nothing to be desired. The explanation of the difference of view between Isaiah and Jeremiah regarding the inviolability of the Sanctuary at Jerusalem contains many points of interest; though we do not think the author is equally successful in his attempt to minimise the importance of the fact that Micah, Isaiah's contemporary, did actually announce that Zion should become a ploughed field, and the temple mountain be once more forest clad. The analysis of Isaiah's outlook into the future, however, makes it sufficiently clear that the essence of the prophetic ministry did not lie in prediction, though Dr. Smith is occasionally betrayed into too eager a desire to save the credit of the prophet's foresight, as in the case of the three years' "sign" of the expected conquest of Egypt and Ethiopia by the Assyrian power, and the consequent subjugation of the little kingdoms of Palestine (Isaiah xx.). That conquest never took place; but on the suppression of the Babylonian revolt, headed by Merodach Baladan, the Palestinian nations gave up all further hope of escape. "It is true," observes Dr. Smith (p. 282), "that this result had not come about in the way that Isaiah anticipated; but his assurance that their efforts after independence were hopeless had none the less justified itself." The failure of the prophet's anticipations to receive literal fulfilment is seen still more strongly in such cases as that of the Immanuel sign addressed to Ahaz (vii. 14-25), and the portrayal of the ideal kingdom which was to follow immediately on the Assyrian overthrow (x., xi.). The cause of this is set forth in a passage of admirable frankness, which will suffice to show with what sympathy and clearness our author writes:—

righteousness, the certainty that His cause on earth is imperishable, and must triumph over all the wrath of man, that His word of grace cannot be without avail, and that the community of His grace is the one thing on earth that cannot be brought to nought—these are the spiritual certainties, the possession of which constituted Isaiah a true prophet. Everything else in his teaching is nothing more than an attempt to give these principles concrete shape and tangible form in relation to the problems of his own day. The practical lessons which he drew from them for the conduct of life were in all respects absolutely justified. At every point his insight into the actual position of affairs, his judgment on the sin of Judah and the right path of amendment, his perception of the true sources of danger and the true way of deliverance, had that certainty and clear decisiveness which belong only to a vision purged from the delusions of sense by communion with things eternal and invisible. But when he embodied his faith and hope in concrete pictures of the future these pictures were, from the necessity of the case, not literal forecasts of history, but poetic and ideal constructions. Their very object was to gather up the laws of God working into a single dramatic action—to present in one image, and within the limited scene of action that lay before the Hebrews, the operation of those divine forces of which Isaiah had only apprehended the simplest elements, and which since his day have expanded themselves in new and more complex workings through all the widening cycles of history. In such dramatic pictures it is only artistic or poetical truth that can be looked for. The insight of the prophet, like that of the unprophetic dramatist, vindicates itself in the delineation of true motives, in the representation of the actual forces that rule the evolution of human affairs, not in the exact reproduction of any one stage of past or future history."—Pp. 340-342.

This passage shows that the author's thought, while clothing itself to some extent in evangelical language, has yet emancipated itself altogether from traditional conceptions. It is one of the great merits of this book that it is written with so firm a grasp on historic realities, and yet with so clear a discernment of great religious truths. Only here and there do we find ourselves compelled to dissent from its method of statement. The writer believes that the comparison of the course of the development of religious truth in Israel, with its fitful and imperfect manifestations elsewhere, entitles the revelation of the Old and New Testaments to claim to be a revelation of God to men in a special and absolute sense. "It is not necessary," he continues (p. 14), "to encumber the argument by comparing the way in which individual divine communications were given to Israel with the way in which the highest thinkers of other nations came to grasp something of spiritual truth." But no one can long rest satisfied with such a distinction. The prophetic truths were often embodied in forms which proved delusive. How can the special divine revelation be reserved for them alone, while other truths veiled under other symbols are assigned to human discovery? A theory of revelation which cannot be defined is of no value as an explanation. It may be that the phenomenon is not capable of exact explanation, and there is no refuge but in silence. In that case we must frankly recognise our impotence, and confess that we cannot draw aside the veil. Or it may be that the explanation of the source of the positive element in all religious truth is that which Dr. Robertson Smith so well offers (p. 12); but then, any explanation, to be adequate, must fit all the facts, and be universally true of the attainment of all insight into heavenly things. More and more does the conviction slowly grow that the methods of God's education of our race are uniform in kind, and that no generic differences can be established between the divinely revealed and the humanly acquired truths. The attempt is abandoned to establish these differences in detail on the basis of supernatural prediction and its subsequent fulfilment. Nothing can be franker than Dr. Robertson Smith's surrender to the plain evidences of events. But he is still of opinion that a general survey of the contributions of Israel to our knowledge of God and his ways to men justifies the endeavour to vindicate for the prophets some peculiar relation to the counsels of infinite wisdom, some communication of thought other than that by which God slowly draws men to clearer vision and pro-founder faith. The difference in our author's view is vital, for he thinks that the denial of it involves the reduction of religion to nothing more than a vague subjective feeling. We are convinced, however, that the transference of his appeal from the field of specific prediction to the broad domain of history—that is, in reality, to the witness of the human heart which interprets it—will result in the recognition that “in all ages wisdom, entering into holy souls, maketh them friends of God and prophets; and the seers of Israel will stand at the head of a larger band of many races and lands and tongues, representing in poorer or richer measure the ultimate aspiration of all prophetic hope that the knowledge of God may cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.”

The Last Punic War: Tunis, Past and Present.

With a Narrative of the French Conquest of the Regency. By A. M. Broadley, Barrister-at-Law; Correspondent of the Times during the War in Tunis. Two Volumes, with Illustrations. W. Blackwood and Sons. 1882.

As the city of Tunis adjoins the site of Carthage, it is natural to a scholar to call the recent invasion the last “Punic war,” and Mr. Broadley also regards the tortuous diplomacy connected with it as a display of “Punica fides,” or treachery. He made acquaintance with Mahomedans when in the Civil Service in Bengal, and he is much impressed with the effects of the French invasion in wakening a Moslem agitation, not only in Tunis, but in Tripoli and Egypt. He says in his preface:—

“In Europe its effects have been hardly less momentous. Italy has become the avowed enemy of France, England no longer believes in the peaceful intentions of the Government of the Republic. Spain is hankering after Morocco, and Germany is posing as the champion of the Caliphate. In Italy the Ministry of Signor Carroli fell twice within a month, because it was unable to stay effectually the tide of French Diplomacy; while, in France, M. Ferry succumbed to the unpopularity which attends a failure, and M. Gambetta was wrecked in the storm to a great extent occasioned by his injudicious support of M. Roustan. All this, and much more, has resulted from the taking of Carthage.”

These volumes are emphatically “in season.” No one can form a sound judgment as to what should be our policy in Egypt who is not acquainted with the principal facts which they detail. Mr. Broadley had peculiar facilities for gaining information, and he seems to have employed them ably and well.

A brief account of the country and people of Tunis is followed by a concise historical narrative. The conquest of Tunis by Charles V. is illustrated by reduced photographs from five pictures by Vermeyer, an artist whom the Emperor brought in his train. After about forty years, in 1573, the Spaniards were expelled by the Turks. Thenceforth “the Tunisian corsairs practically held all Europe at bay, and lived and thrived on the blackmail which they levied almost with impunity on every power having commerce with the shores of the Mediterranean.” Even the United States paid tribute, under the form of a treaty (1799), to put a stop to the depredations committed on their shipping. We are most familiar with the details of Algerine slavery; but the people of Tunis had no scruple in capturing and enslaving Christians. In April, 1816, Lord Exmouth, after his first expedition to Algiers,* proceeded to Tunis and Tripoli, and obtained from both those piratical Governments a promise to abolish the slavery of Christians; but this concession was attended with a formidable revolt of the Tunis troops. In 1842, owing to the representations of the British Consul General, Sir T. Reade, all slavery was finally abolished in Tunis.

A large portion of the first volume relates the intrigues of the French and other powers. It was the policy of England to keep the “Regency” as a portion of the Turkish Empire. The great importance of the harbours of Bizerta and Tunis, as the keys to the Mediterranean, was felt by all the naval powers. When Italy became a kingdom, Napoleon III. is said in a rash moment to have offered Tunis to it, and Mazzini, in 1877, reminds his countrymen that they were masters of that land till the fifth century—that ‘as Algiers belonged to France, so Morocco should belong to Spain, and Tunis to Italy; it is only about eighty miles from Italy. As in Egypt the path to European intervention was prepared by the extravagance of the Regent, and the greed of adventurers. We are given a striking picture of favouritism and corruption. The following is the account of the rise of the prime minister of Tunis, Mustapha Ben Ishmael:—

“Twenty years ago, a little boy in a tattered shirt and battered red cap was often cuffed for somewhat too obtrusively picking up cigar-ends in the European cafés of Tunis. A benevolent Maltese tavern-keeper gave him a suit of cloths, and for a few months he got more kicks than backshish from his master's customers. When tired of serving infidel wine-bibbers, he became the apprentice of a barber, and then the servant of one of the officers of the Turkish Guard. . . . Muhamed es Sadek was the first to perceive his natural abilities, and transferred him from the service of the Turkish colonel to his own. Little more need be said of his career, till we find him, in 1877, Tunisian Lord Privy Seal; and by some peculiar fiction, sometimes described as the Bey's ‘son-in-law,’ and at others as his ‘adopted son.’”—Vol. I., p. 164.

The appendix contains a list of the enormous acquisitions of this favourite.

Mr. Broadley is, we believe, a Conservative, and he laments the apathy of our Government in promoting the French occupation; but he quotes the account of the effect of the Berlin Conference given by M. De Blowitz, the Paris correspondent of the Times. Prince Bismarck told him that he had said to Lord Beaconsfield, that he had better let Russia be free at Constantinople, England take Egypt, and France Syria or Tunis. He had spoken in a similar strain to M. Waddington:—

“M. Waddington answered, what he afterwards publicly repeated, that France had no design on Tunis, but could not allow any other European power to instal itself there, and thus imperil her Algerian possessions. Thereupon came the news of the Cyprus Convention, on which the French press began attacking M. Waddington, asserting that the English occupation of Cyprus was a rebuff for French diplomacy. The Italian papers were still more excited, and blamed Count Corti for not returning from the Congress with some island in his pocket. This was the starting point of the Tunis Question.”—P. 170.

In a striking chapter—“Tunis before the Tribunal de la Seine” (Vol. II., pp. 247-281), we have the evidence in an action for libel brought by M. Roustan, the French Consul General in Tunis, the instigator of the expedition, against M. Rochefort, who had made it the subject of the most cutting invective, in which Saint Hilaire and Gambetta were more or less implicated. Roustan sustained an ignominious defeat.

It may be remembered that the pretext for the French invasion was the punishment of the Border tribes, who were said to have committed raids on Algiers. Mr. Broadley tells us that “the original disagreement was a dispute as to the part-ownership of a cow between a Tunisian and Algerian, and could really have been settled in five minutes at a police court.” As we seem to be doing in Egypt, the French Ministry declared that they were at peace with the country they invaded, and were merely helping its ruler to maintain his government! The helpless condition of the Bey is graphically described. Our author was himself employed to draw up and forward telegrams to the British Government: as the telegraph was in the hands of the French, the messages had to be conveyed to Sicily for transmission. England, however, declined to interfere. The French expedition was not to be a “war”—it was only a “promenade”; but the extent and danger of the enterprise had been greatly underrated, and at length 40,000 troops were despatched there. The levity with which it was undertaken led to a terrible neglect of sanitary preparations, which was only repaired at the eleventh hour.

In Chapter XLIII., “Mort pour la Patrie,” some startling details are recorded:—“If the untimely death of these two thousand striplings, amidst strangers in a foreign land, teaches statesmen of all nations the danger of substituting duplicity for diplomacy they will not indeed have died in vain.”

As war is the repeal of law, we are not surprised to read of the great destruction of property as well as of life, often befalling those who had nothing to do with the matter in dispute arising from this invasion, for which the security of property was made the pretext! In many instances the natives set an honourable example in protecting inoffensive aliens, which the French did not follow. The Tunisian Court seemed so utterly corrupt that we cannot much grieve over its overthrow; still it was better in some respects than the chaos which followed it.

Mr. Broadley accompanied two military expeditions—one sent by the Bey against the Khamirs, on which occasion he found it desirable to don the entire Arab costume; the other, with the French army that took Kairwán, which consisted of 7,000 soldiers escorting 8,800 camels and 1,500 mules, which carried thirty days' provision. Kairwán is situated about forty miles from the Mediterranean, in a sandy plain, surrounded by hills and mountains. It is the Holy City of North Africa, and for a thousand years, till the last century, no Christian seems to have visited it. Mr. Broadley remained there six days after its surrender to the French, and gives a full detail of what he saw, with several pictures of the remarkable mosques, &c. The main feature in the buildings is the wholesale appropriation of Roman materials. He visited the Necropolis:—

“Two square miles of countless graves! Scattered about in all directions were memorials of every shape and form, pillars of marble covered with elaborate tracery, and crowned with a wide-spread turban; white and grey slabs bearing long and ornate inscriptions in Kufic; and monuments of every century since Kairwán was founded, lay piled one upon another in the confusion of decay. From these unequalled memorials of the past the history of Arab dominion in North Africa will probably be rewritten.”—Vol. II., p. 179.

Kairwán is the chief seat of the Moslem confraternities, of which an account is given in the first volume. These exert a powerful influence, political as well as religious. One of these, the Aissaouia, in its practical form, belongs exclusively to the countries bordering on the Mediterranean; its “guiding principle seems to be the greatest possible measure of self-inflicted bodily torture, coupled with the greatest conceivable amount of religious frenzy.” Mr. Broadley describes his visit to their sanctuary. They number about a thousand at Kairwán, but only about fifty are fully initiated; these assume the distinctive cries and habits of some animal! Six or seven hundred Arabs were present. After some wild music and shrieking, a soldier seized a sword and wounded his stomach:—

“The blood flowed freely, and he imitated all the time the cries and movements of the camel. We soon had a wolf, a bear, a hyena, a jackal, a leopard, and a lion. One man knelt down before the sheikh, and holding two long prongs to his side, insisted on their being driven into his flesh with blows of a mallet; this was done. A mere lad did the same thing. A burly Arab passed an iron skewer through the upper part of his nose, and transfixed the skin of his face below the eyes. He rushed apparently towards us. Two or three powerful men knocked him down, and held him till the sheikh laid his hands on him, and whispered some mysterious formula in his ears. Another man, in quick succession, swallowed more than twenty large nails, there being no mistake whatever as to his really doing so. A large bottle was broken up and eagerly devoured. The frenzy then became general. While one Aissaoui plunged a knife through his cheek, another transfixed his shoulder blades with a prong, and a third pierced his hand. A brazier of cinders was speedily emptied. Twenty different tortures were now going on, in twenty different parts of the hall. Three large bushes of the thorny Indian fig or prickly pear were eaten up in almost as many minutes; and at last, before we had time to prevent it, a living sheep was thrown into the midst of the maddened Aissaouia; it was, in a trice, torn into shreds by eager hands, and still more eager mouths, and its still quivering and bleeding flesh gnawed to the bones with apparent relish. We left the college of Sidi Aissa as quickly as we could, and the orgies waxed more furious and more horrible in our absence."—Vol. II., pp. 183, 184.

Many Moslems asked Mr. Broadley, "What will your Queen say to our brothers in India when they know that the sanctity of our mosques and our holy places has been violated?" They considered that the Bey had acted the part of an unbeliever. They still trusted in the Sultan, but "the Arabs feel that their very existence is now in peril. If the Sultan declines to protect the faith of which he is the head, the Moslems will find a chief and Caliph who will." Many of them have taken refuge in Tripoli.

We hope that the important lessons taught by these volumes will receive some of the attention which they deserve. R. L. C.

Literary Notes.

THE Nation notices the first number of a Canadian weekly political and literary paper, called the Dominion Review (Montreal). It is said to be "a respectable and serious enterprise."

MR. CHARLES MARVIN has returned to England, and is now preparing to bring out his history of Skobelev's Siege of Geok Tepe, on which he has been engaged for some months past. His volume on "The Russian Advance towards India" has attracted attention in Russia, owing to its description of the home surroundings and opinions of General Skobelev.

MR. W. FRASER RAE has issued, through Messrs. Chapman and Hall, a handbook for Emigrants, entitled "Facts about Manitoba," which contains a mass of well-authenticated and valuable information. There are two maps, which have been carefully prepared.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN AND Co. will publish in the autumn a work on English grammar, by the Rev. W. G. Wrightson of Cambridge, which will carry the logical and grammatical analysis of the language farther than has yet been attempted in books of this kind.

THE "Practical Notes on Etching," by Mr. R. S. Chattock, which have been appearing in the Etcher, will shortly be reprinted, with additions and alterations, as a volume, which will be illustrated with etchings.

A VERY rare and exceedingly interesting print has been acquired by the trustees of the British Museum—viz., "The roial progenei of our most sacred King James I." It is engraved by Benjamin Wright, and published by Jonn Wontneel, 1603.

"TALKS ABOUT SCIENCE" is the title of a new work by the late Thomas Dunman, which Messrs. Griffith and Farran announce. The author was formerly lecturer on physiology at the Birkbeck Institution and the Working Men's College.

INTERESTING EXCAVATIONS AT LEWES.—The Sussex Advertiser announces that excavations of a highly interesting character are now on the point of being undertaken in the grounds of the ancient Priory of St. Pancras, at Lewes, under the direction of Mr. Somers Clarke, junr., F.S.A., and under the local supervision of Mr. W. H. St. John Hope, of Cambridge. The researches promise to be of national interest. The Priory of St. Pancras, founded by William de Warrenne and Gundrada, is one of the most ancient specimens of Norman architecture in this kingdom. The building is one of the very few houses of the Cluniac Order, once established in this county. The Cluniacs were noted for the splendour of their appointments, the magnificence of their churches, and the openness of their hospitality. The foundations of the eastern portion of the great church at Lewes, and also part of the chapter-house, were laid bare in the year 1847, at the time of the construction of the Brighton and Hastings Railway. The bones of the noble founders were also discovered. Since then nothing has been done. It is, however, sufficiently evident, from an examination of the remains and a comparison with others of a somewhat similar nature, that beneath the surface must lie a large portion of the nave and choir of the church, together with the bases of the western towers; also the substructures of the dormitory, refectory, infirmary, and other important adjuncts connected with a monastery of the first importance. It is now intended to open up the rest of the ruins. Mr. Somers Clarke appeals for funds to enable him to carry out the undertaking.

Our Contemporaries.

THE WAR PRAYER.

The Christian World expresses, as we have done, a feeling of surprise and disappointment at the Primate's War prayer:—

"We never saw any prayer in print more utterly conventional, more piteously commonplace, than this, in which the Archbishop of Canterbury invites his clergy to ask God's blessing on our arms in Egypt. There is no request that the nation should be saved from the guilt of rashness, of pride, of ambition, of avarice, in going to war; none that the Divine Spirit would quicken the national conscience to discern whether it is in the cause of righteousness, mercy, and peace that blood is to be shed; none that our enemies may be enlightened as to their sin or folly in causing us to attack them; none that the destruction wrought may be small, or the return of peace be speedy. The preserved soldiers and sailors are further to 'glorify' God 'through the merits' of Jesus Christ. Try to affix any definite idea to that. For our part, we cannot. Suppose that the prayer has been literally answered, and that the regiments now in Egypt, or on the way thither, have been paraded in Hyde Park without the loss of a man. Will that 'glorify' God in any sense which a spiritually-minded man attaches to divine glory? And how will the glorification be 'through the merits'—an entirely artificial, wholly unscriptural phrase—of Christ? Did Christ preach the Sermon on the Mount and die on Calvary in order that soldiers and sailors might glorify God by escaping from Arabi's bullets? The Most High is described as 'the only giver of all victory.' Battles are always victories to one side or the other, unless they are drawn battles, and if God is the only giver of all victories, He must, we should think, be glorified whichever side wins. Our decided impression is that the tautological emphasis of the Primate's words was associated here, too, with no clear apprehension of a meaning; but the words naturally suggest that the termination of wars by victory is a proof that the victory has been given by God to the victor as a mark of His approval. If this is the Archbishop's meaning, we repel and reject the proposition. The justice or injustice of wars cannot be determined by their event. Just wars have been unsuccessful, unjust wars have been crowned with victory, and the mystery of Providence cannot be unriddled by the most careful scanning of the military history of mankind."

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT AND MODERN GREEK.

The Daily News writes:—

Dr. Paspati, the leading archæologist of Constantinople, a great authority on modern Greek, and one who is also well acquainted with English, has written a paper on the subject of the revised New Testament from the point of view of modern Greek. He contends that many of the words in the text of the New Testament, though not to be found in dictionaries of classical Greek, are still in ordinary use at the present day, and with the same signification they had at the time the Greek texts were originally written. He states also that no author contemporary with any of the writers of the New Testament is so near in style and language to modern Greek as is the text of the New Testament. He suggests that some, at least, of the difficulties which the revisers have had to deal with might have been solved had there been a reviser well acquainted with modern and mediæval as well as with ancient Greek. Though he makes many suggestions for emendations, he yet considers that notwithstanding trifling faults the new translation represents more faithfully than any other in any European language the meaning of the original text. Some of his corrections are already known to scholars. He suggests that no one acquainted with modern Greek would think that the passage translated "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle," &c., meant anything else than it is easier for a rope or a cable so to pass through. The passage translated "Let the dead bury their own dead" means in the ears of a modern Greek "Let the wardens or sextons bury their own dead." The guardians of the temples were called Neokori, the dead were their special charge, and the word translated dead is an abbreviation of the word signifying wardens.

The passage in St. Matthew speaking of the temptation of our Lord should terminate, Dr.

Paspati thinks, with the words "Get thee behind Me, Satan." He thinks that this passage has the authority of antiquity in its favour. It appears in all of the Greek liturgies and most ancient texts. "When therefore thou doest alms sound not a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and the streets." The Greek term translated "sound a trumpet" is used commonly in modern Greek in the sense to proclaim publicly, and might have been so rendered. In a similar passage, in the sixth chapter, "for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and in the corner of the streets," the word translated "corner" means "open space," "a place where men congregate," "a square," and might have been translated "in the public squares." The same word is used in the 13th chapter of St. Luke, and is likewise translated "streets," "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city." The word translated "worship" in several instances in the New Testament is applied to denote respect paid to man as well as to God. It is used now, and was used in the first centuries after Christ, to signify worship to God, but a simple salute of respect to man, and might therefore have in many cases been translated "to salute." The Pharisees are spoken of as transgressing the tradition of the elders, "For they wash not their hands when they eat bread." To eat bread is the ordinary expression amongst the Greeks to this hour for taking a meal. They say "we eat bread" at such an hour. Patients ask their physicians, "Am I to take the medicine after my bread?" Hence, Dr. Paspati says, the translation should be "For they wash not their hands when they take their meals." "He that speaketh evil of father or mother, let him die the death" is simply that the person should suffer the punishment of death. "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." The word translated "joy" is still commonly in use amongst the Greeks to denote a marriage feast. Formerly it was simply "a feast." Dr. Paspati therefore suggests that the passage should read, "enter thou into the feast of thy Lord." The Syriac translation of the New Testament has this proper translation of the word "feast." In the account of the unclean spirits which entered into the herd of swine we are told that they "ran down a steep place and were choked in the sea." The word translated "choked" means also "to drown," and is used in Xenophon in this sense as well as in modern Greek. Xenophon says, "those who did not know how to swim were drowned." St. Peter is described as "warming himself in the light of the fire." The last three words are printed in italics as denoting that they do not exist in the original, but the Greeks to this day use the words phos, which no doubt means "light," for fire. It would have been therefore good rendering of the Greek to have said that he was "warming himself by the fire." Mention is made in the 15th chapter of Mark of "Mary Magdalen and Mary the mother of James the Less." This would have been more intelligible had it been "young James." In the 3rd chapter of Luke the "chaff" is spoken of in the verse "But the chaff He will burn with unquenchable fire." The word "chaff" should be translated "straw." In winnowing grain in this country the grain and the straw remain on the threshing floor, and the fine part of the straw is blown away by the wind as referred to in the 1st Psalm: "The ungodly are not so, but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away." The chaff cannot be burned, therefore, because it cannot be collected. It is the straw which is to be burned. In the 23rd Chapter of Luke the passage occurs, "And the Lord said unto the servant, go out into the high roads and hedges." The word translated "hedges" means "enclosures," or fields, from the Greek verb which signifies "to enclose." "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye would say unto the sycamore tree," &c. The word translated "sycamore" is very common to-day, and denotes the mulberry-tree. The Latin translation has the proper word morus—the mulberry-tree. The passage "So when he had dipped the sop he taketh and giveth it to Judas" should be "When he had dipped the bread." In the Acts of the Apostles, chap. ii., "It is not fit that we should forsake the Word of God to serve tables," the text, according to Dr. Paspati, should be simply "to serve at table." The passage quoted from Isaiah in the Epistle to the Romans "How beautiful are the feet of him that bringeth glad tidings of good things" is the ordinary Greek expression, still in daily use to signify "How welcome are they who bring glad tidings." "I hope," says the modern Greek, "that you may be well-footed," i.e., the harbinger of good news. St. Paul, in addressing Timothy, says, "Give diligence to present thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth." The word translated handling aright signifies etymologically to cut rightly, to pursue a straight course. Dr. Paspatis has no doubt that the word signified in ancient times, as it signifies today, not merely "to cut" but "to speak," and the compound word translated "handle aright" meant then, as it does in an expression of common use among the Greeks, to speak boldly or fearlessly. The text should therefore be translated "preaching fearlessly the word of truth," and Dr. Paspatis contends that such a recommendation from the Apostle Paul becomes extremely pertinent when we consider that Timothy had been described as timid.

The question is asked in the general Epistle to James, "Doth the fountain send forth from the same opening sweet water and bitter?" "Sweet water and brackish" is the signification that no modern Greek would have any doubt about. Many more examples are given by Dr. Paspatis, but the above will serve to give your readers an idea of the changes which he contends might have been introduced by bringing the light of modern Greek to bear upon the text of the sacred writings. He especially insists upon the fact that while writers of the period when the New Testament was compiled wrote in classical Greek, the sacred writers wrote in the ordinary colloquial Greek, which has been retained, with slight alterations as to the signification of words, down to the present time.

MR. H. W. BEECHER ON THEOLOGICAL PROGRESS.

The North American Review for August has a noteworthy article from the pen of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, entitled "Progress of Thought in the Church." The writer assumes that "a great change, progressive and prophetic, is passing over the public mind in matters of religious truth." This change awakens no anxiety or distrust, for Mr. Beecher is certain that in "no other period or nation has religion been such an inspiration to whatever is humane, liberal, and generous; to whatever is pure, true, and just; to whatever is genial, sympathetic, and chivalrous in public spirit." The religious sentiment he regards "as never so intelligent or so strong in America as now. If it seems less intense, it is because it is less narrow. It now embraces a world of influences unknown or unfelt in the Puritan world. Aspiration, reverence for God, sympathy with his works, the refinement of strength, sympathy with all that is generous, magnanimous, or just, were never so widely diffused." He discerns "a better spirit among the sects. The lines of division are lives but not walls. He has a kind word to say for the Roman Catholic Church, and expects to see limitation, change, and reform within its borders.

In indicating the climatic influences which are at work to-day, Mr. Beecher observes a reaction of popular intelligence against the autocracy of the pulpit, which compels it to change its method and material of sermons:—

"No matter what becomes of Decrees of Election and Reprobation, an audience of fathers and mothers understand what Fatherhood is. No ingenuity or eloquence can persuade them that a God who for ten thousand years has laboured to produce an infinite population of damnable souls can with decency be called our Father. The common sense, the humanity, the moral sense which have grown out of the gospel are judging theology. Little by little, the pulpit shrinks from mediæval theology. Ministers first gloss it by new interpretations, then they prudently hold it in suspense, then doubt it, then cast it away."

A second sign of progress in the Church Mr. Beecher finds in the strong and growing tendency to enlarge the sphere of divine revelation by adding to the revelation of Nature:—

"Has God been doing nothing for two thousand years, since the completion of the Scriptures, which it is worth man's while to know? . . . That God speaks through the Scriptures is not denied, since they are themselves the record of human experience under divine guidance and inspiration. When by their use men have grown to larger reasons, higher morality, deeper spirituality, to a wisdom of life unknown to antiquity, is the revelation of God through this advanced and purified nature of man unworthy to be concurrent with the old, and to give it a clearer and more rational interpretation? The alternative which every year will press more and more vehemently upon educated and thinking men is the enfranchisement of the Bible or—infidelity."

A third great movement in our time is the transition in Creeds:—

"Orthodoxy confesses that truth can no longer be kept in church or seminary by creeds, but only by living faith. Andover, next to Princeton the very Jerusalem of Jerusalems of Orthodoxy, triply guarded by a creed made tight and strong beyond all breaking or picking, and to which the whole body of its professors were sworn to reswear every five years, has, alas! with some levity and merriment, shown to the world with what agility good men could fly over it, walk around it. They interpret the creed of fifty years ago not by what its makers meant, but by what the professors think they ought to have meant, and would have meant if they had received a full Andover course!"

The fourth characteristic of our time is the grand development of physical science. There Mr. Beecher appears as an ardent evolutionist. "To admit the truth of evolution," he says, "is to yield up the reigning theology." And the reigning theology is given up without a pang, as for many years Mr. Beecher has not concealed the fact that he had no real faith in it. In the course of a stern moral arraignment of the Calvinism in which he had been trained he writes:—

"This doctrine of the Fall of Man in Adam is not, as may be imagined, an extreme and antiquated notion. It is fundamental to the whole orthodox theology of the world. The system could not stand a moment, if it be exploded. It may summarily be said to be the working theory of the Christian theology as much to-day as it was five hundred years ago. Every man entering the ministry of the Presbyterian Church is obliged to swear, to hold, and to teach it. There is no difference in that respect between the Catholic and the Protestant creeds.

"Within the memory of this generation these hideous doctrines were preached widely and vigorously. The outburst of indignation with which they were received was regarded as proof that man's unregenerate heart was at enmity with God. They may still be preached, but no longer with commanding sovereignty, but apologetically. They defend rather than assert themselves. But, in the main, this view lies silent in the pulpit, like a corpse in a sepulchre. Here and there a good deacon remembers when such sound doctrine was set triumphantly forth, to the confusion of heretics and infidels, and longs to hear again the refreshing sound. But the new generation, whether of clergy or of laity, will not worship it. Yet it is to-day the only exposition, clear and thorough, of what the Church as to say has to the origin of man and the method of creation.

"Not only is the method of creation thus disfigured, but over against it has been erected a scheme of reparation and redemption if not so shocking, yet equally fictitious and delusive, and destined to give place to a nobler view of divine nature and of providence, and of the divine thought of the redemption and elevation of mankind."

The article closes with a glowing prophecy of the future of rational faith, which is destined to achieve still greater victories.

The Congregationalist also utters the following protest:—

"Mr. Beecher is in his seventieth year, and in the natural course of events cannot preach a great many more such 'farewell' sermons; and it is to us inexpressibly sad to find the son of Lyman Beecher thus going out of his way to stigmatise as 'puerile,' if not 'idiotic,' what he described as the faith of those 'who believe in the fall of Adam,' and winding up with a denunciation of the doctrine of the future eternal punishment of the impenitent. Mr. Beecher's name may still stand upon the official list of Congregational ministers, and his church be numbered among our churches; but, in the name of common honesty, we once more protest that such are not the doctrines of Congregationalism."

The Watchman, one of the leading Congregationalist papers of America, in an article on the above paper, writes:—

"Mr. Beecher has now emphatically stepped down and out from any relations with Congregational Orthodoxy or even with Congregational Liberalism. He has no more title to ecclesiastical standing than O. B. Frothingham. In an article published in the last North American Review, he definitely renounces the supreme authority of the Bible. The Scriptures are to him authority only co-ordinately with reason and science. They 'contain' truth: so does the Koran. The fall of man, redemption by Christ, retribution, all give place to evolution: evolution is the solution of the problem of human destiny, of the ages past and to come. He is no longer in the half-way house of Liberalism, but is an out-and-out Radical in his comprehensive unbelief."

"AGNOSTIC SERVICES."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The little controversy I have taken part in, under the above heading, appears by Mr. Dalby's last letter to be branching off into side issues where debate would be interminable. The purpose I had in view, when first addressing you, having been accomplished, I now beg room for only a few final words. The sentence quoted by Mr. Dalby from one of Mr. Moncreu Conway's works, ingeniously constructed as it is, instead of refuting, really establishes my case as to the nature of the latter gentleman's teaching. I am quite content to leave that point to the judgment of the competent. Out of all the entanglement of phraseology the fact, too, has been elicited that the Services to which your correspondent referred as having been given in one or two Unitarian chapels were not Unitarian services at all, but consisted of lectures of an agnostic tendency with what is called "a meditation" instead of prayer or worship. Notwithstanding the smart saying repeated by Mr. Dalby from a nameless minister, I venture to assert that anyone who puts as equivalents a "meditation," soliloquised or addressed to fellow mortals, and prayer addressed to the Divine Being, is in the very shallows of religious thinking. Nor will it do to take refuge in an alleged want of clearly cut definiteness in theological terms. Are we, then, to throw words about at random, draw no distinctions between belief and unbelief, and because we cannot know all about God deny that we have any knowledge of Him? Such a course can only result in confusion and make the search for truth hopeless.

Mr. Dalby argues that I must not say this or that is not Unitarianism because in our chapels "theological opinions have been various and changing for two hundred years." I do not see the value of that reference. Speaking of the time when Calvinism was taught in those chapels, I should use that term to describe the doctrines; and so on with Arminianism, Arianism and Unitarianism. If Calvinism is not Unitarianism, neither is Agnosticism entitled to cloak itself with a false title, simply because opposing tenets may at different times be advocated in the same building. Radical distinctions in theology are not obliterated by a brick-and-mortar continuity. Moreover, I do not hesitate to say that there is gross neglect or the absence of integrity somewhere if chapels held in trust expressly "for the worship of God" can be turned into temples of Agnosticism where His worship is set at naught.

This correspondence may not be without use should some of those who really value the religious verities which they connect with the Unitarian name be induced to take a more definite and active interest in the maintenance of the faith they cherish. That is the practical point of my share in the discussion.

LITURGIES AND TESTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I have no desire to enter at large upon the question of Liturgy versus Free Prayer, referred to in your paper last week by Mr. Walters, writing from the position of the Pulpit, but his letter seems to call for a remark or two from the opposite position—the Pew. That letter, it appears to me, is not a little one-sided.

Mr. Walters says that the use of a Liturgy is the practical imposition of a creed upon congregation and minister. Why is it more so than "free prayer?" Is the latter a sort of soliloquy of the minister to which the congregation are supposed simply to sit and listen? It will hardly be contended that it is other than the united exercise of minister and people, and that the assent of both is just as much implied as when a Liturgy is used. It has always appeared to me that the ordinary "one man" chapel service in one sense really makes the minister more of a priest than the clergyman of the National Church. Many Dissenting congregations, beyond joining in singing the hymns, are permitted no outward part in the service, not even so much as to say "Amen." The idea embodied in the Church of England service is surely more correct, i.e., common prayer and praise, outwardly participated in by all, the minister being simply the leader of the devotions of his people.

It is true when there is no Liturgy used the minister can utter what prayers may suit him, but I deny his right to any such claim, at least against the wish of the congregation. Why should he assume that his "free prayer" will be more acceptable to men, or less of a "theological test," than a liturgy? Is it that their "discomfort" is of no moment as compared with his? If the prayers were his own private devotions, he might of course use what words and present what petitions he pleases; but, in the pulpit, he is only one of a number of worshippers, each and every one of whom has to be considered as much as himself, and the "average concurrence" of the whole has to be taken into account. A minister and his people will generally meet any difficulties that may arise through changes of view, but whenever an alteration in the service is made it should be the work of both. The minister has no right to make it alone. The habit which some ministers indulge in of mutilating a liturgy to make it suit their own taste is, I submit, quite indefensible. Mr. Walters's course is at least honest, and to be respected, i.e., that of declining altogether to use a liturgy. Few things more disturb a congregation than when, in the solemn hour of prayer, these mutilations are being indulged in. As a people we are sufficiently critical without such a stimulus being applied at such a time.

I must add that Mr. Walters is, in my opinion, singularly unhappy in the service book he has selected for animadversion. It has been one of the privileges of my unorthodox days to share in the use in common worship of this, to my mind, one of the richest books of devotional literature—a work altogether a credit to us as a denomination. It is to be lamented, I think, that the "treasures new and old" in it are not more extensively used, I mean as regards its collects and occasional prayers and thanksgivings, so full, so beautiful, and so adapted to our varying needs. Mr. Walters may find objection in the phrases he refers to, but I do not believe many will share his scruples.

THE LAW OF BLASPHEMY.

[The following article was printed in the Inquirer in 1873, at the time that the Rev. J. Page Hopps was bringing an action, in which he was successful, for the wholesale piracy of his "Life of Jesus." The defence was raised that there could be no copyright in a book that impugned the Deity of Christ. The article is reprinted as equally applicable to the pending prosecution of The Freethinker.]

Blasphemy, considered from a legal point of view, although it may be regarded as an offence against God and religion, is an offence against the peace and good order of society. This is the technical sense in which lawyers regard it, though most persons will be inclined to consider this as somewhat of a distinction without a difference, when they learn that Christianity is held to be part of the common law of the land. Accurately and concisely to define blasphemy is not very easy, though for general purposes it may be sufficient to say that it consists in the denial of God's being or providence, insulting reflections on the life and character of Christ, and scoffing and contemptuous remarks upon the Scriptures. This, at least, is the definition given of it by Blackstone; though, as we shall see, a somewhat wider application of the term has been given. In order to enable our readers to understand somewhat how the law relating to blasphemy and blasphemous publications stands, we purpose referring to some of the various cases which have come before our courts, wherein the question has arisen whether or not certain publications are, or are not, blasphemous.

We must first explain, for the benefit of non-legal readers, the difference between Statute Law and Common Law. The former is to be found in the legislative enactments or Acts of Parliament; the latter is to be found outside these in the reports of cases which have been handed down from time to time. The following anecdote will illustrate our meaning:—When William Penn was on his trial for a breach of the Conventicle Acts, he asked on what law the indictment was based, to which the then Recorder of London replied, "the Common Law." Penn asked to be shown it. The Recorder got into a passion, and asked if Penn thought he carried the Common Law on his back, for it was founded on hundreds of adjudged cases, and that some of the ablest lawyers could scarcely tell what it was. To which Penn replied, that if it were so difficult to produce it could not be common law; and on still further pressing to be shown this law, the Recorder replied, "It is lex non scripta, that which many have studied thirty or forty years to know, and would you have me tell you in a moment?" Penn's reply, which would be that of many laymen, was, "Certainly, if the common law be so hard to be understood, it is far from being common." Blasphemy is an offence at common law; we find recorded cases where it was punished independent of any distinct legislative enactments on the subject.

The first recorded case of this kind came before our Courts in the fifteenth year of the reign of James I. (A.D. 1618). A man named Atwood had made use of these words:—"The religion now professed was a new religion within fifty years; preaching is but prating, and hearing of service more edifying than two hours' preaching." It does not appear, however, what punishment was awarded in this case, for it came before the Court on a question whether the conviction before the Justices of the Peace was legal, or whether the case ought not to have been heard before the Court of High Commission, a Court which was constituted in the reign of Elizabeth, and abolished in that of Charles I., and was intended to deal with offences of this class. In another case an information was filed in the Court of King's Bench against a man named Taylor for having spoken derogatory words of Christ, and said that "religion was a cheat; and that he neither feared God, the Devil, nor man." Taylor was convicted, and in delivering judgment Chief Baron Hale observed, "that to say religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby civil societies are preserved; and Christianity being parcel of the laws of England, therefore, to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law." In the reign of Queen Anne occurred the cases of Clendon and Hall, who were convicted of "having published libellous reflections upon the Trinity," but we have no means of ascertaining the full particulars of these cases.

Further on was the case of Rex v. Woolston. The defendant had published certain libels "wherein the miracles of Jesus were turned into ridicule, and his life and conversation exposed and vilified." Coming before the Court on the question whether the case was one properly punishable by the temporal Courts, they declared they would not suffer it to be debated, whether to write against Christianity in general was not an offence of temporal cognisance, desiring it to be noticed that they laid stress upon the term in general, and did not intend to include disputes between learned men upon particular controverted points. In reply to the defendant's contention that the "intent of the book was merely to show that the miracles of Jesus were not to be taken in a literal but in an allegorical sense, and, therefore, that the book could not be considered as aimed at Christianity in general, but merely as attacking one proof of the divine mission," the Court held "that the attacking Christianity in that way was attempting to destroy the very foundation of it; and though there were professions in the book to the effect that the design of it was to establish Christianity upon a true foundation, by considering those narratives in Scripture as emblematical and prophetic, yet that such professions could not be credited. . .

We do not meddle with any differences of opinion, we interfere only where the very root of Christianity is struck at."

In the year 1756 one Jacob Ilive was prosecuted "for publishing a profane and blasphemous libel tending to vilify and subvert the Christian religion, and to blaspheme our Saviour Jesus Christ, to cause his divinity to be denied, to represent him as an impostor, to scandalise, ridicule, and bring into contempt his most holy life and doctrine; and to cause the truth of the Christian religion to be disbelieved and totally rejected, by representing the same as spurious and chimerical, and a piece of forgery and witchcraft." These were the words of the Attorney-General's information, and though we have not seen the actual words which were used in support of the charge, yet it is enough for our purpose to show what was considered necessary to constitute the offence of blasphemy. Seven years later Peter Annett was condemned to a month's imprisonment in Newgate, to stand twice in the pillory, and then to be confined in Bridewell Gaol, and kept to hard labour for one year, and to find security for good behaviour for the rest of his life, for having published "a certain malignant profane and blasphemous libel intitled 'The Free Inquirer,' tending to blaspheme Almighty God, and to ridicule, traduce, and discredit his Holy Scriptures, particularly the Pentateuch, and to represent, and to cause it to be believed, that the prophet Moses was an impostor, and that the sacred truths and miracles recorded and set forth in the Pentateuch were impositions and false inventions, and thereby to diffuse and propagate irreligious and diabolical opinions in the minds of his Majesty's subjects, and to shake the foundations of the Christian religion, and of the civil and ecclesiastical government established in this kingdom."

It may be here worth while just to see what was the existing state of the statute law at this time with respect to offences of this character. The first Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Edward VI., after reciting the institution "of the most comfortable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ," and that certain persons "of Wickedness, or else of Ignorance and want of Learning . . . contemptuously depraved, despised, or reviled the same . . . and not only disputed and reasoned unreverently and ungodly of that most high Mystery, but also in their Sermons, Preachings, Readings, Lectures, Communications, Arguments, Talks, Rhimes, Songs, Plays or Jests, name or call it by such vile and unseemly Words as Christian ears do abhor to hear rehearsed," provides certain penalties for any person depraving, despising or reviling "the said most Blessed Sacrament." And this Act was expressly revived by the first statute passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, some doubt seeming to have been felt as to whether it had not been repealed by some statute in the reign of Mary.

By a statute passed in the first year of Elizabeth's reign (chap. 2) any "Parson, Vicar or other whatsoever Minister" who shall preach, declare, or speak anything in derogation or depravation of the Book of Common Prayer shall be liable to certain penalties therein mentioned, and the Act also extends to any other persons guilty of the like offence; but that portion of the Act was repealed in the early part of this reign and only the part which we have italicised is in force. In the third year of the reign of James I. an Act was passed to provide punishment for the use of the name of the Holy Trinity profanely or jestingly in any stage play, interlude, or show.

One of the most important statutes now in force was passed in the ninth and tenth years of the reign of William III., and by this it is provided that "if any person educated in, or having made profession of the Christian religion, shall by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the persons of the Holy Trinity to be God, or assert or maintain that there are more Gods than one, or deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, he shall upon the first offence be rendered incapable to hold any office or place of trust; and for the second, be rendered incapable of bringing any action, being guardian, executor, legatee, or of any legacy or deed of gift, or to bear any civil or military office or benefice ecclesiastical, and shall suffer imprisonment for three years from the time of conviction." The second section fixes the date within which the prosecution is to take place, and the third provides for a relief from the penalties where renunciation is made within four months after conviction. By a statute passed in the year 1813, so much of the previous statute as we have printed in italics was repealed, but although this is the case, the offences against which the statute of William was aimed are still punishable at common law, for where an offence is not a new one created by any statute, it is just as much punishable under the old system as it may be under any statute which may take special cognisance of it, unless the old common law remedy is expressly destroyed. From this it follows that although to deny the persons of the Holy Trinity no longer subjects the offender to the penalties imposed by the Statute he is still liable to be punished for his denial, if such denial were an offence at common law. The point arose in the prosecution of a man named Waddington, in the year 1822. He had published a book, the effect of which was to impugn the authenticity of the Scriptures, and one part of it stated that Jesus Christ was an impostor, and a murderer in principle, and a fanatic. Before the verdict was given one of the jury, who, we cannot help thinking, must have had Unitarian proclivities, asked the presiding judge (Lord Chief Justice Abbott) "whether a work which denied the divinity of our Saviour was a libel?" To this the Judge seems to have given a somewhat evasive answer, for he said that a work speaking of Jesus Christ in the language used in the publication was a libel, Christianity being a part of the law of the land. Waddington moved for a new trial, urging that the Lord Chief Justice had misdirected the jury, by stating that any publication in which the divinity of Jesus Christ was denied was an unlawful libel (which, as our readers will perceive, is a misstatement of what his lordship had said), and argued that since the passing of the Statute of George III. before referred to, the denying one of the persons of the Trinity to be God was no offence, and, consequently, that a publication in support of such a position was not a libel. The judges unanimously refused the application, remarking that, although the Statute removed the penalties imposed by the Statute of William III. it left the common law as it stood before. Whether to deny the divinity of Christ were an offence independent of the Statute the case does not settle, because the judges decided solely upon the book before them, which not only denied the Godhead of Christ, but stated him to be an impostor and a murderer in principle. "If," said Mr. Justice Best, "previous to the passing of that Statute (53 Geo. III., c. 160), it would have been a libel to deny in any printed work the divinity of the second person in the Trinity, the same would be a libel now." And, further, he says, "It is not necessary for me to say whether it be libellous to argue from the Scriptures against the divinity of Christ; that is not what the defendant professes to do. He argues against the divinity of Christ by denying the truth of the Scriptures."

The other cases of libels of this kind are those connected with the publication of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," which denied the authority of the Old and New Testament, asserted that reason was the only rule by which the conduct of men ought to be guided, and ridiculed the prophet Jesus Christ, his disciples, and the Scriptures. For this offence a man named Williams was prosecuted in 1797 and convicted, the Judge in passing sentence observing "that such doctrines were an offence not only against God, but against law and government, from their direct tendency to dissolve the bonds and obligations of civil society; and upon that ground it was that the Christian religion constituted part of the law of the land; that if the name of our Redeemer was suffered to be traduced, and his holy religion treated with contempt, the solemnity of an oath, on which the due administration of justice depended, would be destroyed, and the law stripped of one of its principal sanctions—the dread of future punishment." Eaton's case in 1812 was the next, the charge against him being that he had represented Jesus Christ as an impostor, the Christian religion as a mere fable, and those who believed in it as infidels to God. Carline's case in 1819 was the next, and to show the persistency with which it was endeavoured to thwart the law, we may mention that during the trial Carline read the whole of the book to the jury, whereupon his wife published an account of the trial setting out the book in extenso, and claimed privilege on the ground of its being a report of what took place in a court of law, a privilege, however, which the Court refused to grant. Carline was sentenced to pay a fine of £1,500, to be imprisoned for three years, and to find sureties for good behaviour for the rest of his life.

In the year 1828 a man named Taylor was punished for a blasphemous discourse, the particulars of which, however, we have not before us. In 1840 a man named Hetherington was tried for, and found guilty of, publishing a blasphemous libel "on that part of the Holy Bible called the Old Testament." A motion was made in the Court of Queen's Bench for an arrest of judgment on the ground that there was no previous case of a libel on that Old Testament alone, and that, therefore, it was not a punishable offence; all the previous cases being in respect of matters directed against Christianity and religion together. The application was refused, the Lord Chief Justice Denman observing that "the Old Testament is so connected with the New that it was impossible that such a publication as that could be uttered without reflecting upon Christianity in general." And Mr. Justice Littledale said, "The Old Testament, independently of its connection with and of its prospective reference to Christianity, contains the Law of Almighty God," and therefore he had no doubt that the publication in question was a libel in law. Mr. Justice Patteson remarked that the defendant's "argument was reduced to this, that an indictment for libel was to be confined to blasphemy against the New Testament. But such an argument was scarcely worth anything, because it was impossible to say that the Old and the New Testament are not so intimately connected, that if the one is true, the other is true also; and the evidence of Christianity partly consists of the prophecies in the Old Testament." The other judge (Mr. Justice Coleridge) left the Court before the judgments were delivered.

Hitherto the attacks of the Crown upon the liberty of Biblical criticism had been restricted to publishers in small way of business, whom it was hoped would be crushed by these ruinous proceedings. But now it was determined by some of those who were friendly to the cause of free religious inquiry to carry the war against some of the larger publishers, and shortly after Hetherington had purged his sentence, a prosecution was instituted by him against Mr. Moxon for publishing Shelley's poem, "Queen Mab;" the indictment describing the work as a scandalous, impious, profane, and malicious libel of and concerning the Christian religion, and of and concerning the Holy Scriptures, and of and concerning Almighty God, in which were contained certain passages charged as blasphemous." Mr. Moxon, notwithstanding a powerful speech of Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, was found guilty, but on payment of the costs of the prosecution no further proceedings were taken. There has, we believe, been no case of the kind before the Courts since this, but it must not therefore be supposed that because the Crown has exercised a wise discretion in not initiating proceedings that any right has become vested in publishers of books of the kind. Only as recently as 1867 an action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract to let a hall for the delivery of some lectures, one of which was entitled "The Character and Teachings of Christ, the former Defective, the latter Misleading," and another, "The Bible shown to be no more Inspired than any other Book, with a Refutation of Modern Theories Thereon." It was held by the Court of Exchequer that the contract being for an illegal purpose the defendant was justified in breaking it. In 1822 Mr. Murray sought to obtain an injunction to restrain the publication of a printed edition of Lord Byron's "Cain," but was unsuccessful, the ground for the refusal being that it was doubtful "whether the poem was not intended to bring into discredit that portion of Scripture history to which it relates;" and in the following year a similar decision was given as to Byron's "Don Juan."

There is another case somewhat in point, and which will be particularly interesting to the readers of the Inquirer. After the destruction of his property at Birmingham, Dr. Priestley brought an action to recover damages, claiming compensation amongst other things for the loss of certain MSS. It was stated for the defence that Dr. Priestley was in the habit of publishing works injurious to the Government of the State. No evidence was given to support this, but the judge remarked that if such evidence had been adduced he should have held the defence to be a good one.

There have been several other trials for offences of the kind we are considering, but they were so much connected with political matters that it is somewhat difficult to use them as instances in point. Hone was prosecuted for blasphemy for publishing parodies on the Athanasian Creed and the Church Litany, but the juries refused to convict, it being evident that the prosecution was undertaken for the purpose of silencing a political opponent. The cases arising out of the "Essays and Reviews" are not in point, as they were not prosecutions for blasphemy, but for infringements of Church doctrine.

While we are on the subject it may be interesting to see what is the law of America in relation to blasphemy. Article 31 of Criminal Code of New York defines blasphemy as the "wantonly uttering or publishing words, casting contumacious reproach or profane ridicule upon God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Scriptures, or the Christian religion," and by Article 32 it is declared that "if it appears beyond reasonable doubt that the words complained of were used in the course of serious discussion, and with intent to make known or recommend opinions entertained by the accused, such words are not blasphemy." This is very different from the narrower views obtained here. In the case we have already cited, Rev. v. Woolston, while "disputes between learned men upon particular controverted points" are allowed, yet it was expressly stated that to write against Christianity in general is punishable.

While, however, the Established religion of this country is thus protected, it has been decided that anyone may with impunity attack Judaism, Mahomedanism, or any sect of the Christian religion.

What would be the result of any trial for blasphemy now—say for the denial of the Divinity of Christ—it is almost impossible to say. More liberal and enlightened views exist now than they did thirty years ago, but though the views have changed, the law remains the same. Mr. Shortt, in his work on "The Law Relating to Works of Literature and Art," to which, and to Mr. Starkie's work on "The Law of Libel," we are indebted for much that we have written, has the following passage:—

"How far, then, is liberty of discussion allowed on questions relating to the fundamental doctrines of religion? or is the expression of all views adverse to those now received prohibited and punishable? Would the law now make no distinction in favour of the fair and temperate expression of opinions sincerely entertained? It is by no means easy to give an answer, for there is no reported English case in which the question has been fairly raised and broadly dealt with. Malice is a necessary ingredient in the crime; and, where it is not that our law implies malice wherever anything unlawful is done wilfully or intentionally, whatever the motive which prompted the action, this consideration might help us to a conclusion. As the law stands, it throws no light on the subject."

We understand that the Scotch law on the subject of blasphemous libel corresponds with the English; but the only cases with which we are acquainted are two that occurred some thirty or more years ago. Two booksellers, named Paterson and Robinson, were tried for publishing a book or pamphlet, which, we believe, was entitled "The Bible an Immoral Book for the Young." In defending himself Paterson attempted to quote passages from the Bible for the purpose of justifying his remarks upon it, but was forbidden to do this. In the charge to the jury the following passage occurs:—

"Now the law of Scotland, apart from all questions of Church Establishment or Church Government, has declared the Holy Scriptures are of supreme authority. It gives every man the right of regulating his faith or not by the standard of the Holy Scriptures, and gives full scope to private judgment, regarding the doctrines contained therein; but it expressly provides that all 'blasphemies shall be suppressed,' and that they who publish opinions 'contrary to the known principles of Christianity,' may be lawfully called to account, and proceeded against by the civil magistrate. This law does not impose upon individuals any obligation as to their belief. It leaves free and independent the right of private belief, but it carefully protects that which was established as part of the law from being brought into contempt."

It is no part of our purpose in this article to discuss the propriety of the various decisions we have quoted, or to do more than state the law as it stands; but in view of the interest which a pending case must necessarily excite, we make no apology for the length of our remarks.

CHELMSFORD.—The sad news of the death of the Rev. W. A. Pope last week cast quite a gloom not only over the Unitarian congregation, of which he was formerly minister, but to some extent over the district around for his energetic work in connection with the establishment of the church here brought him into intimate relationship with a large number of friends and opponents. All alike have a lively recollection of his courtesy, sincerity and thoroughness, and all alike regret his sudden end. As the Father of the Church he has ever taken a paternal interest in its welfare—an interest which was by no means slackened by his removal to the Domestic Mission at Spicer-street, London. At the services last Sunday special reference was made to the sad event, and prayer was offered for the widow and the fatherless. The evening discourse was given by Mr. A. Madocks, who was intimately connected with the deceased, and who conducted the services at Spicer-street on the Sunday previous to the accident. The subject related to the sad thoughts filling the mind of each individual member of the congregation—"The Rev. W. A. Pope—In Memoriam." In affectionate language allusion was made to his brief sojourn in and about Chelmsford, and in respect to the work there, with which his name will ever be associated. The speaker said: "Most of us here to-night can remember those early days of our little church, his exertions in our midst, and the mingled hopes and fears with which some of our first services were conducted, when it was doubtful whether the doctrine that we propounded and strive to instil into the minds of our fellow-townsmen would ever find a resting-place in any soul, and whether a church, however small, would be established. His excellent memory and his extempore addresses which he gave from time to time we are all familiar with. Sometimes those who knew him most marvelled at the fluency and at the depth of knowledge of some of those addresses, for they were thought out, not in the care of the study, but often during a long and tiresome walk, or the tediousness of a railway journey, when the mind would not be best fitted for such an occupation. One excellent trait in our friend's character was the union of a progressive theology with Christian reverence. He was always openhearted with his knowledge; always willing and ready and desirous of communicating it to others. I remember his laughingly saying at the time when that excellently critical and yet reverential work 'The Bible for Young People' was published, 'Well, our occupation is gone now; they have let the laity into all the secrets that we have, and they are making you as wise as we are about the Bible!' . . . I have said he loved his work. No man who did not love the work in which he was engaged could have used such exertions, or have kept so constantly and strenuously endeavouring to build us up here as a church as he did. If those efforts had been continued—if no difficulties had come in the way of those deeply-interesting lectures in the eastern counties—there is no doubt that not one new church only in Essex, but several would have been built up."—A testimonial of sympathy with Mrs. Pope and the family is being signed by the congregation.

LORD ASHBURNHAM has kindly placed his Wyclif M.S., which contains three unique tracts, besides duplicates of others, at the disposal of the Wyclif Society.

Obituary.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR STANLEY JEVONS.

Our readers will share the deep regret with which we announce the sad death by drowning of Professor Stanley Jevons, M.A., F.R.S. He and his family have been staying during the vacation at Bexhill, in Sussex. They went out together on Monday morning, and he left them to go to a retired part of the beach, where he stripped, and went into the sea for a swim. He was never seen alive again. His body was observed floating on the water, and was brought ashore by a labourer; but there were no signs of animation. An inquest was held on Tuesday morning, and a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

Professor William Stanley Jevons was much the most original of our living logicians, and his logical abacus—the ingenious little machine by which he reduced deductive reasoning to an almost mechanical process—will make his name memorable as long as logic is studied by man. The publication in 1874 of his great book on "The Principles of Science: a Treatise on Logic and Scientific Method," the most original of the kind published since Mr. John Stuart Mill's "Logic," and a book which, in the opinion of many competent thinkers, gave the first true analysis of Induction, was quite an event in the history of logical science. Professor Jevons, as the invention of the logic machine showed, was by no means a mere abstract thinker. Indeed, it is not too much to say that if he had not turned his attention to the moral sciences he might easily have become a famous chemist and meteorologist. As a political economist, whatever we may think of his mathematical theory, he was unquestionably a brilliant and most careful reasoner, and was the first, for example, to settle pretty clearly the question which arose some ten years ago, as to the alleged depreciation of gold as the result of the great gold discoveries. Nevertheless, to those who knew him best, his scientific eminence was the least part of the man. Shy and reserved as he appeared, his was a nature of unusual geniality and sweetness. Full of warmth and full of generosity as he was, his death will leave an irreparable blank in not a few homes, even where his special eminence and his individual genius were least understood and appreciated. He was a native of Liverpool, and still in the prime of life, being only in his forty-seventh year. Educated at University College, London, his first public appointment was at the Australian Royal Mint, which he held from 1854 to 1859, when he returned to London. Having taken the Master of Arts degree at London University, Mr. Jevons was appointed in 1866 Professor of Logic, Mental and Moral Philosophy, and Cobden Lecturer on Political Economy at Owens College, Manchester. This appointment, which he held for ten years, gave scope for the eminent analytical abilities for which he was famous. His addresses and essays, especially on economical questions, attracted a large amount of attention, especially one dealing with the probable effects of the exhaustion of the coal supply. Meanwhile, Mr. Jevons had received the Fellowship of the Royal Society and the honorary degree of LL.D. of the University of Edinburgh; and in 1876 he resigned the professorship at Manchester, having accepted the chair of Political Economy in University College, London. Professor Jevons was the author of text-books on logic and political economy and a larger treatise on "The Principles of Science." These works all showed great intellectual power and originality of treatment. It has been said that Professor Jevons was too severely logical and mathematical, and that his "Principles of Science" evinced a tendency to carry the deductive method beyond its legitimate range; but this tendency, which is rare among English thinkers, enhanced his worth as a critic, and often enabled him to present truth in a new and original aspect. His high intellectual gifts were universally recognised, and by a very large circle of students and fellow professors in London and Manchester his untimely death will be mourned as an irreparable loss.

The funeral took place yesterday afternoon. The remains were deposited in the Hampstead Cemetery, the Rev. Dr. Sadler officiating. A considerable number of friends and relatives were present on the occasion.

The Daily News writes:—"A versatile and vigorous student of philosophy of this kind, still in the full force of his manhood, is more particu-

Early a loss in the present day to the nation of which he was a member, because the studies he pursued are not over-burdened with teachers or scholars of merit. Literature and science of the physical kind both have plenty of devotees: philosophy, even in the sense which the word more commonly bears now, is scantily attended. Mr. Jevons was hardly a metaphysician—have we got a metaphysician now?—but he was earnestly devoted to logic, which is the schoolmaster to bring men to metaphysics; and he was a diligent student of most of the branches into which modern custom divides, or which it sums up in the term Mental and Moral Science. His last work and, as far as we remember, his last work only, was directly political; but many of his studies were occupied with politics in the proper and wide sense, used in which it makes certain modern solecisms unnecessary. To those who believe that if a philosopher does not take an interest in politician it is a misfortune for himself, and that if a politician does not take an interest in philosophy it is a misfortune for those whose concerns he may be called upon to administer, it will not appear that we have too many political philosophers, or that we can afford to lose any."

The Manchester Guardian says:—"To the world at large Professor Jevons's death is a loss hardly less severe than to his friends. The life of Professor Jevons is a record of unswerving devotion to work of the highest and purest kind. No record of these facts, however, can do justice to the rare qualities of the man, his single-hearted devotion to his labour, the independence and originality of his thinking, and the generous modesty of his character. By the weight of his reputation—a reputation won mainly during the years spent in Manchester—he helped to gain for it consideration and dignity, and he made one of the small band of distinguished men who acted as the Pioneers of the new movement for bringing academic training within the reach of the population of our great towns, which has already proved so signally and increasingly successful, not in Manchester only, but in other great centres of industry throughout the country. He richly deserved the reputation he gained during his too brief life. He well merits the bitter regret with which the news of his untimely end will be received."

DEATH OF SIR JOHN SMALE.

We regret to record that Sir John Smale, late Chief Justice of Hong Kong, died at his residence in Sussex-place, Regent's-park, on Sunday evening. He only retired from the Colonial bench in October last; and although he had been in failing health for some time past, his death was somewhat unexpected. It will be remembered that he brought to light in Hong Kong a system of kidnapping and domestic slavery, the existence of which had been previously unknown to the English public. Mr. Labouchere brought the subject before the House of Commons early in the present session, and a considerable amount of public feeling was excited by Sir John Smale's disclosures. Early in life the deceased had taken an active part in Liberal movements in the West of England, and was an ardent advocate of West India Emancipation. This influenced his subsequent career as a colonial judge, and induced him to take a strong view of the evils of the coolie traffic, and to decide in one memorable case that a kidnapped Chinaman, named Kwok-a-sing, who had headed a successful mutiny on board a coolie ship, was guilty of no offence against the laws of England in using violence to secure his freedom. Sir John Smale was, when he died, in his seventy-eighth year. He has left a widow and several children.

Sir John Smale was born at Moreton-Hampstead. He was destined for the ministry in the Unitarian body, and entered Manchester College, York. His studies there were interrupted by failing health; and after a time he turned his attention to the law, and ultimately became a member of the Bar. From 1846 till 1857 he was a reporter in the courts of the Vice-Chancellors Knight-Bruce, Parker, and Stuart, and he was the joint author of "De Gex and Smale" and "Smale and Gifford's Reports." He was appointed Attorney-General for Hong Kong in 1860, and raised to the Bench as Chief Justice there in 1866. He received the honour of knighthood, by patent, in 1874. Sir John Smale was twice married—first, in 1830, to Anne, daughter of Mr. Joseph Jackson; and, secondly, in 1873, to Clara, daughter of Mr. Halsey Janson, of Stamford-Hill, Middlesex. Sir John was for many years an active member of Essex-street Chapel, and remained a trustee up to the time of his death. He also took a prominent part in the agitation which led to the Dissenters' Chapels Act, and in other liberal movements in religion and politics.

THE FUNERAL OF THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

The deceased was interred at Rosthwaite Church on Friday, the 11th inst. The funeral service was, by the special request of Mrs. Pope, conducted by the Rev. Professor Carpenter, of Manchester New College, London. The Rev. Canon Battersby, in the absence of the Rev. H. C. Walker, Incumbent of Rosthwaite, had offered every courteous facility for the carrying out of this the first funeral in the neighbourhood conducted under the recent Burials Act. There were present as mourners: the widow, Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Briggs, Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot and daughters, Mrs. Bowie; the Revs. Rodolph Suffield, Reading; Charles Hargrove, M.A., Leeds; W. C. Bowie, W. Summers; and Mr. G. W. Tarrant, Mr. Edgar J. Fripp, and Mr. Frank K. Freeston, students of Manchester New College. The Rev. G. Jackson, M.A., who is doing duty for the Incumbent, was also present. In that sequestered graveyard in the Borrowdale valley, of unrivalled beauty, surrounded by mountains, almost in sight of the peak from which the deceased had fallen, with the sun illuminating all with rays of beauty and of joy, no one present on that occasion can ever forget the sublime solemnity of the scene, the beatitudes read, the psalm speaking of lying down in the green valley, the prayers breathing hope and tranquil joy in contemplation of the immortal life in the care of a fatherly God—the address so touching, wherein Mr. Carpenter spoke of the character of the deceased, of his labours amongst the poor, of his joy in nature, ever reminding him of the God of the everlasting hills—and his words of gentle and profound sympathy for the widow and the orphans.

The simple but solemn service closed with the friends surrounding the grave singing a favourite hymn, by Chatterton, which had been recently quoted by the deceased.

O God, whose thunder shakes the sky,
Whose eye this atom globe surveys!
To Thee, my only rock, I fly;
Thy mercy, in thy justice, praise.

The mystic mazes of Thy will,
The shadows of celestial light,
Are past the power of human skill;
But what the Eternal does is right.

O teach me, in the trying hour,
When anguish swells the dewy tear,
To still my sorrows, own Thy power,
Thy goodness love, Thy justice fear.

The gloomy mantle of the night,
That on my sinking spirit steals,
Will vanish at the morning light,
Which God, my orient Sun, reveals.

We are glad to notice that an appeal is at once to be made to the public on behalf of the family of the late Mr. Pope. As the Mission with which he was connected is strictly unsectarian, there is appropriateness in the appeal made to those beyond our own denominational limits in the following letter published in the Daily News of yesterday:—

SIR,—Most of your readers have no doubt seen the account of the fatal accident on the Great Cable Mountain, at the head of Ennerdale, last Monday evening, when the Rev. W. A. Pope missed his footing and fell over a precipice. But it may not be generally known that Mr. Pope was a hardworking missionary in the East of London, and has left a widow and six children. In a case of such real distress I feel that it is only necessary for the facts to be placed before the public in order to enlist general sympathy, which may result in the creation of a fund for the support of the widow and family. As a commencement I shall be happy to contribute ten guineas; my brother, Alderman William Lawrence, and Mr. John Warren will each give ten guineas, and Mr. P. Meadows Martineau, of 6, Christian-street, E., will thankfully receive any donations to the fund. It may be interesting to your readers to learn the estimation in which Mr. Pope was held by those who knew him for many years. A friend of mine thus writes:—"In character William Annetts Pope was an Israelite without guile; simple, straightforward, and sincere; you could always depend upon him."—Yours, &c.,

JAMES CLARKE LAWRENCE.

Mrs. HAMPSON'S HOME.—The printed report of the work done during the past two years in this home has just been issued, and it is gratifying to learn that Mrs. Hampson's labours continue to be attended with steady success. On referring to the object of the Home the report says the home is strictly unsectarian, each girl being encouraged to follow earnestly that teaching which seems individually to be most helpful. During the past two years one hundred and twenty-eight girls have received help and shelter, of whom one hundred and two have become mothers. When it is understood that Mrs. Hampson is not only directress of the home, and friend and confidant of its inmates, but that she acts as doctor and head nurse as well, it will readily be acknowledged that her self-imposed duties are by no means light; while the significant fact that not one mother has lost her life during confinement affords the best possible testimony to her medical skill and good nursing. As many people do not quite understand the kind of cases that are dealt with, a brief abstract of every case received during the past two years is appended to the report, together with a few words of the after history of the case. On reference to this list it is extremely satisfactory to find that only three cases proved unworthy of the help given. Such a result speaks more emphatically of the moral value of Mrs. Hampson's Home than any mere words could possibly do. Owing to the premises in Compton-terrace being no longer suitable for the work, a new house has been built, and into this Mrs. Hampson removed last October. The cost of building and removal was about £2,000, and of this £1,400 has been subscribed at present. Besides this sundry additional items will, it is estimated, cost about £150 more, so that donations to the Building Fund to the extent of £750 are still needed. It is earnestly hoped that this amount will be collected by the end of the year and donations will be gladly received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. William Shaen, 8, Bedford-row, London, W.C.

Conducted by Rev. D. DAVIS, B.A., assisted by University Graduates.

The THIRD TERM of the Year will begin on FRIDAY September 15. Vacancies.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

SOUTHPORT.—MISS LEWIN and MISS HARRIET LEWIN (late Miss Lawford and Miss Lewin) will RE-OPEN their SCHOOL for BOYS on THURSDAY, September 28.

Bingfield, Albert-road.

BRIGHTON.—Miss HODGES (late Miss JANE SMITH and Miss HODGES) will re-open her School for Little Boys, September 12.

102, Lansdowne-place.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

MISS BOWRING, holding an Honour Certificate from Dublin University, and having passed Groups A and B in the Cambridge (Higher) Examinations, wishes to instruct Pupils, either personally or by correspondence, in English, French, German, and Latin. Seven years' experience in teaching. Good testimonials.—Address, 160, Bower-street, Maidstone.

WANTED, in September, a RESIDENT GOVERNESS for a Girls' Boarding School. Requirements, thorough English and Music.—Apply, by letter, S., 7, St. Ann's-square, Manchester.

A LADY seeks an engagement as Resident or Daily GOVERNESS. Advanced English and Drawing, fluent French and German, Elementary Music and Latin.—Alpha, 28, Alexandra-road, Southport.

THE DECAY OF FAITH.—II.

THE question we propose to consider in the present article is—Will religion as a consciousness of supreme power, love, thought and justice in the universe, share the fate of the "numerous deities, devils, angels, spirits and ghosts" which "disturbed the mental peace and stimulated the wonder of bye-gone ages," but have now passed away? The writer in the Westminster Review says that it will, and he contends that the causes which have led to "one partial exception" in the general decay of supernatural beliefs will become more and more feeble in the future, till at last there will be a clean sweep of the supernatural from the hearts and lives of men. It will be universally admitted, it seems, by enlightened future ages that there is no fundamental difference between a belief in witches and a belief in God, and that it is just as rational to give credence to absurd stories about ghosts and apparitions as it is to accept any doctrine of a future life. Men will not be foolish enough then to dream of a supersensuous world, with a weakling like KANT, or to suppose with SCHILLER that all within and without them may be only the hieroglyphical symbolism of a power in the universe which resembles themselves. But these days are not yet; the world is still foolish enough to cling to religion, as "a shadowy belief in a deity and a future life."

Why is this? How is it if all the forms of supernaturalism are alike irrational that one form persists when the others have perished? Here is the explanation our author puts forward. The first influence, he says, contributing to retard the decay of religion, as a form of supernaturalism, "is the apparent reasonableness in a certain state of culture of the theological conception upon which it is based." Man took his own experience as a guide in solving or attempting to solve the problem of existence:—

"He pictured a personal being as his Maker, with the same feelings, intelligence and purposes as himself, only with an exaggerated intensity, corresponding to the vastly greater efforts required of him, as the author of the universe, the source of life, and the controller of events. . . . The early progress of knowledge, so far from being unfavourable to this personal idea, lent it strength and purified it. . . . It was only when researches in physics had revealed the laws under which the solar and stellar systems had apparently assumed their present conditions, binding all creation into a homogeneous whole; when geology had explained the apparent superficial confusion of the earth's crust; and when biological hypotheses had successfully linked organic life together in one chain of correlated development, that the theological explanation of the origin of the cosmos became weakened and discredited. Science has rescued so much of the known from the unknown, that the vast shadowy deep wherein imagination may revel undisturbed by the irony of facts is no longer large enough and dim enough to harbour in security the conceptions of theology."

The calm and reverent student of science who sees the unknown loom forth with ever increasing vastness as he makes himself master of the known will be astounded at the latter part of this statement. And though the growth of astronomical, geological and biological knowledge may have weakened and discredited the old theological explanation of the cosmos, it does not by any means follow that a higher and nobler theological explanation is untenable. Far from it. Enlarged scientific conceptions have led to a modification of the "personal idea," not to its abandonment. Man cannot get rid of that idea because he cannot close his eyes to the evidence of thought in the cosmos. He is ever confronted with the phenomena of an ordered universe, from which he can no more exclude the idea of thought than he can exclude it from his own being. Thought and personality in the higher sense of the word are inseparable. Impersonal thought, let SCHOPENHAUER and others say what they may, is an impossibility, a contradiction in terms, an absurdity. Hence our author merely deceives himself, and tries to deceive his readers by the jugglery of words, when he says, "To abandon the conception of a conscious, personal, creating, overruling, independent Being for intelligence and will in the cosmos, whether true or not, is to abandon the supernatural for the natural, theology for science." For how can there be intelligence and will without personality, since they form the very essence of that idea? Take intelligence and will from personality and it vanishes; add intelligence and will to a flower, a tree, or a star, and you thereby invest it with the idea of personality. The Divine nature may be as unlike our conceptions of it as an eclipse is unlike the mathematical formulæ which serve for its prediction. This is not the point. What we maintain is that the conception of a Divine personality is the necessary outcome of the laws of the human mind. If it be true, therefore, that "the great source of the influence of theology in the past is the idea of personality inseparably bound up with it," there is no fear for the existence of religion in the future, since we are persuaded the idea of personality in the universe will always be present in calm and unbiassed minds as its stay and support.

It appears, however, that the masses will give up religion, not from mere speculative reasons, but from a discovery that it will not yield them the "temporal advantages" they have hitherto supposed. The bulk of mankind are influenced by personal and selfish ends, and "it is to this very selfish element in human nature theology has always strongly appealed." It has been believed that "in return for the reception of the theological idea, and for the performance of certain very simple services, the greatest temporal advantages were to be obtained." The appeal thus made to "human selfishness was powerful and direct," while the conditions governing participation in these benefits were simple and easily satisfied. Now, however, the idea of the universal reign of law has closed the heavenly door to human greed; men are ceasing to pray because they find they can get nothing by it, and they will soon spurn as a silly delusion all creeds and systems of belief which inculcate prayer. Religion will die out of their hearts because heaven is deaf to their selfish appeals. This is the purport of our author's argument. Unfortunately for its validity and acceptance he does not condescend to explain how it is that the most prayerful men have been the most unselfish of men. He forgets that prayer is essentially a divine emotion, which expands and ennobles man's being, and that the idea of petition is a subordinate outcome of that emotion which is modified with growing culture, and may ultimately pass away from the mind, leaving prayer as divine communion in all its soul-filling, soul-quickenings, and soul-ennobling richness and power. Prayer is as natural to a devout heart as gentle words and tender tones are to a loving soul. Religion is already dead in a selfish heart; he who prays merely for what he can get does not pray at all. At the same time the ideas of love and trust which constitute prayer lead the soul to unburden itself to its Maker, as friend unbosoms himself to friend, and at a certain stage of scientific opinion induces him to ask for the satisfaction of all his wants just as simply and naturally as a child looks for it from its parents. Thus science may destroy supplication, but it cannot banish the spirit of prayer from the human heart. This the soul's high privilege of bathing in the sunlight of blissful rest and ineffable activity, of being quickened and refreshed at the fountains of Divine love, will surely be dear to man as long as joy is prized as joy. Religion, therefore, has nothing to fear on this head.

"But theology has made another and even more powerful appeal to our lower instincts. It affirmed a future and eternal state of existence for the human soul." This is its great and unpardonable sin. It is true that "from the idea of extinction, by our very constitution, we naturally shrink." Nor is it less true that the doctrine of immortality "promises an effectual antidote to the great terror of all living things—death." But what of that? "A drowning man will instinctively clutch at a straw; and humanity, despite the utter absence of one tittle of evidence in support of this conception, convulsively clings to it as a rescue from the terrors of death." Stop, we are disposed to cry; is there no evidence in the very convulsive clinging you describe? If by his very constitution man naturally shrinks from annihilation, is not this one of the strongest available proofs that he is a something which is not to be annihilated? If he is merely a phenomenal manifestation of his bodily organism, how can he tremble at the dissolution of that organism? Does the shadow shrink from perishing with the cloud that produces it? Is it not just because man carries immortality within him that he shrinks from the idea of annihilation when the dissolution of the body suggests the mere thought of it? Unless this be the case, why should he "naturally" shrink from death? If annihilation were the natural destiny of the soul, would it not be very unnatural for him to shudder at the prospect of its realisation? It is, of course, easy to urge sceptical considerations of an opposite kind, and to say with our author: "Where is the exact line to be drawn, up to which man has only the privileges of an animal, but past which he assumes the prerogatives of immortality? Is this valuable possession a development from pre-existing conditions, or is it an endowment from some extraneous source?" It is enough for us to reply that man as man differs so immeasurably from the lower animals that till it can be shown how otherwise such a radical distinction would arise, we shall not hesitate to assign to him an inherent difference in nature and probable destiny. It is simply frivolous talk, altogether unworthy of a philosophical writer, to say that if the soul be an endowment from some extraneous source—"We ask for evidence of it, and information as to the date attending circumstances and source." We are speaking of something that is put into a man, but of something that is man the of which physical generation and birth are the mere medium. These, though necessary for the soul's manifestation in conformity with the requirements of the present state of existence, cannot be conceived of in any sense as creative. The father does not create his child. Hence, when our author turns metaphysician, and asks, can the finite in time beget infinity? his query is not relevant. He must first prove the very opposite of what we hold as truth, before such an argument can be legitimately advanced. Besides on the Theistic hypothesis man is something more than the "finite in time," which destroys any argument based on an assumption to the contrary. To say, too, that "an immortal human soul is an anachronism in the cosmos, and is analogically an impossibility," is to assume that we have sounded the spiritual depths of the Universe and measured the possibility of existence. It is philosophy demented or science crazed with the perpetual thought of its own achievements. It is as though an insect that floats in the sunbeams should claim to have quenched the light of a universe of suns, because he has placed his fellow in partial shadow for a fraction of a second. "But surely," continues our author, "if this doctrine is true we must have some sensual evidence of its truth," as if what is always conceived of as transcending sensible perception could become the object of the senses. What sane man ever expected to find the spiritual essence of his fellow by "discoveries or researches with the most powerful instruments applied by the most skilful hands and brains?" We never heard of such a man, nor did we ever know of a man who could lay his hand upon the force which produces the circulation of a plant. Our author has gone far beyond Professor TYNDALL, or even of BUCHNER, for he says:—"The conditions of matter required to account for mental phenomena are not more subtle, wonderful, or difficult of adequate realisation than those manifested in other departments of natural science, such as the law of gravitation, electricity or animal magnetism." This is a mere random assertion, that proves nothing but ignorance, and it is entirely opposed to the expressed opinion of the eminent physicist just mentioned, who stated in his Norwich Address as President of the British Association that if we could tabulate all the molecular vibrations of the brain, this would not enable us to bridge over the great and impassable gulf between motion and thought.

The growth of an independent science of Ethics, the progress of Biblical criticism, and the increasing intellectual feebleness of the clergy are additional factors in the inevitable decay of all religion. So thinks our author; time will show whether he is right. Meanwhile, we shall cling to the old creed, believing that GOD is GOD still, and that Immortality is not a dream science can dispel.

GROUND S FOR ACCEPTING CHRISTIANITY.

THE recent interesting discussion in our columns on the resurrection of JESUS suggested one very important inquiry, namely this, what are the grounds on which the Christian Religion can be accepted to-day by rational and thoughtful minds? It is of the utmost consequence, especially in a sceptical inquiring age like the present, to have a clear and definite conviction on this matter. Our position in this respect is somewhat different from that of professing Christians in former ages. The grounds on which Christianity has been accepted have changed in some degree from time to time. Those which were most prominent in one age have been less so in another. A glance backward through the Christian centuries forcibly illustrates this point. In the first Christian age the ground of belief in Christianity, especially among the Jewish converts, was the Messiahship of JESUS. He was believed to be the long promised Jewish Messiah. This was the main point, as appears from the Acts and Epistles, that the apostles laboured to prove. This was one main topic, if not the main topic, of apostolic preaching everywhere. Those who were convinced that JESUS was the fulfilment of Hebrew prophecy accepted on this ground Him and His religion. But it is obvious that this ground of acceptance was special, local, temporary. It is not as the Jewish Messiah that JESUS is of interest to us. We do not share in the Jewish national tradition on this point. It is of no consequence to our acceptance of his religion whether he was the promised Messiah or not. But with Jews it would determine whether they believed in him or rejected Him. Here, then, is one change which has inevitably come about with the diffusion of Christianity over the Gentile world.

Another point concerning which almost the same thing may be said is the miracles which JESUS is alleged to have performed. These were put forth in the early Christian age as a strong ground of faith in Him. The argument that no man could do such miracles as He did unless GOD were with him was urged as conclusive. And when it was advanced by those who themselves had witnessed the miracles, or had been told of them by those who had, it was certainly a strong ground of faith. While the witnesses themselves or their immediate descendants were still living, the value of their testimony would be direct and unequivocal. But as time passed on and the miraculous deeds of CHRIST became a tradition of the distant past the value of this testimony declined. It was inevitable that it should be so. The original witnesses were dead, those who had it from their lips were dead, and their immediate descendants also had passed away. The original narratives of these transactions had also perished. Copies of some of these, whose accuracy no one could guarantee, survived, and that was all. The uncertainty of such a ground of faith is apparent with a moment's reflection. We cannot examine the witnesses, we can only investigate the discrepant records which through unknown channels have been handed down to us.

Meanwhile, the advance of knowledge and the progress of science have discredited the supernatural more and more. So that while the value of the testimony itself has declined, the difficulty of receiving it has increased. Certain branches of knowledge have accumulated or sprung up afresh, whose reliability no one can dispute, which are in conflict with the old tradition. This is the position, then, in which we find ourselves to-day, with the growth of modern science and the accumulated experience of mankind as to the invariable constancy of the natural laws.

Now, of all the miracles the most important one undoubtedly is that of the resurrection of JESUS. We cannot wonder, then, at the prominence given to it in the apostolic age. It had not become then a dry and withered tradition. It was a fresh and living faith. The apostles bore their own direct testimony. Very naturally they attached supreme importance to it, and made the acceptance of this belief a condition of membership in the Christian Church. The resurrection of JESUS was the crowning proof of his Messiahship. It was GOD's seal to CHRIST's own testimony that he was the Messiah, and it was the great proof of a future life for man, the pledge of immortality for all. Hence PAUL speaks of it in the strong terms which he employs in his First Epistle to the Corinthians. He makes everything depend on the resurrection of JESUS, of which he himself was profoundly convinced. He believed that the Master had appeared to him after his resurrection, and it was this faith which inspired him to do, to dare, and to suffer for the cause of CHRIST. To the apostles and their followers this belief in a risen Lord was intensely real. They did not merely assent to it, they realised it. Love, reverence, trust, hope—all gathered round this faith as a centre of inspiration and blessing. It was natural that it should be so on account of the proximity of their time to the alleged event. But we live at the distance of nearly two thousand years from that time. The great gulf in which eighteen centuries and a-half are buried lies between now and then. It is impossible that the faith can be to us what it was to them. To us it is a tradition which comes down to us embodied in narratives whose most marked characteristic is their strange discrepancies. This being so, is that venerable tradition the ground on which Christianity can be accepted by rational minds to-day? We think not. Is PAUL's argument final—that if faith in the resurrection is lost all is lost? We think not. And here we agree with the author of "Natural Religion." "Christianity is not now identical with belief in the resurrection of JESUS." Again, "a great organic growth, such as Christianity, filling so vast an extent—both in space and time, is not to be judged by the estimate of any single observer, were it St. PAUL himself. . . And whatever we may think either of miracle in general or of the particular miracle of the resurrection, it is difficult now, whether we look at the first rise of Christianity or at its later history, to admit that it hangs by a thread, as St. PAUL declares, logically attached to the testimony of CEPHAS and the Twelve and the Five Hundred." And we approve of the conclusion to which this writer is led—"We conclude, then, that it is a mistake to imagine Christianity as standing or falling with the miracle of the resurrection, or that it rests, in fact, on the narrow basis of so disputable an occurrence."

If, then, Christianity as now popularly accepted does not rest on the Messiahship of JESUS, the miracles he is said to have performed, or that principal one, his alleged resurrection, we must look for the grounds of its acceptance elsewhere. And these are not far to seek. Christianity is to be accepted now on the ground of its moral worth, its utility as a world-wide institution engaged, wherever it is honestly applied in the great work of elevating mankind. Its moral and religious fruits constitute the ground of its acceptance in the present day. Its proved power to meet the moral and religious needs of man, whether as an individual or a social being—whether singly or united in communities and to raise mankind in the scale of virtue and happiness—all this constitutes its raison d'être. With the progress of time the external evidences, to which, at first, the appeal on its behalf was almost exclusively made, have declined in value and importance, and the moral evidences have come to be the criterion or test of its merit and the ground of its acceptance.

It is a great advantage to be able to accept Christianity, to give it one's adhesion and support on rational grounds, leaving the dubious points involved in its supernatural claims on one side. And this we are enabled to do when we regard it solely in the light of its practical claims and aspirations. What it is doing for humanity as an educational influence, as a philanthropic agency, as a sympathising friend with those who suffer, as the power of GOD unto salvation to the sinning and the lost—all this is sufficient justification for, according to it our high regard and cordial acceptance; frankly admitting, at the same time, our inability to accept as historical much that appears in its sacred books, or to rest our adhesion to it on the same grounds as the early disciples.

CHELMSFORD.—The annual treat of the children belonging to the Unitarian Sunday-school took place on Wednesday last, and, favoured by fine weather, a most enjoyable time was spent at Horsfrith Park, by invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Rossiter. After tea sports were enjoyed, and later the harmonium was placed on the green sward, and the children sung several hymns. Three cheers were then given for Mr. and Mrs. Rossiter, and the party returned home.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT SOUTHAMPTON.

The British Association for the Advancement of Science is holding its fifty-first annual meeting this week in the pleasant town of Southampton. The members have heard from their President, Dr. Siemens, the great electrician, the wonderful tale of the achievements of modern Science, told in a way which excited the most absorbing interest, Sir John Lubbock, the retiring President, introduced his successor to the chair in the following graceful terms:—

"To Dr. Siemens, in conjunction with his brother, we owe various fruitful improvements in the practical application of electricity in anastatic printing, the chronometric governor, the regenerator engine and furnace, the electric railway, the electrical transmission of power, and other applications of science too numerous to mention. With all this scientific work he combines the management of immense business transactions. Perhaps the ruling idea of his life has been to economise energy, and to utilise the force of nature. The water-power, which runs to waste in our brooks and rivers, would save much expenditure of human labour. We may look forward to the time when the winds and the tide will, to a great extent, replace the furnace and the steam engine, so that Britannia will rule the waves in a newer and more peaceful sense. Dr. Siemens again, if anyone, will stop the waste and worse than waste of coal which now hangs in a black pall of smoke over our great cities, and restore to them pure air, blue skies, and bright sunshine. We shall, perhaps, indeed—who knows—one day burn our coal at the pit's mouth and convey the heat and energy by wires, or in some other way, to our fire-places and manufactories, and though our coal, however economically used, must one day be exhausted, by that time perhaps we shall be able to store up summer heat for winter use or even to summon the subterranean fires from the centre of the earth, as I suggested with so much persistence, by earthquakes and volcanoes."

Dr. Siemens then delivered his address, which, of course, had special reference throughout to the new science in which he and his illustrious brothers have made such marvellous discoveries. Having reviewed the progress of scientific research during the last half century, he traced the advances made in electricity, especially in the use of electrical energy. He argued the question of electricity against gas from an economic view, and assuming the cost of electric light to be practically the same as gas, the preference for one or the other would be decided upon grounds of relative convenience, but gas lighting would hold its own as the poor man's friend.

"Electricity," says Dr. Siemens, "stands foremost amongst the exact sciences." Its "ultimate nature" is "wrapt in mystery," but its latest developments are within the knowledge of all. It is a "mode of motion," like heat and light, and is "the form of energy best suited for transmitting an effect from one place to another." Among the most interesting and curious uses of this force is its practical application to agriculture. After two years' experience Dr. Siemens is able to say that "electric transmission of power seems well adapted for effecting the various operations of the farm and fields from one centre." The wonderful influence of the electric light in ripening plants has been described on previous occasions by Dr. Siemens himself. It will be found from his address that corn so treated came to maturity in less than half the time required by that which was ripened in the ordinary way.

The remainder of the address was mainly devoted to an interesting summary of the engineering triumphs and projects of the present day, and Dr. Siemens concluded by deducing from the results recently achieved by Mr. Spottiswoode in the investigation of the phenomena of electrical discharge, and from recent spectroscopic experiments, inferences favourable to his own speculations on the conservation of solar energy made known to the Royal Society in March last. The concluding words of the address were:—

"In the great workshop of nature there are no lines of demarcation to be drawn between the most exalted speculation and commonplace practice, and all knowledge must lead up to one great result—that of an intelligent recognition of the Creator through His works. So, then, we members of the British Association and fellow-workers in every branch of science may exhort one another in the words of the American bard who has so lately departed from amongst us:

Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labour and to wait.

WHAT SHALL I DO TO BE SAVED?

The controversy between faith and works is as old as the Christian religion, and, indeed, as old as intelligent apprehension of moral phenomena. St. James sums it up, one would think, fairly enough when he says: "Shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works." Yet, as it is well known, this satisfied Luther so little that he was dismayed to think of St. James as one of the Apostles, and would fain have rejected his epistle from the Canonical writings. It is the few that have believed in works, the many and the orthodox that have believed in faith. It is easier to adhere to prescribed opinions than to regulate the daily actions of life.

There have been many recipes for obtaining salvation. They may be roughly divided into five heads.

The first method is to offer the proper sacrifice to the Deity, and to pay the proper dues to the priest; to think and do what the priest commands; to entrust your conscience to his keeping, and let him work out your salvation. That is the common method, and the most orthodox. It belongs to most Churches. It requires the least from the layman, and hardly anything from a man rich in wealth or position. It is a distinguishing mark of pagan religions, of modern Buddhism, of Romanism, and, in a lesser degree, of extravagant forms of the Church of England. It is eminently unscriptural, eminently irrational, and eminently base. It is usually combined with nobler elements which conceal its inherent badness and folly. But, in its essence, it is the immoral spirit of sacerdotalism.

The second method is to believe certain doctrines enjoined by "the Church." These doctrines are different in different churches. In the Church of Rome, and the Church of England, these doctrines are embodied in Creeds, and Catechisms, and Liturgies, and Litanies. Among "Orthodox Dissenters" the doctrines though just as absolute, are much less formal—for instance, justification by faith, signs of conversion, the efficacy of grace, not trusting to works, substitution, the mediatorial sacrifice of Jesus, atonement, and so on. When I was a boy I "sat under" a minister who was always hammering along at Justification by Faith. There was something we were to think and feel, and something we were not to think and feel, and our thoughts and feelings were to proceed in a certain artificial order. I never could make head or tail of his meaning, though it did not strike me then, that perhaps he could not either. Among the Plymouth Brethren, for many individuals of whom the writer feels a deep sense of reverence, but for whose hard narrow doctrine he feels a strong sense of condemnation not unmixed with pain and indignation, it is necessary to abide by a jargon hard to learn, and hard to reduce to exact shape and dimensions. It is the spirit of fetishism. One must "have found Christ," or "plead the blood of the Lamb," or "come to Jesus," "just as one is." He who says "shibboleth" is at once detected, though it differs from "shibboleth" only in spelling and pronunciation. It is more cruel and unjust to the great world of God than even ritualism, its extreme opposite. If one argues, one is at once asked:—"Shall not the Judge of all the world do right?" If one speaks of "doing good" one is freely compassionate as being far from the Kingdom of God. All these forms of attaining salvation may be summed up in the one word Ecclesiasticism. They are better or worse according as the doctrines professed are better or worse, but, in themselves, are never to be called good.

The third method is a hard one, and has been only adopted by individuals out of all churches. It is the method of asceticism; of self-denial pursued as a good in itself; of self-mortification; of enthusiastic self-martyrdom. It is the method of prophets as opposed to priests, from him who "ate no pleasant bread" to him who "had a leathern girdle about his loins and ate locusts and wild honey." It has attracted such men as Simeon Stylites, St. Francis, St. Dominic, Savonarola, and the mute Trappists. It has an overwhelming charm for meditative, passionate natures. It is illogical, but it has over and over again stirred the world and renovated it, as it will do over and over again in the future. If one-sided, it is noble and powerful. It has few representatives among Unitarians or "the Broad Church," which do not easily produce the "saintly" character. With all their facile morality it gains many disciples among the proselytising Jesuits. Among Dissenters it has found a home with the sweet tempered and sweet minded "Quakers."

The fourth method is one of stern morality. To do the right thing regardless of consequences; to think the right thing whatever it leads to; to trust to conscience enlightened by good sense, as the only guide, if sometimes a misleading guide. Scientifically this is the right course, and it is the one pursued by some of the Broad Church party, and too much by Unitarians. But its tone is too critical and prosaic and intellectual. It is apt to degenerate to Positivism, Agnosticism, the Religion of Humanity, Pessimism, Atheism. It does not deeply believe in, nor feel pained at, the "sinfulness of sin," nor admit the supreme necessity for a remedy. It is entirely good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Without the admixture of some nobler element it never has been, and never can be, the religion of the many.

It is strange that all these methods miss the extreme simplicity of the method of our Lord; the simplicity, the nobility, and the common sense, that common sense which Beranger was more struck with than with anything else in pondering over the precepts of Jesus. Jesus says:—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God wholly, and thy neighbour as thyself. On these commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Let us conclude the present article with a few remarks on this fifth method.

It is at once evident that this method sweeps away wholly and for ever the two first means of attaining salvation. It does not admit of sacerdotalism; i.e., of entrusting one's salvation to a priest, and of performing prescribed ritual. It does not depend on ecclesiasticism, i.e., on right doctrines and beliefs, or adhesion to this school or that, to these formulas or those. It is even independent of Christianity itself (as it is commonly conceived), embracing in its all-enfolding grasp those who have never so much as heard the name of Jesus. It is at least as easy for the poor as for the rich, for the unlearned as for the learned, for the simple as for the clever. It depends on the attitude of mind and heart, on the way of looking at facts, on the inner man; and allows of any external diversities. With this as the guide of life a man may make great mistakes, but he can never go far wrong, nor keep wrong, and when he errs he will err nobly. His mistakes will be a thousand times more useful and more honourable than other men's "good deeds." It is all reduced to a question of right motive. And from right motive will proceed right conduct. For if a man really loves God and man, if his heart is in the right place, he will have worked out his own salvation and be a moving force in the salvation of the world.

It is because of the goodness of heart and spiritual strength of such men as St. Augustine, Thomas-a-Kempis, Bunyan, Pascal, that we do not so much think of the special doctrines they profess, or of the church to which they belong, or of the points on which we feel inclined to differ with them, as that we feel at one with them, and are able to draw from them lessons of usefulness and spirituality, because of their sincerity, their whole-heartedness, their enthusiasm. They are of kin with all honest seekers after truth and righteousness, even if their individual conclusions are diverse.

And this is where the method of morality fails. Morality is good as far as it goes, but it may proceed from nothing but a cold sense of duty, and may separate itself from any conscious connection with God. But love is warm. Love is a thing of the heart as well as the head. It is emotion plus duty. It is poetry plus good-sense. Further the method of Jesus does not stop at the love of man. It commands the love of God—complete devotion to Him. This implies reverence, implicit trust, enthusiasm, a filial relationship, aspiration. "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I." All this is a great and important step above mere morality, which is mean, poor, mechanical, in comparison; nor, whatever it may be called, is it worthy to be called religion. For these reasons I cannot entirely assent to, though I sympathise with, a fine and daring utterance of Miss Mulock's:—"Lovely as love may be, there is another, a blindfold woman with balance and scales, still more beautiful. Justice is a great deal more difficult to find than mercy, and rarer." Not to speak of our Lord's words, it seems to me that St. Paul in his Hymn of Love was nearer the mark, and Lessing's noble apologue of Mercy—dearest angel of God—lies closer to our hearts. Mercy is not opposed to Justice. It is Justice and something more. It is compassionate justice. It is not mercy, if it is not justice. To sum up, I would define religion as morality tinged with emotion, reaching from within outwards and upwards. H. C.

MR. GEORGE DAWSON'S TEACHING.

Three volumes of the late George Dawson's sermons, and a book of prayers very beautiful and devout, have now been before the world for some time. They sufficiently indicate the whole tendency of his public teaching and his personal convictions, to those who read them without dogmatic prejudice of any kind. While using in his earlier preaching much ambiguous language, and mystifying some of his hearers by retaining old words with new meanings, George Dawson was from the time he left his old religious communions essentially a Latitudinarian in the best and broadest sense of the term. Like many earnest thinkers who have cast off the fetters of Orthodoxy, Mr. Dawson heartily detested sectarianism, and avoided connection with any denominational party. His action in this respect and the general tone of his preaching exposed him to much misconception from the then dominant school of Unitarianism, and he met at first with little religious sympathy except from those who were attracted to him from the various sects through dissatisfaction with the existing creeds and theologies, some of them without any very clear theological opinions of their own, but all of them longing for broader, healthier, and more thoroughly religious teaching than was given by the arid theological systems of the day. Familiar as we are with the whole course of Mr. Dawson's public career, and still more so with the prevailing tone of thought among Unitarians of the preceding generation, we have always felt that had Mr. Dawson received a more generous recognition and hearty sympathy among us from the first; had the Unitarians of thirty-five to forty years ago—especially in the midland counties—been of a less controversial and negative character; had the theology of Theodore Parker and Martineau been ascendant instead of that of Priestley and Belsham, diluted as it was by excellent men who seem to have thought that progress had come to an end and that there were limitations to freedom, Mr. Dawson, and some other thoughtful men who left the Orthodox churches at about the same period, would soon have discovered that their views on religious subjects were essentially subversive of Orthodoxy, and have been drawn into closer sympathy with the Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches. There were mistakes and misconceptions on both sides. The Birmingham Unitarians of that time failed to perceive that this new and outspoken heretic was in fact doing a work akin to their own, building up another Free Church in their midst, which from the first was dedicated to a Broad and Catholic religion of the heart, and Mr. Dawson in turn scarcely recognised the value of the work which Unitarians had done long before his time, in bearing testimony to the same pure and simple religion of the New Testament, which was in fact the root of his own teaching. But all this is a thing of the past; and long before his death it was widely known that although Mr. Dawson had not formally joined the Unitarians, he was thoroughly in sympathy with their work, and found among them his warmest friends and staunchest supporters.

The unsectarian movement initiated by Mr. Dawson has not proved a thing of the day only. Without any support from a denomination or an association he established a strong and flourishing Church, which has survived even the great calamity of the death of its founder, and still bears faithful testimony to the principles he taught. The thirty-fifth anniversary of its opening was celebrated by appropriate services on the 6th of August, and the present occupant of the pulpit, Mr. George St. Clair, has wisely taken advantage of the occasion to vindicate the principles on which the Church was originally established, and to show that amid some changes in the way of natural development the lapse of time has only served to justify the conclusions presented in Mr. Dawson's memorable sermon of 1847. At that time doubt on theological matters was generally considered sinful; heresy on the vexed question of the miracles was denounced even by Unitarians of the older school as subversive of Christianity as "a special Divine revelation." The Bible, especially the New Testament, was regarded as infallible; some of our own foremost divines expressly asserting that reason and conscience were to bow in submission before its authoritative teaching. George Dawson, on the other hand, coming from the midst of one of the narrowest and most exclusive of sects, established a Church where the doubter and the sceptic should be welcomed with brotherly sympathy. He swept away all the infallibilities—the infallibility of Church, creed, sect and book. He asserted the sacred right of individual judgment, which was but timidly recognised in words by even the most advanced of the sects. "He considered that the bond of union among Christians ought not to be sought in sameness of opinion, but in oneness of spirit and unity of aim; and their endeavour ought to be to go forward together in good works and serving God and saving man." These are great principles, thoroughly according with the real genius of Liberal Christianity, and they are now more generally recognised among Unitarians as the true basis of religious fellowship than they were thirty-five years ago. In his two admirable sermons entitled, (1) "Mr. George Dawson's Teaching and its Tendency," (2) "Mr. Dawson and the Unitarians," Mr. St. Clair shows that while Mr. Dawson and his congregation changed many a belief and many an opinion, the experience of more than a generation has shown no reason for altering the basis of Church fellowship; has brought to light no better bond than to pursue truth earnestly, and to do good to others; has left the substance of religion unaltered, as had been anticipated.

In his first sermon Mr. St. Clair shows that Mr. Dawson's theology underwent important development during the quarter of a century from the opening of his church to his memorial sermons of 1872. He himself said then: "I confess it with no apology, glorying in it as a sign of life, that many things I once held I hold no more." Mr. St. Clair is engaged in editing a new volume of discourses by his predecessor, and in the following passage he gives us an interesting glimpse into its general aspect:—

"The forthcoming volume of Mr. Dawson's discourses—the 'Three Books of God'—will show that the teacher of this congregation came to regard Nature and history as sources of revelation, able to acquaint us with God's will as accurately as the Bible does. In fact, if Nature and the Bible differed, he felt obliged to believe nature and not the Bible writer. The book of Genesis relates that the world was created in six days; Mr. Dawson says, bluntly, 'That is false!' He can no more receive it than he can receive the popular story that man is still short of one rib because Adam was deprived of one for the creation of Eve. Anatomy is present to test the point; you can count the ribs in any skeleton, and it will be a very foolish faith that stands out against arithmetic. As he trusts arithmetic about the number of the ribs, so he trusts all the evidence of science on other subjects; he perceives fossils to be fossils, and not freaks of nature, and sees that they disprove the Genesis account of creation. The early part of Genesis is not a narrative of facts, he says. The story of the Fall of Man is a legend; and science is making a good show of evidence in favour of the theory that man was created lowly, and has been continually ascending. Mr. Darwin, he thinks, is probably right about the origin of man, and at any rate evolution is one of the great truths of the world.

"Mr. Dawson was so convinced of evolution as a universal truth that he applied it to history and morals. The volume on the 'Three Books of God'—made up from his latest discourses—might be called, without any unfitness, 'George Dawson on Evolution.' In the course of it he not only argues that the evolution of man is a doctrine not to be dreaded, but says he welcomes it as explaining a good many difficulties. He refers to the doctrine of the Fall as antiquated, and admits that the orthodox view of redemption is bound up with it, and must share its fate. Total depravity, he says, is not a settled truth, but a doctrine which, after discussion, will have to be classed with the stories of the nursery. Sin is rather a disease, and Christ is the Good Physician, which is a nobler title than Vicarious Sacrifice or Atoner.

"This may seem to some people an attempt to supersede the fundamental doctrines of Christianity; but convincing arguments are drawn from Scripture itself to show that God intends and provides for continual development. The Ark of the Covenant, which was a sacred thing when God governed Israel through Moses, is declared by Jeremiah to be done with; and all the arguments of the Epistle to the Hebrews for superseding the first covenant as faulty apply now with equal force to the second. All things grow old, and the solar system itself will wear out. As soon as a thing is ripe decay must begin. Out of the decaying fruit comes the kernel for a new tree, and out of a worn-out system a new young truth is born."

It will be seen from these indications, as Mr. St. Clair justly adds, that Mr. Dawson regarded the Bible as a human book, the fallible history of the providential dealings of God with one portion of his human family. Yet "to give back an intelligent Scripture to the people" he declared to be one of his chief objects. But he holds, as his present interpreter puts it, that our guide in the matter of science and fact is to be our own reason—the best reason and the combined reason of the present age, rather than any Bible statement made in earlier time; that our guide in matters of duty is to be our own individual conscience, which is higher than the Bible, higher than the Church, and the ultimate decider of what is right. In reply to the common objection that these views and teachings would soon land us in infidelity, Mr. St. Clair writes:—

"Mr. Dawson was not denying revelation, but rather asserting the largeness of it. God is the author and doer of all things, and his mind is expressed in his works. Every flower and every insect is a thought of God, and nothing is to be called common. Every nation belongs to God's human family, and the history of every people is sacred history, wrongly thought of as secular. The plan of God is vast, and extends from the beginning of the world to its close, the purpose of God pushing on to its fuller predestined development as the ages roll on. The providence of God is comprehensive, embracing all the affairs of Jews and Gentiles, of good men and bad, and every sort of event, whether counted favourable or unfortunate. The whole of history is a book wherein to read God's ways, and the whole of nature a volume from which to learn his will and character. We see then how large a Bible we have, instead of being restricted to the writings of the Jews!

"We employ our reason upon this larger Bible, and we are not likely to go far or permanently astray. The truth of things will keep us right, for we can only get nearer and nearer to that the longer we investigate and inquire. We can count the ribs of a skeleton and they will not vary. The earth will testify to the mode of its own formation, and testify in the same way continually. If our ancestors were savages we shall find some of the customs of savages surviving amongst us; and, indeed, we do find customs in the midst of our civilised society which cannot otherwise be accounted for. So it is safe to study facts, using our reason upon our larger Bible, and learning the truth of God from all nature and all history. . . Infidelity is a departure from fidelity or faithfulness, and is a term which applies to insincere, immoral, or irreligious conduct and feeling, and not to beliefs or doubts or disbeliefs honestly held. Towards infidelity Mr. Dawson was not carried, and there was nothing in his teaching that should cause anybody to drift in that direction. In twenty-five or thirty years he found that he had moved on very considerably in views and opinions, in doctrines, and all matters that concern the intellect; but he was conscious of being fully as religious in his spirit at the end of the period as at the commencement. He could worship God as reverently, he could serve man with as much benevolence. Growth of knowledge, and change of opinion, concerned a different region of his being from any which actual and practical godliness had to do with. Religion was a thing of the heart, and remained essentially the same, as independent of doctrine and dogma as it is of advancing science. The heart need never be made unfaithful by wider views of truth; and so the objection that this broad teaching tends to infidelity is shown to be unfounded."

Mr. Dawson distinguished more clearly than divines generally do between the things of the heart and the things of the intellect, and taught that the heart alone has to do with religion, while the mind occupies itself with theological questions. And so we are not surprised to hear that the preaching of Charity, the religion of Divine Love, made up about one-half of Mr. Dawson's teaching, a preaching most attractive to men and women, turning with dissatisfaction from the dry husks of mere theological disputation. As our preacher shows:—

"Mr. Dawson was more and more inclined to sum up the Law and the Prophets as Christ did, and to include the New Testament also, as only meaning that we are to love God with our heart and mind and soul, and our brother as ourself. Nearly all theology besides, he desired, and in prophetic mood anticipated, should one day be carted to the museum, as only curious relics of past phases of life. . . From this sketch it will be seen that although the Church of the Saviour asserts God's love, and denies the doctrine of Hell, and in several other particulars concerns itself with doctrine, its distinguishing feature is the very secondary place which it assigns to theological doctrines in general. It reduces them to the position of mere questions of the intellect, having little more importance than questions about the condition of the moon. While every Church and sect is characterised by some banner which it carries, upon which is blazoned the special doctrines it contends for, the Church of the Saviour insists that none of their flags are of any value, and avoids holding up any doctrinal flag of its own. Doctrines are what men have differed about from the first, and

'Proved their doctrine orthodox

By apostolic blows and knocks'—

but right-living and well-doing are what all sects agree in recommending. It was always the endeavour of the founder of this church to attach more importance to the matters of agreement than to the points of difference."

The question considered in the second discourse, on Mr. Dawson and the Unitarians, is whether the Church of the Saviour is any longer peculiar in the teaching, coupled with the other question whether the teaching of Mr. Dawson tended to make people Unitarians:—

"These question are connected, because many Unitarian and Free Churches now tell us that there is no difference between their position and ours. They have no doctrinal test of membership, they no longer elevate the Bible as infallible, they teach the religion of divine and human mercy and charity, and do not rest salvation in any creed or belief. They happen to be Unitarians, they say, because they think the evidence of Scripture and Reason is in favour of the conclusion that the Lord God is One Lord; but this is a question for the intellect, and they claim (and allow) freedom to change their opinion should the evidence seem to demand it."

Mr. St. Clair prefaces his remarks on this point by asserting that the question whether Mr. Dawson was a Unitarian ought to be of very little consequence, "because his Church is based on the assumption that no opinion about Trinity or Unity, and no doctrinal opinion, is of any great consequence." The assumptions is true if it be understood as meaning that no doctrinal opinions, honestly and conscientiously formed, should be a barrier to religious fellowship here, or can possibly affect our acceptance with God. It is superficial, misleading and utterly erroneous if it implies that it is not at least as important to ascertain truth in theological matters as it is in all other subjects of human investigation. As a matter of fact, it is essential for a congregation to have some intellectual conception of the Being they adore before they can unite in worship at all. A Unitarian, a Rationalist, or an Agnostic cannot honestly unite in worshipping Jesus as God when they know and believe him to be man. A conscientious Trinitarian cannot with any real satisfaction or consistency refuse to acknowledge and worship Jesus as God, or unite with those who insist on addressing all their prayers, as Mr. Dawson himself did, to "One God the Father." We shall see from a passage we quote a little further on that this non-theological position utterly broke down in its practical application when Mr. Dawson and his congregation moved on to what was in fact essentially the Rationalistic position. As regards their relation with Unitarians Mr. St. Clair writes:—

"Mr. Dawson, when he opened this church in 1847 for the teaching of religion apart from dogma, saw and admitted that the Unitarians did not place salvation or damnation in intellectual conclusions. But he objected to join that body, he said, because they had drawn up a little compendium of doctrine and were prepared to say that all men of intelligence and honesty would of course come to their conclusions. Their contention was that the Bible was the Word of God, only that if it were read intelligently it would be found to teach Unitarianism. This seemed to Mr. Dawson going out of one bondage into another. If he was not bound to believe St. Paul he would not be bound to believe with Priestley. He still wanted leave to believe in the Trinity if his mind should seem to see any reason for it. It did not seem to him honest to declare that there was nothing but Unitarianism in the New Testament, and to try to make every text in St. John and St. Paul square with that view.

"These were Mr. Dawson's objections to joining the Unitarians in 1847, when the Church of the Saviour was founded; but after that time both he and they made intellectual advance, and we have to inquire whether he felt himself as much separated from them in the end as at the beginning. Before he died the advanced guard of the Unitarians—and I think their main body—had learned to trust the inner light as he did, and rest less in external authority than at a former period. They no longer felt bound to find Unitarianism in the New Testament, nor to accept any doctrine simply because it was written there. They allowed all the freedom which Mr. Dawson demanded—at least in theory and by their rules and trusts they did so, although perhaps not always in the discourses of some of their ministers, nor in the name 'Unitarian' inscribed on their church boards. His objection to them, however, remained pretty much what it was, namely, that they seemed to attach importance to an article of creed, and to expect Church members to hold a Unitarian opinion."

In the final passage that we quote Mr. St. Clair explains the tendency of Mr. Dawson's teaching, and shows that its practical result was necessarily not favourable to Orthodoxy, so that, in fact, only those could join in this unsectarian worship who had either given up belief in Trinitarian doctrines or concurred in thinking them matters of little importance—this last a supposition utterly untenable if the doctrines in question are true:—

"A last word on the tendency of Mr. Dawson's teaching. On all questions of doctrine, and subjects admitting of evidence, proof and test, he was ever leading his people to prove all things and hold fast what they found to be good and true. Now it may be safely said (and the preponderating mass of scholarship and science in this country would support the statement) that many popular doctrines of the churches are untrue. Therefore Mr. Dawson's teaching could not in the end be favourable to orthodoxy. As soon as any church allows itself freedom of inquiry it is bound to begin to depart from the old paths. Further, the secondary place which such a church assigns to doctrines—as mere doctrines, matters of opinion, not affecting our salvation—repels those who are not yet convinced that all doctrines are of such small consequence. A fervent believer in the doctrine of a substitutionary atonement does not and cannot regard that doctrine as of secondary importance, because the doctrine itself says that it is of cardinal importance to believe it, and thus to secure a share of Christ's righteousness, by imputation. Thus it inevitably comes about that this church is left pretty much to men and women of liberal thought. Our membership is open to believers in a six days' creation, in Noah's Flood and in special providences, but the atmosphere of the place is not favourable to them. We have no wish to exclude those who believe in total depravity and a sacrificial atonement, but they choose to exclude themselves.

"After all it comes to this, that before we can broaden people's sympathies—before we can very much enlarge their charity—we must shake their faith in the necessity of believing certain doctrines. The great mistake of the Reformation was to set up an infallible Bible in succession to a dethroned infallible Church. The principle of the New Reformation which is begun, is to exalt Reason and Conscience as 'the candle of the Lord' and 'the light that lighteth every man who cometh into the world.' A Church like ours may either become propagandist on behalf of this new Reformation, or may simply keep its doors open, for those who feel the stress of the times and are seeking refuge. Many influences are at work to loosen the faith which good people once had in the infallibility of the Bible; and when their old foundation is destroyed we offer them one which is more stable. Hitherto we have contented ourselves with doing this, but it would be well now if we could take a new departure and publish our principles far and wide. Every reason that can be advanced for the existence of this church is a reason for multiplying churches constituted in the same way."

After all, then, it comes to this, that the much-vaunted plan of forming a church which shall include all ends in practically excluding all who believe in Orthodoxy, and regard theological opinions as of some importance. The inclusive theory, sound as it is in principle, breaks down in practice, because the greater part of the Christian world is already self-excluded from this broad, non-sectarian church. The Church of the Saviour in Birmingham, like Bedford Chapel in London, is only another Unitarian Church, in everything but the name; and when Mr. St. Clair very properly urges the establishment of other Churches founded on the same principles, he cannot but be aware that there are in existence a considerable number of Churches "constituted in the same way," although not always, we fear, quite so faithful to the liberal principles they profess.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE SCHOOLS EXAMINATION BOARD.—The results of the examinations conducted in July and December last by the joint Board of Examiners from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge have been issued. For the first time the ladies have been permitted to share in the results of the examination, a dozen having obtained certificates. The number of candidates who entered for these examinations were 734, but some were unable through illness and other causes to go through. Out of those who were examined 384 obtained certificates. Of 645 who offered in Latin 491 passed, including 51 who obtained distinction; 618 offered in Greek, 468 of whom passed, 51 being distinguished; 207 candidates presented themselves in French, 151 passed, 25 of whom obtained distinction; 68 offered in German, 44 of whom passed, seven with distinction. Of 685 who offered in elementary mathematics, 444 were successful, whilst there were 343 examined in additional mathematics, 208 were successful, 40 of whom with distinction. In Scripture knowledge 631 presented themselves, 468 passed, of whom 25 obtained distinction. 126 offered in English, 94 of whom passed, 10 with distinction. In history 497 offered, 344 passed, 42 were distinguished; 42 offered in the mechanical division of natural philosophy, 18 of whom passed, whilst 37 offered in the chemical division of the same subject, 23 passed, of whom eight were with distinction. Six offered in botany, and four gained certificates; 37 offered in physical geography and elementary geology, 33 of whom passed, 10 with distinction. One offered in music, and was successful, carrying off a mark of distinction. For drawing there were two candidates, both of whom passed with distinction. Eton passed considerably the largest number of students, whilst Marlborough, King's College School, Clifton College, and Harrow, Rossall, and Bedford did fairly well.

TEMPLEPATRICK.—Mr. F. Martin Blair, late of Manchester New College and Home Missionary Board, has received and accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation of the Templepatrick congregation, in connection with the Remonstrant Synod.

NEW UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, DUNDEE.—Mr. William Peterson, M.A. of the Edinburgh University, was on Monday elected principal of the New University College, Dundee, which, it is anticipated, will be opened in the early part of January next. Mr. Peterson is to take the Chair of Classics and Ancient History with a salary of £750 per annum.

Occasional Notes.

EVERYONE has heard of Rowland Hill's famous charity sermon. Taking for his text, "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth to the Lord," he said, "Brethren, if you approve of the security, down with your dust." The Rev. Dr. Isaac Wise, of Cincinnati, the Father of Jewish Reform in the West, a man of advanced and original ideas, hit upon an equally odd and striking mode of enforcing an appeal to his congregation in behalf of Russian refugees, on Sabbath the 29th ult. In the course of his sermon he sent the hat round, first emptying his own pockets into it, and invited all his congregation to follow his example. Over six hundred dollars were thus collected from a comparatively small attendance.

MR. A. WENTWORTH POWELL, writing to the Spectator, gives an ingenious explanation of the old saying "nine tailors make a man," and shows that originally it had no sartorial reference at all. From Queen Elizabeth, who is said to have acknowledged an address from eighteen tailors, by saying, "Thanks, gentlemen, both," to Carlyle, the saying has been mistaken. The original word is "taler." I am not sure of the exact spelling, but it is connected with the "tally" or "tale" of Milton's shepherd; or it may be, "tollers." In some parts of England (and I fancy the custom still survives), on the death of a parishioner the church bell has been tolled, once, three times, &c., according to the age of the dead person; say, once for an infant, three times for a girl, but always nine times for a man. So passers-by would say, when the bell had stopped, "nine talers make a man."

We are glad to learn that the memorial stone of the new Unitarian Church at Ardwick-Longsight, Manchester, is to be laid on Sept. 23rd, by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A. The building is making good progress; and it is expected that, according to contract, it will be opened in May next.

THE Rev. William Mitchell, the minister of this new church, whose literary and denominational activity is unceasing, besides all the cares and anxieties of this undertaking upon his shoulders, has lately returned from a missionary journey to the Isle of Man, where he preached two admirable sermons at Douglas; is expected in the Eastern Counties early next month; has just completed his very interesting autobiographical romance, "Pendal Hyndburn," which we hope he is preparing for publication in a separate form; has contributed articles, reviews, and Manchester Letters to the Inquirer, Unitarian Herald, and, for aught we know, half-a-dozen other papers; is engaged on a series of more extended contributions to the Truthseeker; and, by way of taking rest, is arranging and editing the poems of the late Rev. William Bennett, with the discourse he delivered after his death as an Introduction. We believe there are still some persons to be found who imagine that ministers have little or nothing to do.

We announced several weeks ago that a movement has for some time been in progress in the United States for the purpose of erecting a monument in Boston, Massachusetts, to the memory of Harriet Martineau, for which subscriptions are invited to be sent to Messrs. Houghton and Co., 4, Park-street, in that city. The model in plaster by the American sculptress, Miss Anne Whitney, which is said to be very successful, was sent some months since to Florence, there to be executed in marble, and returned to Boston, its destined home. It represents Miss Martineau in her prime, sitting in a garden chair upon the terrace of her house at Ambleside, with a manuscript which she has been reading lying in her lap. By far the greater part of the cost of the work has been already subscribed, and it is stated that the contributors are mostly women, who hold in grateful remembrance Miss Martineau's unwearying efforts in the cause of freedom, and her courageous support of the abolitionists.

THE Rev. Dr. Vance Smith, Principal of

Carmarthen College, has joined the Association organised by the Rev. W. Sharman, of Plymouth, for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. More than fifty clergymen and ministers of religion have already joined the association.

THE third jubilee of the Moravians, to which reference has been made in these columns, was celebrated on the Continent and in America on Monday. It may be interesting to notice the circumstances which led to the beginning of the work a century and a half ago. In 1731 Count Zinzendorf, while on a visit to Copenhagen to attend the coronation of Christian VI. of Denmark, saw a negro from the island of St. Thomas in the West Indies, and from his lips heard of the wretched condition of the slaves on the plantations. On his return to Herrnhut, in Saxony, he repeated the tale of suffering with much emotion to the small congregation of Moravians, and two devoted members, named Leonard Dober and David Nitschman, went forth, willing, if necessary, to become slaves themselves if only they could have the opportunity of preaching the Gospel to their poor and suffering fellow-creatures. They started on August 21, 1732, with the blessing of the congregation, a few shillings in their pockets, the clothes on their backs, and as their "instructions" that they were in all things to seek the direction of the Holy Spirit. Five months later two others sailed for Greenland. Subsequently missions were started in Lapland, Algiers, Ceylon, India, and other places. The members of the Church gathered from amongst the heathen number 74,506 souls—nearly three times the number of members of the home churches in Germany, England, and America.

DURING the recent meeting of the British Medical Association a discussion was raised on the Compulsory Notification of Infectious Diseases, with the result that after the display of a good deal of strong feeling a resolution was adopted by a large majority expressing the earnest desire of the members for the compulsory notification and the opinion that the duty should be placed upon the householder, not upon the doctor.

"A LANCASHIRE RECTOR," writing to the Ecclesiastical Gazette, says:—"In the name of common sense, let us have some new blood among the readers and speakers at Church Congresses. The thing has got into the hands of a clique. Year after year we have the same names, the same men. We want to hear the freer thoughts of the rising generation of clergy, amongst whom there are many qualified, if they had a chance, to instruct and please us. The fact is we are a little tired of the elders keeping it all to themselves." This hardly applies to ourselves. On the whole, our Congresses and other meetings give a very fair hearing to all who have anything to say, and sometimes, indeed, to those who aim at nothing and succeed in hitting it.

THE Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke, our recent preacher at the British and Foreign Unitarian Association meeting, in a letter to the Christian Register of Boston, U.S., gives the following interesting literary information:—

"In London I found what I had wished much to see, an early autograph copy of Gray's Elegy. Several autographs of this poem exist; one is in the British Museum. But by the kindness of Sir William Fraser, its owner, I examined at my leisure what seems to have been the earliest sketch of the poem. It is full of corrections and alterations, and some stanzas are marked on the margin as to be removed to a later part of the Elegy. All the corrections indicated, or nearly all, were adopted by Gray, and were great improvements. There are three stanzas in this manuscript which were finally omitted, as injuring the unity of the verses. Sir William Fraser paid for this manuscript, it is said, more than £130. He has many other curiosities in his collection—the original manuscript of Scott's 'Marmion,' the copy of the first edition of the 'Vicar of Wakefield,' given by Goldsmith to Dr. Johnson, Dr. Johnson's own copy of his own story of 'Rasselas,' and a whole library of curious works of this sort. He also showed me the sword worn by Marlborough at Blenheim, Ramillies, and Oudenarde, Lord Nelson's sword, and that of Napoleon. In the house of another English gentleman I saw a bundle of autograph letters written by Oliver Cromwell. They came from the house of Richard Cromwell; and as I spelled them out one by one, they interested me much. One written to his son Richard, when a youth, gave him advice as to his reading, and, among other books, recommended him to read Walter Raleigh's 'History of the World.' I also saw in this gentleman's collection a letter written by Mary Queen of Scots on the night before her execution. It was written to her mother-in-law (I believe), the mother of her first husband. It was quite a long letter, carefully written, and showed how self-possessed she must have been in view of her approaching death."

THE Rev. John Ingle, M.A., a Ritualist clergyman of Exeter, has challenged the President of the Wesleyan Conference, or any member of the Legal Hundred, to a public discussion on the question whether John Wesley was a High Churchman, and whether towards the close of his life he threw off what Churchmanship he had. Hitherto there has been no response to the challenge; possibly the Wesleyan leaders think that it would not make any real difference to them even if Mr. Ingle proved his position.

THE Bishop of Rochester has formally inhibited the Rev. Aubrey Price, a once popular Evangelical clergyman of Clapham, from officiating in his diocese. The adherents of Mr. Price are taking steps to build an iron church for him in the Clapham district, using the Church of England liturgy with some modifications. Grave charges were made against Mr. Price not long ago, in consequence of which the Bishop required him to resign his living; but some of our Evangelical friends seem to think that a minister is to be judged by his soundness of faith not by his character.

THERE have been stirring times in connection with the Free Church congregation of Creebridge, Wigtownshire. Matters have been sorely agitated there; differences of a painful nature have arisen; a special commission has been appointed to visit Creebridge; the commission has met, and they have reported that there is "a prospect of a fair measure of harmony being restored." What is it that has disturbed the Creebridge congregation? Was it heresy in the minister? Was it some vital doctrine of Christianity that was at stake? No, it was worse, far worse, than either of these questions, important as they may be. The minister and some of the congregation sought to introduce a terrible innovation: they desired to change the custom that had hitherto prevailed with regard to the attitude of the worshippers during the singing of the Psalms. Some wanted to stand and others to sit, but thanks to the intervention of the "special commission," this awfully important question is set at rest for a time. There has been a solemn vote on it, and by a majority of three to one the congregation have determined to retain the attitude of standing in singing. On the matter being reported to the Commission of the Free Church, Dr. Begg wanted to have the innovating minister punished, but he did not see his way to a majority on this point. It is, however, interesting to know that whenever he goes to a church where the people "bob up" at the singing, he always tells them to keep their seats, and such is the awe that the reverend doctor inspires that they invariably obey him. What would be the result if some recalcitrant elder were to refuse, we dare not even surmise. We suppose that there is something really vital in this matter, as there seems to have been a discussion about it, Professor Thomas Smith and Sir Henry Moncrieff being willing to "put up" with standing at singing, but averse to sitting at prayer. One gentleman, who seems to have had rather more sense than the others we have named, maintained that statements like those of Dr. Begg were calculated to bring discredit on Presbyterianism in the eyes of educated and cultivated men. This was rather rough on the doctor, but we are afraid it is true. At the same time we are glad that harmony once more prevails at Creebridge, and the Free Church is safe.

THE literalism that prevails among those Christians who have more zeal than knowledge, and especially among the members of the Salvation Army, showed itself very strongly at Bristol the other day. The head quarters of the army there has for some time been at a circus. One of the followers, known as "the Prodigal Son," recently presented the army with a calf, which was taken to the circus and exhibited. In connection with this exhibition a special service was held, and eventually the calf was killed, and having been roasted, was served up at a "knife and fork tea" to such persons as were willing to pay ninepence for admission. In this latter respect the Salvationists departed from the strict letter of the original story. It does not say much for the progress of culture that this kind of thing should be possible at the present day.

THE Bishop of Natal has done much to earn the gratitude of the Zulu nation, and our royal visitor, prisoner no longer, recognises this. Speaking of Dr. Colenso the other day, Cetewayo said: The Bishop's heart is as big as all London for my nation. I love him, and he has done everything for me."

THE reverend Mr. Symington, of the parish of Leadhills, Lanarkshire, seems to have some very strict notions of "Christian truth," and in consequence to have provoked a "deplorably bad feeling" there. His opponents, or, as he puts it, those who are moved with "enmity to Christian truth," charge him with denouncing certain persons from the pulpit as liars, with stating in a sermon that the children of unbaptised or unconverted persons dying in infancy were in the flames of hell, and that on one occasion he refused to pray by the bedside of a dying woman "because she was too great a sinner." It is not surprising that under these circumstances, which do not seem to be denied, Mr. Symington should have been invited to resign; but this he has refused to do, and the matter is now remitted to the consideration of the Lanark Presbytery. The convener of the committee appointed to deal with the matter, Dr. Phin, in moving the reference to the Presbytery, seems to have thought that Mr. Symington was perfectly justified in refusing to pray with the dying women, because she was living in adultery, and the request had been preferred by her paramour. No one, too, who heard Dr. Phin seems to have demurred to this view, which scarcely seems to be borne out by the conduct and teaching of the founder of Christianity.

THE Rev. E. Paxton Hood is contributing to the Christian World a series of letters giving his "Impressions of America." In speaking of the vast districts of fertile land waiting to be cultivated, he does not omit to mention that there are also several unfruitful regions, and he tells an amusing story of a traveller, who, meeting a man unfortunate enough to dwell in one of such regions, said to him, "This isn't such a bad country—all it lacks is water and good society." "Yes," said the poor emigrant "that's all that hell lacks."

It is said that among the American Presbyterians there is the prospect of another theological controversy. One of the editors of the Presbyterian Review, and a professor of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, the Rev. Charles A. Briggs, has recently published an article in which he has expressed opinions similar to those held by Professor Robertson Smith, and already signs of alarm have been manifested.

THE Rev. David Macrea, of Dundee, the heretic of the United Presbyterian Church, lectured to his congregation the other Sunday evening on "Mr. Moody and Revivalism." He praised Mr. Moody for his noble work in connection with Sunday-schools and young men's Christian associations, amongst the soldiers during the war, and in evangelising the masses. He had taken some of the starch out of the pulpit, and helped to introduce more life and naturalness into meetings and religious services. He and Mr. Sankey together had done much to develop the service of praise and to open people's eyes to the value and importance of music in connection with Christian work. In Mr. Moody's theology he found defects and contradictions, but he emphasised the love of God for men, and the desire for the salvation of all. Mr. Macrea then went on to deal with Revival-ism as a whole. Its faults were in the form, not in the principle; and Christian people, when they objected to the efforts of the Salvation Army and the revivalists, should see that they were offering something better. It was a poor kind of criticism, and yet a very common kind, that contented itself with ridiculing methods that were defective, while doing nothing to demonstrate "a more excellent way."

DOMESTIC MISSION, SPICER-STREET.—On Sunday evening last, August 20, a special service was held at the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, in commemoration of the late Rev. W. A. Pope. The kindness of friends had sent abundance of flowers, which were woven into suitable wreaths and crosses by the teachers. The chapel was crowded, many old friends of the Mission being present, and the service, conducted by Mr. Corkran, was deeply impressive. He dwelt in his address on the special qualities of Mr. Pope's teaching, his austere truthfulness leading him often to underestimate the effects of his own work, and prompting him to follow out his convictions, no matter what sacrifice they might involve; his earnest devotion, his constant striving to lead his hearers upward, the absence of controversial attack, and the directness of his speech concerning divine things, as though he heard an inner word which he must utter straight from the source of all truth. At the request of Mr. Corkran, Mr. Carpenter added a few memories of his last days, of his deep enjoyment of the beauties of the mountain scenery, of the large variety of his interests, and the simple earnestness of his piety. The whole congregation then joined in the hymn of Chatterton, sung at his funeral, "O God, whose thunder shakes the sky." A movement is being promoted among Mr. Pope's friends at the Mission to place a memorial stone upon his grave in Rothwaite Churchyard.

GLASGOW.—The meetings on Glasgow-green, conducted by the Rev. Alex. Webster, have been continued without interruption during the present month. On the 6th the Rev. W. C. Bowie addressed the meeting, and on that occasion a larger audience than usual was present, and listened with close attention to Mr. Bowie's remarks on "Why I am a Unitarian." Since then the attendance has increased, and on Sunday, the 20th, when Mr. Webster answered questions sent in to him, there were about 750 present. It is quite evident that a deep interest has been awakened in Unitarian doctrines, and it is plain that Mr. Webster's very clear and forcible expositions have drawn many into sympathy with our views. A meeting called by Mr. Webster to consider the need of a Free Religious Propagandist Movement or Unitarian Evangelistic Association was held on Monday last. After careful deliberation it was deemed advisable to bring the matter before the Scottish Unitarian Association, and accordingly a pressing request was drawn up to be sent to that Association, praying the Executive "to arrange for the immediate commencement and continuance of popular religious services in some parts of the city for the free circulation of such literature as shall present to the masses rational ideas on matters pertaining to religion, for the organising of a staff of workers, and the appointment of a missionary to take charge of this work, and to institute such other means as shall serve the desired object." We earnestly hope the Scottish Association will see its way to do something in the direction indicated.

DR. GEORGE MACDONALD and family have given three representations of scenes from "Pilgrim's Progress" at the Victoria Coffee Hall, to large audiences.

JERUSALEM.—The anniversary of the destruction of the Temple has just been observed by the Jews in the Holy City as a fast. During the day a large concourse of Israelites visited the Wailing Place.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

This little book, of which the issue before us is a new and enlarged edition, has one merit at least—it is thoroughly outspoken and honest. It is also impartial in its censure; all sects come in for a share. All are in fault; there is none that doeth right—no, not one. The author is a layman, who has attained the full age of man, and speaks with the authority which a long life gives him. He is not opposed to religion itself, but to the organised forms it has taken in the religious world. Christ and his teachings are right; the sects and their methods are wrong. Religious organisations in any form is what he seems to object to. He is perfectly aware that his strictures will be unacceptable, and that all he has to expect is an unfavourable verdict from sectarian leaders and teachers of all kinds, but this occasions him not the smallest anxiety. He is armed against everything of the kind by the consciousness that his judgment is honest and sincere. With some degree of honest boldness, he says, and moral independence, he has written his strictures on religious creeds and the most common religious usages; and he finds it requires no small degree of moral courage to stand up against thousands of men who earn their sustenance by sermon making; also against the millions who are expecting salvation merely by sermon hearing." But his isolated position, his extreme individuality, his holding sentiments decried as dangerous, give him no anxiety, because he is fully convinced that his sentiments and denunciations are just and true, although, he modestly admits, they "may not all be unmixed truth." And although he is too old to have much desire for distinction, yet he intends it to be known "that in the nineteenth century there was one person who had a mind of his own; one who neither sought the favour nor feared the frown of man, however exalted in rank or encircled by power—one who denounced public preachers as the most abject of slaves, and public worshipping saints as the greatest of sinners." He fully expects that the eccentricity and audacity of many of his ideas will astound and even exasperate many of the old orthodox creed-bound preachers. "For here is no hushing up of the awkward facts and difficulties that surround the popular theology and its teachings. Those difficulties have been winked at long enough."

Mr. Earp makes no pretence to brilliance of style, nor to philosophic refinement in either thought or language. He has "tried to avoid all maudlin sentimentality and to give a plain description of church creeds and manners." He is not ashamed to appear censorious, and even to use a little invective, for he is more concerned to say what is true than what is acceptable. Of charity he is aware that to many he will appear quite destitute. "God does not require us to possess a charity that puts out our eyes or takes away our senses, but we are required to exercise our senses in discerning evil as well as good, and also to reprove evil even at the cost of reputation or life itself. And they are the best friends to religion, or any other institution, who most plainly expose its faults that they may be amended." To assist in bringing about this most needful reform is our author's main object. "One purpose of these strictures is to expose all the useless conventionalities, sentimentalities, finicalities, priestly presumption and pomposities, perverse ingenuities and shams that now surround and encumber the simple religion of Jesus Christ. Another purpose is to distinguish the essential principles of Christianity from the mere accidental associations."

Mr. Earp is quite aware that to some persons he might have said, to all except himself, he will appear to assume superior sanctity, wisdom, and knowledge, as well as display an intolerable conceit, much self-assertion, and egotism; but no one shall be able truthfully to charge him with affected modesty or a desire to soften the blows of criticism. "I am a strenuous advocate of inward spiritual religion, but an avowed opponent of every outward form of religion that has a name or place in this world, believing that all outward forms only promote formality and hypocrisy. And whether my teaching be received or rejected, it will afford me some satisfaction to have taught communion with God as the only true source of happiness, and that without this communion all church or chapel attendance is only a mockery of both God and man."

We agree with our author that the little souls that are willing to live and die within the narrow prison house of creeds, rites, and mere shadows of religion will find little in his book to interest them. It may also be admitted that a few spirits who are too big to be so confined, who feel their need of a higher satisfaction than mere sermon-hearing or public prayer-saying can afford them will gladly avail themselves of the liberty there set before them—that is, the worshipping God in the inner sanctuary of the spirit, discarding all churches, all religious associations and societies whatsoever.

The work itself, from the preface to which we have quoted above, consists of ten short chapters written in the terse, vigorous style of the preceding extracts. These chapters discuss the following subjects:—The Plurality of Worlds; the Hyperbole of Scripture; the Necessity of Evil; the World Already Saved; the Deceptiveness of Outward Appearances; Public Worship; Ministerial Qualification; Lay Preaching; True Religion Altogether Spiritual. On these matters the author's views may be briefly indicated. He believes in the plurality of worlds, and thinks it an unworthy view of the Creator that this is the only inhabited globe in the universe, and Christ the Redeemer of the human race only. He thinks it more reasonable and more becoming the greatness of God to believe in an infinite number of worlds, and that his Christ will "still go on redeeming worlds as long as everlasting ages endure." The chapter on the hyperbole of Scripture deals with the inspiration of the Bible, the interpretation of Scripture, and the need to exercise careful discrimination in this matter. By the necessity of evil in the next chapter the author means the necessary part which what we all call evil performs in the moral training and education of mankind. His view is that both sin and pain entered our world not by accident but by the deliberate design of God, and that he caused sin and pain to exist for a benign purpose; for by these evils God disciplines souls into a higher state of perfection than they could otherwise attain. By the world already saved, which is the next subject our author discusses, he means that the world is already, under the just rule of God, in the way of salvation, independently of all sects and churches, that there is no future punishment in store for man, but a happy future for all men, that God himself is responsible for what man now is, and that his justice and wisdom require that all mankind shall be saved at last. In the chapter on the deceptiveness of appearances the author deals out his censures on Churchmen and Dissenters, the Methodists especially with a liberal hand. The failings and shortcomings of all are denounced unsparingly, and commented on with an ease and freedom indicating that this is Mr. Earp's favourite topic. On the question of public worship his views are very extreme. It is needless and bad. "There is a demoralising influence attending large numbers or aggregations of people. Nor does the New Testament give any countenance to such aggregations, but only recommends sympathising efforts of individualism. It is in the closet only that our worship should take place, where none but ourselves can come to be our priest. It is in the closet only that we can worship God in the beauty of holiness."

The chapters on Ministerial Qualification and Lay Preaching point out in the same style of trenchant criticism the faults and defects of ministers and lay preachers. They are altogether at fault, and the world would be infinitely better off without them. "Their only aim is to induce people to attend churches and chapels, or become members of religious societies; and they are more concerned to have a portion of a person's property than to lead them to God." As for lay preachers, they are only prompted by vanity and the desire "to make a public exhibition of their person and talking powers." And "did the lay preacher only know how the ordained gentlemen congratulate each other on having such a long list of unordained fools who are so willing to spend their time and money to support the ordained gentlemen in luxury and laziness, the layman would not be so proud of his office as a preacher." The chapter on "True Religion altogether Spiritual" points out the independence of spiritual religion of outward forms and ceremonies, and the uselessness of these as substitutes for true devotion. The concluding chapter sums the whole up in accordance with the foregoing. Such is the teaching of this little book. It is needless to say there is much in it which we dissent from, but there is much in it also which is only too true. It indicates, we believe, the real sentiments of a large portion of the laity, who have no sympathy with religious organisations. It deserves the notice to which every honest effort at public instruction is entitled. And there is this consolation for ourselves at least, that its adverse criticisms are directed chiefly against creeds and usages which we condemn, and they apply, therefore, much more to the orthodox sects than to Unitarians.

The Scientific Evidences of Organic Evolution.

By George J. Romanes, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S. London: Macmillan and Co. 1882.

With commendable regard for the thousands of educated people who are comparatively ignorant of Mr. Darwin's great work, Mr. Romanes has thought it desirable to supply a short digest of the Origin of Species, "which any man, of however busy a life, or of however indolent a disposition, may find both time and energy to follow." A lecture on the subject was published by the author several months ago in the Fortnightly Review, and the late Mr. Darwin thought so well of it as an epitome of his doctrine that he strongly urged its republication. In accordance with that wish Mr. Romanes now issues it, with alterations and additions, in the publishers' very excellent "Nature Series." Although Mr. Darwin's teachings are acknowledged to have "produced an effect both on the Science and the philosophy of our age which is without a parallel in the history of thought," it will probably be only in the course of another generation that the great mass of general thinkers will have become acquainted with their precise character. The execration with which certain leading journals greeted their first promulgation has long ceased, and given place to intelligent appreciation of their stupendous merits; while a great number of petty religious papers which opposed these teachings, not from any understanding of their meaning, for of this they showed an utter want, but from the old mad theological aversion, are now following the lead of the higher literature. Little credit is due to them still, for they rarely open their mouths on the subject without betraying gross ignorance. A few still talk about the pernicious influence of the new doctrine, but a great change has evidently taken place in the general opinion. Mr. Romanes uses language not too severe where he says that "any longer to withhold assent from so vast a body of evidence is a token, not of intellectual prudence, but of intellectual capacity."

Speaking of the objection sometimes made to the theory of natural selection, that all the evidence in its favour may equally well be adduced in favour of intelligent design, the author says:—

"But here we meet with a radical misconception of the whole logical attitude of science. For, be it observed, the exception in limine to the evidence which we are about to consider, does not question that natural selection may not be able to do all that Mr. Darwin ascribes to it; it merely objects to his interpretation of the facts, because it maintains that these facts might equally well be ascribed to intelligent design. And so undoubtedly they might, if we were all childish enough to rush into a supernatural explanation whenever a natural explanation is found sufficient to account for the facts. Once admit the glaringly illogical principle that we may assume the operation of higher causes were the operation of lower ones is sufficient to explain the observed phenomena, and all our science and all our philosophy are scattered to the winds. For the law of logic which Sir William Hamilton called the law of parsimony—or the law which forbids us to assume the operation of higher causes when lower ones are found sufficient to explain the observed effects—this law constitutes the only logical barrier between science and superstition. For it is manifest that it is always possible to give a hypothetical explanation of any phenomenon whatever, by referring it immediately to the intelligence of some supernatural agent; so that the only difference between the logic of science and the logic of superstition consists in science recognising a validity in the law of parsimony which superstition disregards. Therefore I have no hesitation in saying that this way of looking at the evidence in favour of natural selection is not a scientific or a reasonable way of looking at it, but a purely superstitious way. Let us take, for instance, as an illustration, a perfectly parallel case. When Kepler was unable to explain by any known causes the paths described by the planets, he resorted to a supernatural explanation, and supposed that every planet was guided in its movements by some presiding angel. But when Newton supplied a beautifully simple physical explanation, all persons with a scientific habit of mind at once abandoned the metaphysical explanation. Now, to be consistent, the above-mentioned professors, and all who think with them, ought still to adhere to Kepler's hypothesis in preference to Newton's explanation; for, excepting the law of parsimony, there is certainly no other logical objection to the statement that the movements of the planets afford as good evidence of the influence of guiding angels as they do of the influence of gravitation."

The book is a lucid presentation in brief form of the doctrine of organic evolution, and will prove very acceptable to such as cannot, for any reason, study the subject in extenso.

The Deity of Jesus. The Unitarian Argument. Unitarianism and Trinitarianism Weighed in the Balances. Douglas: Printed at the Manx Sun Office.

The Committee of the Missionary Conference have been at work three or four seasons trying to found a branch of "our church" in the Isle of Man, and last winter they carried on the services during "the off season" as well. Of course during the summer months the visitors furnish the bulk of the congregations. Several of the best known of our ministers have gone over and preached and lectured at different times, among others, the Rev. S. F. Williams, of Liverpool. An outline of one of his lectures appeared in the Manx Sun, and was attacked in the same paper by the Rev. Mr. Hobson, the Episcopalian Minister of Douglas. The result has been a long drawn battle between the two, in which the Scripture ground so familiar to most Unitarians has been gone over, each in his own way, and in his own temper of mind. It is to be regretted that Mr. Hobson has not thought it better to restrain his polemical asperity a little more than he has done, for he has ability enough to be effective on his own side if he had only done so. But Mr. Hobson seems to think that he helps his argument by treating his opponent as if he knew he was in the wrong, and was only maintaining his position from some sinister motive. Or where he does not do this he counts him as stupid, and incapable of understanding the plainest facts stated in the simplest way. In spite of the protests of Mr. Williams he persists in terming him a "Socinian," and "a denier of the Lord that bought him," "a perverter of Scripture," and in treating him to a few other amiable amenities of controversies. Mr. Williams once retorted upon him the term "Athanasian," which was resented fiercely, in spite of its being one of the three creeds of his Church, proving that Mr. Hobson believes that so far as name-calling is concerned, "it is more blessed to give than receive." However, the stir that has been created has been the means of drawing considerable attention to Unitarian views throughout the island.

Mr. Williams has been requested "by several Douglas correspondents," he tells us in his opening words, "who are entire strangers to me, and one of whom states that he is a member of Mr. Hobson's congregation, to present a summary of the arguments used in this controversy up to the present time." The pamphlet before us is the answer to that request. It is an able and succinct account of the Scripture evidence for the proper humanity of Jesus Christ, and of the arguments of the Trinitarians for his proper Deity, as represented by the Rev. Mr. Hobson and the replies given to them. The replies are largely made up of the exposition of given passages by Trinitarian writers both ancient and recent. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association would find this tract useful in its propagandist work. It is quite evident that those people who imagine that our controversial work is done are mistaken. Judging from a little recent experience of the writer in some places it is hardly begun. Among scholars and critics in the upper spheres of the thinking world it may be so, though we are not quite certain of that even—for a few writing persons of a demonstrative nature can fill the air with cries which seem to be the voice of a great multitude, and certainly among the great masses of the lower middle class and the more intelligent working men, our work is a long way from being done. We fear that occasionally even members of our Free Churches deceive themselves, and imagine that what is so familiar to them must be well known in the world. We have not only "positive" work to do, but also much "negative" work as well, before superstitious notions give place to those which are alone compatible with pure and undefiled religion. Mr. Williams has done his work so well that this tract ought to be circulated freely not only among the Manx people, but also among the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

Short Notices.

Fraser's Magazine continues the serial story entitled "The Lady Maud," a powerful description of adventure on the sea. "Three Trips to Tartarus" is a curious and striking account, by Miss Helen Zimmern, of three MSS. in the Parisian Library, to which the Necromanteia of Lucian had evidently served as models. The scene in each case is laid in Hades, the persons introduced are actual acquaintances of the writers, and give occasion for anecdotes, pleasantries, reflections, as well as allusions to contemporary events. "Lost Love: a Lothian Tale" is a life-like description of the life and dialect of the peasantry. Karl Blind gives some most interesting "Personal Recollections about Garibaldi," with whom he was closely associated by political sympathy and personal friendship. The three remaining articles are "The Contention between the Carriers and the Manufacturers of Great Britain," by F. R. Conder; "A Turning Point in the History of Co-operation," by Edith Simcox; and "An Indian Romance—and the Reality," which is not at all romantic, but an elaborate financial discussion, by A. J. Wilson.

The Wife's Manual. (Longman's.)—A series of Prayers, Thoughts, and Songs, all in verse, on several occasions in a matron's life, by the Rev. W. Calvert, one of the Minor Canons of St. Paul's. They are graceful in style and pure in thought, with a moderate infusion of Orthodoxy. Such expressions as "wiles of the Arch serpent" may possibly be meant as figurative. We confess that we do not like the term "partner" applied to either husband or wife, and in poetry it sounds especially prosaic. The book is printed and bound in very elegant style.

The Expositor contains two interesting homiletical papers, "Service and Reward," an exposition of Matthew x. 41, by the editor, and "The Daily Washing on one Bathed," by Almondi Peloni, who is, we fancy, identical with the editor. Mr. J. J. Murphy, a theological layman of Belfast, has a not particularly valuable or original paper on "Christ's use of Scripture," the main object of which is to advocate an appeal from the letter to the spirit of Scripture. The three remaining papers are "Studies in the Minor Prophets, IV. Hosea," by Dr. G. Matheson; "The Sources of St. Paul's Teaching—II, The Old Testament," by the Rev. E. S. C. Gibson; and "The Witch of Endor," by Israel Abrahams, a Jewish writer, who gives a somewhat rationalistic interpretation of this marvellous incident.

The Wonders of Nature. By Professor Rudolph. (London: Alex. Gardner. 1882.)—The title of this book might have been The Wonders of Astronomy, inasmuch as it confines itself almost entirely to this branch. The "Study of Nature" nowadays implies something quite different from its scope. The work contains a great deal of interesting matter, but it is sadly mixed up with what does not concern the real subject, and which is altogether unscientific.

Deeds of Daring Library.—The Victoria Cross in Zululand and South Africa: How it was Won. By Major W. J. Elliott. (London: Dean and Son.)—This book contains a history of the war of 1879, and being written by a member of her Majesty's Department and Reserve Staff, has a true military tone about it, but is not for that reason wanting a good story-telling style. In the web of the story is much of interest in the way of Zulu life and detail of South African geographical description.

The History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature. By Samuel Sharpe. (Williams and Norgate. 1882.)—This is the fourth and a very handsome edition of the well-known work by the late revered friend who devoted so large a part of his life to Biblical scholarship. Mr. Sharpe had little or no knowledge of the best of the German theologians, whom he greatly underrated; and many of his criticisms and conclusions are not adopted by scholars of even greater eminence than himself. His work nevertheless is full of value and interest, and will richly reward the study of Biblical students.

Literary Notes.

The September number of the Nineteenth Century will contain a poem "To Virgil," by Mr. Alfred Tennyson.

The Hungarian novelist, Moriz Jokai, is engaged on a new novel, the scene of which is laid in the time of the Crusades.

It is stated that Professor Max Müller is passing through the press a volume containing the lectures he delivered lately at Cambridge, likewise a new edition of his "Hibbert Lectures" and the "Introduction to the Science of Religion."

A VALUABLE addition to the materials for a history of Hungary has been made by the publication of the speeches of the patriotic Francis Deak, from 1828 to 1847. Professor Schwicker has written an interesting commentary on them in the current number of Auf der Höhe.

A NEW Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew, from the pen of the Rev. M. F. Sadler, of Honiton, will, according to the Academy, shortly be published by Messrs. Bell and Sons. It will be a practical exposition, adapted for private reading as well as for the use of the clergy, and will be supplemented by critical notes, in which the suggestions of modern scholars, including the Revisers of 1881, will be duly commented on. A similar Commentary on the Gospel of St. John is also in preparation.

MR. KARL BLIND'S "Personal Recollections about Garibaldi" will be concluded in the September number of Fraser, and the first part of an essay by him on "The Radical and Revolutionary Parties of Europe" will appear in the Contemporary Review.

A NEW and enlarged edition of Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt's "Collection of Proverbs" is nearly ready.

M. SCHMIDT, of Strasburg, is engaged upon a work dealing with the mediæval libraries of his native town, and with the history of its first printing presses.

A WRITER in the Indian Spectator says, "I went to a bookstall at Bombay, kept by a native, to ask for a volume of the Hibbert Lectures. He put into my hands 'The Mysteries of the Court of London'! I begged to be excused, when he proffered me Guiccioli Byron, with a strange light in those melting eyes of his and a quivering whisper, saying, 'Will give cheaply.' I replied I had no money except for the lectures. He then brought out Blair's Sermons and an illustrated Bible."

THE Academy says that the richness of the indirect endowment of the Chair of Greek in Edinburgh University which Professor Blackie has just resigned is attracting some of the most eminent Hellenists in the Kingdom as candidates. The appointment is vested in the University Curators. An impression prevails in Edinburgh that their choice will fall on Dr. Donaldson, till lately Rector of the High School, and who now holds the Chair of Humanity in Aberdeen, from which Professor Blackie himself proceeded to Edinburgh.

THE first volume of the "Proceedings of the Congress of Orientalists," which was held at Berlin last September, is now ready for distribution. It contains the papers read in the two departments of Semitic and African learning.

THE trustees of the Gilchrist Educational Trust have arranged for a course of "Scientific Lectures for the People" during the ensuing winter in five towns of Central Lancashire, in five Scotch towns, and in Leicester, Lincoln, Chesterfield, Doncaster, York, Reading, and Banbury. The lecturers who will take part in them are Dr. Carpenter, F.R.S. (the secretary to the trust), Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., Professor W. O. Williamson, F.R.S., Dr. Martin Duncan, F.R.S., Rev. W. Dallinger, F.R.S., and others.

Our Contemporaries.

THE LATE PROFESSOR JEYONS.

The Spectator writes:—

In candour and in profound appreciation of the shortcomings of scientific generalisation, no scientific thinker of our day has surpassed Professor Jevons. His mind was singularly modest and reverent, and he could not bear to hear the nonsense often talked as to the certainty of the conclusions deduced by physical science concerning the future of the world. He held, for instance, that we are hardly in a position to say whether it is likely or not that the earth may be inhabited as it now is ten thousand years hence:—"We can imagine reasoning creatures dwelling in a world where the atmosphere was a mixture of oxygen and inflammable gas, like the fire-damp of coal mines. If devoid of fire, they might have lived on through long ages in complete unconsciousness of the tremendous forces which a single spark could call into play. In the twinkling of an eye new laws might have come into action, and the poor, reasoning creatures who were so confident in their knowledge of the uniform conditions of their world might have had no time even to speculate upon the overthrow of all their theories. Can we, with our finite knowledge, be sure that such an overthrow of our theories is impossible?"

That Professor Jevons will be missed as one of the profoundest thinkers of our time on the philosophy of Science no one who knows anything of his writings will doubt. Yet he had other qualities, not always found in men of science, which made his character as unique as his intellect. At once shy and genial, and full of the appreciation of the humour of human life, eager as he was in his solitary studies, he enjoyed nothing so much as to find himself thawing in the lively companionship of intimate friends. Something of a recluse in temperament, his generous and tender nature rebelled against the seclusion into which his studies and his not unfrequent dyspepsia drove him. His hearty laugh was something unique in itself, and made everyone the happier who heard it. His humble estimate of himself, and his doubts of his power of inspiring affection, or even strong friendship, were singularly remarkable when contrasted with the great courage which he had of his opinions; nevertheless, his dependence on human ties for his happiness was as complete as the love he felt for his chosen friends was strong and faithful. Moreover, there was a deep religious feeling at the bottom of his nature, which made the materialistic tone of the day as alien to him as all true science, whether on material, or on intellectual, or on spiritual themes, was unaffectedly dear to him.

ST. JEROME AND THE TWO CANONS.

The Daily News thinks that the New Revision literature has not included anything so interesting in the personal way as the scandal about St. Jerome, which Canon Kennedy and Canon Cook have been discussing. The principium of the matter was not from Hierome (as the Articles of the Church of England have it, to the confusion formerly of many an Oxford undergraduate). It began with a clause in the Lord's Prayer, the clause which by various persons is translated "lead us" and "bring us" into temptation. Now it seems that Canon Cook had occasion to comment on Dr. Kennedy's strictures on the word "lead," and that he represented that learned Grecian as saying that it was an overstrong and painful word drawn from the Vulgate. "He (Dr. Kennedy) attributes it indeed to Jerome's characteristic violence." Then follow some words that do not concern us. But it is evident that the one Canon did accuse the other Canon of speaking of a Saint of the Church with violence, which may or may not be characteristic, but is certainly considerable. Now, against this charge Dr. Kennedy protests, and, as far as we can see, triumphantly. For certainly any one reading the above extract would suppose that "characteristic violence" was Dr. Kennedy's word and expressed his idea. But it seems it was Canon Cook's, and it is he, not Dr. Kennedy, who thinks Jerome to be violent. And indeed in our humble opinion Dr. Kennedy scores a point against Canon Cook by remarking "if this was Jerome's failing, which you, not I, seem to say." Still the unfortunate fact remains that Canon Cook, the editor of the Speaker's Commentary, has committed himself to the opinion that violence was characteristic of St. Jerome. This is a serious matter, especially as Dr. Kennedy (who is an old hand at controversy) does not fail to point out that the immediate delict charged is a very narrow ground for a charge so sweeping. "Therefore," says he, "Jerome was driven to write ne inducas by the poverty of the Latin language, not by violence of character, nor can I see how violence of character would prompt him to use the verb 'induco.'" It is indeed a terrible thing if a man is to be said to be characteristically violent fifteen hundred years or so after his death, because he uses the verb induco. It was Arthur Pendennis's headmaster, if we mistake not, who was accustomed to demonstrate that a boy who construes dē "and" instead of dē "but," will in all probability bring his parents to the grave and himself to the gallows. But even these results would scarcely be so terrible as to have one's character for self-control entirely taken away a couple of thousand years after death because one had written ne inducas. When anyone who has enjoyed the inestimable advantage of a liberal education thinks of the aspect which his own pieces of Latin prose used to present under the careful pen of a conscientious composition master, he must tremble for his own good fame whether he intends to join the choir invisible and to rejoice in a subjective immortality, or holds more orthodox and old-fashioned views of that state. The most ferociously strict of creeds—say, Buddhism in relation to a hunter or a fisherman—has never laid down a less comfortable doctrine than that you may lose your reputation for ever by once writing ne inducas, and the worst of the thing is that even so considerable a scholar as Dr. Kennedy, who does not like St. Jerome's phrase, cannot point out what he ought to have said instead. There was nothing for it but induco. So that the luckless Saint was forced either to write bad Latin or else to incur Canon Cook's condemnation in the year 1882. A harder case we have seldom known.

"A MORTE-HOE GOSPEL."

Under the above heading the Rev. H. R. Haweis contributes an interesting article to the Echo, describing a religious service at Mort-hoe, a picturesque village on the coast of North Devon. He writes:—

A sudden stillness seemed to creep over Mort-hoe as the last car jolted off, and the sounds of the laughing revellers and the distant wheels died away over the brow of the hill. The measured murmurs of the sea allured me down the steep and rocky road. I never got as far as the beach. It was getting dark. As I came round the furze-covered hillock and started a stray rabbit I saw lights. A little further on I came to a small wayside stone building. Inside they were singing. I stopped; a donkey boy, a shepherd, and a country girl with a basket loitered round the door. I entered; two or three candles were the only illumination. About twenty people were there, all peasants—boys, men, girls and women. It was a rough little chapel with wooden benches. I sat down. Someone handed me a hymn-book of the Moody and Sankey type. A middle-aged Bible-woman, or some such evangelist, was at the end of the room, conducting an irregular kind of service, supported by two young women of the peasant class, who had evidently been brought "under conviction," and were able to "testify." The most efficacious point about these three was their singing. They all sang loudly and lustily those buoyant—I had almost said those religious—encore tunes with which we are by this time familiar. They sang in chorus, "Don't let Him stand—don't let Him stand—don't let Him stand outside." "No, don't," said the preaching Priscilla. She was a quiet, kindly, common-looking soul, with a tightly-fitting black bonnet and a white frill.

"Don't stand outside, dear friends," said the Bible-woman at the end of the room, addressing the loiterers round the door, and her voice vibrated with deeper feeling as she said, persuasively, "It's warmer inside, dear friends; come in with your baskets, and sing with us. Sit down; you can go when you like. Oh!" she went on, raising her eyes with a kindling expression, "Praise the Lord! praise the Lord!" "Yes," said the converted ones about her, "praise Him!—praise Him just now!" And they struck up another hymn, without further ado, to the words, "Yes, yes! Pull the glory down!—pull the glory down!—pull the glory down from the skies!"

The loiterers had come in and sat down. The strangeness, the genuineness and simplicity of the whole thing—the way it evidently "fetched" the people fascinated me. I stayed for the sermon.

The middle-aged Priscilla now read—without an

"h"—from the Acts. "Paul was 'urried," she said, "into the theatre, 'e' he didn't care where 'e' went; 'e' didn't care where he preached Jesus. Some folk is particular 'bout where they preach, but them as loves the dear Master don't mind; it's just like the Salvation Army, they takes theatres. 'Oh, pull the glory down!' There's more glory with the Salvation Army than anywhere else that I know. Look at the empty churches," and here she described St. Paul's Cathedral as being a vast, empty place. "When some great Church preacher is in the pulpit, what glory is there?" she asked. She was drawing a long bow, no doubt without knowing it. Whenever the people get a chance of a "great preacher" we know they will go, even though he be a church preacher, and the place be as benighted as St. Paul's Cathedral. But the good soul went on to tell how the mob would have torn Paul to pieces, "just like the Roman Catholics over there in Wales would have torn the Salvation Army to pieces, because they told 'em of Jesus, and read to them the Bible. The Roman Catholics is poor ignorant people as never heard of a Saviour Jesus, and aint allowed to read the Bible, like the poor heathen that wanted to tear Paul in pieces"; and so the discourse rambled on—quite homely, quite ignorant, but full of feeling and earnestness; and the people seemed to attend. Whenever the preacher was at fault for a word, the girls round her groaned out "Blessed hope!" "O, be joyful!" "Saved!" and so forth, which whatever we may think of the method, kept the service thoroughly alive. A few more stragglers had now come in, and were invited to get up, of course, out of the darkness into the light. "Come up and speak a word for the Lord—do come! Won't no one come and belong to Him to-night? Oh! He's a good master, a dear master!" "He is! He is!" said a few voices. Then a young woman got up and testified; after which a working man had a rambling discourse on the "Day of Judgment," in which he repeatedly said we should be "up in the Hair! up 'igh with 'im in the Hair. Hall of us should be able to sing then. What a day," he said, "we should 'ave then!—a day without ere a night, for there shall be no night there!" I suppose this sort of thing had gone on for over an hour when the last hymn was set up:—

"My crown! my crown!

My crown laid up on high!

For me and you, for you and me,

A crown laid up on high."

This seemed the most popular of all, and was sung with a will. I don't know how many verses there were. I thought it would never end. I left them singing.

I went out. It was quite dark. This little chapel on week-day nights, I said, gathers its honest, earnest group. Yon large empty church close by is closed; it knows not how to open its doors for the people; it does not adapt itself to their wants. That poor Bible-woman, herself grossly ignorant, is doing more for the lowly people of this seaside village, with her preposterous Bible commentaries and her doggerel hymns, because she gets near to the people's hearts and loves them, and is herself in earnest. What might not the clergy do, with their position and advantages, if they had a tithe of such faith, and love, and energy, and hope!

Next morning, as I lay in bed, I heard about seven o'clock the stonemason's chisel going. They were building a house opposite the inn. A carpenter was sawing inside; another man was wheeling in bricks: both were singing lustily at their work, and seemed to work the better for it. The man within sang "A crown for me!" The man without sang "A crown for you!" and both together—one taking a "second"—sang as in chorus "My crown, my crown! my crown laid up on high!" It was a hearty, joyous, and withal a manly strain.

"Better this," said I to myself, "than the oath and ribald songs, which if the Church clergy heard they would probably feign not to hear, and 'pass by on the other side.'" At any rate, it is pretty well known what amount of influence they have over the artisan, and how much religion they have managed to teach him, with their Liturgy and written discourses on Sunday. The poor Bible-woman in the little chapel down the road had not much to give, but such as it was she cast it into the Master's treasury; at any rate, in her simplicity and faith, she has taught yon bricklayer and carpenter to "work—and pray too!"—after a fashion. Let the Church of England go out into the highways and hedges and do better; and, if not better, at least "do likewise."

THE FOUR REVIVALS IN THE BRAHMO SOMAJ.

The Liberal of Calcutta, the organ of Keshub Chunder Sen and his friends, writes:—

"Four times since its foundation has the Brahmo Somaj been near its dissolution, and four times has it been miraculously saved. All believers ought to reflect on the history of the Theistic Church, and marvel, and praise God. The first crisis came when after the death of Rajah Ram Mohun Roy in 1833 there was no one to stand by the helm of the unprotected Brahmo Somaj, and the attacks of the orthodox Hindu community led by eminent men redoubled, and threatened its very existence. The infant community had neither cohesion nor force, neither leader, nor literary championship, and many believed that the premature death of the Somaj would soon follow the premature death of the good Rajah. For about five or six years the fear and doubt continued, until Babu Debendra Nath Tagore joined, and by his genius established the Tatwabodhini Sava in 1839. This was the first revival. New life and new spirit poured into the decaying institution. An able and well-conducted journal was started which has given a tone to the whole literature of the country. A covenant was established that laid the foundations of the Brahmo community which has now a recognised and most important position throughout India. Vedantism was discarded as the religion of the Brahmo Somaj, and a system of national theism was proclaimed which had in it the greatest promise of future progress. A commendable and judicious treatise containing extracts from the Hindu scriptures was published which gave shape and character to the new theological position taken up by the Somaj. But unfortunately internal discords and differences between the leader and his colleagues broke out which threatened to end most disastrously to the institution. The leader retired from the controversy, and left the scene of his work, and the other disputants also fell off one by one, until the Brahmo Somaj became a lifeless body whose end did not seem to be far off."

When Devendra Nath Tagore returned from the Himalayas and Keshub Chunder Sen joined a new era again dawned upon the Brahmo Somaj. And in the year 1859, when the Brahmo school was established, the second revival may be said to have commenced. A brilliant succession of events followed this new life. Personal, domestic, and social reforms were carried out with vigour and steadiness. A philosophical basis was given to the religion of the Brahmo Somaj by the development of the doctrine of Intuition. Marriages according to Brahmo rites began to be celebrated from the year 1861. An English newspaper organ, the Indian Mirror, was started. Tracts and lectures in English began to be published. The Brahmo Somaj attracted an amount of notice and sympathy which it never did before.

But again the fire of internal discord began to rage. The venerable Devendra Nath fell out with his youthful colleague, and the secession of the progressive Brahmos took place in the beginning of 1866, when the Brahmo Somaj of India was founded. Such a separation was most discouraging, and the public felt that now of all times was the dissolution of the Brahmo Somaj really at hand. The youthful seceding party was full of hope and zeal, but what could they do against the desperate odds in the midst of which they were thrown? They began to pray and struggle, and the great Bhakti movement in the Brahmo Somaj began to grow, taking definite shape in the devotional festivals which consolidated at the opening of the Brahma Mandir in 1869. This was the third revival in the Brahmo Somaj.

What numerous activities, social, moral, and religious resulted after this, every one knows who knows the history of the Brahmo Somaj. Missionary agencies spread into every part of India, even visiting European countries. The Native Marriage Act was passed. The Indian Reform Association with its branches was established. The Bharat Asram was founded. Brahmo Somajes were founded, and Brahma Mandirs erected in parts of the country. Our movement ascended to the zenith of its glory. New doctrines and disciplines began to be laid down, and rules of inner purification practised which began to give dissatisfaction to some individuals, who soon formed themselves into a party. Discords again broke out in the internal economy of the movement, and attempts were twice made to bring about another secession. In the meantime the spiritual disciplines and ideas were steadily persevered in, so much so, that a protest against them came from England in 1876, got up by Miss Collet. Miss Collet represented the feelings of many Indian theists on this subject, and though the explanations satisfied her for the time, her sympathies began to waver. The Cuch Behar marriage gave rise to an agitation which gathered all these discordant elements together, and led to the establishment of the Sadharan Samaj. The controversy which arose out of all this was so bitter, and created such an utter confusion of sympathy, that once more the existence of the Brahmo Somaj was threatened.

In the midst of all this chaos and danger the New Dispensation was announced in 1879. This was the fourth and last revival. A grand Missionary expedition was organised: pilgrimages to saints and prophets were proclaimed; various ceremonies were performed, and an ordination of apostles was held. The New Dispensation is now pursuing its career with steadiness and vigour, and the future alone can prove its service to mankind.

These are the four revivals through which the Brahmo Somaj has successfully passed. Each of them has been of the greatest benefit to the formation of the principles and character of the Brahmo Somaj. They are divinely ordained and divinely carried out.

A SURFEIT OF CLERGYMEN.

The Echo writes.—

How is it that in the clerical profession the supply exceeds the demand? In the Church of England the middle-aged curates complain that the market is over-stocked with young men. The Nonconformist papers not unfrequently contain bitter complaints from ministers who fail to find churches to invite them. Mr. Spurgeon, who has pushed the opening of new Baptist chapels to the utmost extreme of prudence, declares that just now he must take young men into his college with a view rather to foreign than to home work. The President of the Wesleyan Conference announces that he has a list of eighty young men who have passed through the denominational colleges, but there are no circuits for them. Considering that every denomination is putting forth fresh energy, especially in the erection of new buildings, it would be premature to assert that this plethora of religious teachers indicates a decline in religious zeal. On the other hand, the largeness of the supply does not necessarily show a revival of Evangelical fervour. The fact is, the clerical profession appears to offer a desirable opening for young men who, having a certain amount of education and a large share of ambition, too readily assume that they possess all other necessary qualifications. It behoves those who occupy positions of influence and authority in the various Churches, and who cannot but be aware of the seamy side of clerical life, to exercise stricter discrimination in the selection of men, and to dispel the illusions of those who think that in the clerical life all its ways are pleasantness. When a young man has spent four or five years in preparation, he not unnaturally considers that he has some claim upon the Church to which he belongs.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.—The various sections of the British Association met on Thursday morning at eleven o'clock. In the Chemical Section, the President, Professor G. D. Liveing, delivered the inaugural address, and, alluding to the presidential address of the previous evening, commented on the conservation of solar energy. As to the mechanical part of the theory, he remarked that the fern-like action of the solar rotation could only be carried on at the expense of the energy of the sun's rotation, which must, in consequence, be continually diminishing, and must in time be too slow to produce any sensible projection of the atmosphere into distant regions of planetary space. In the Biological Section Professor Gamgee, who presided, gave an address on the growth of our knowledge of the function of secretion. At the outset he deplored the loss mankind sustained in the deaths of Charles Darwin and Francis Balfour. Darwin would figure in the history of human intellect with such men as Socrates and Newton. His powers as an observer, though of the subtlest, most patient, and most truthful, were almost surpassed by his ingenuity as a reasoner. No one could study the work and descent of man without recognising in it, using Darwin's own words, "the grand idea of God hating sin and loving righteousness."

Mr. JAMES COLLIER, so long associated with Mr. Herbert Spencer in the preparation of his sociological works, will sail for New Zealand before the close of the present month.

DECAYING CONGREGATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—So often is the cry raised that the Unitarian body is decaying that we have almost come to believe it. The ominous shout has been increasing in volume from year to year, and there are now few issues of your paper which do not contain some echo of it. In the "Open Council" column of your last number you publish an article full of the same complaining, and presenting, to say the least of it, a very blank and dismal outlook.

Now it seems to me that the best antidote to this will be a short account of a congregation which has been rescued from this decaying or decayed condition, and this I am fortunately able to give.

About fourteen miles from Leicester is the market town of Hinckley, having a population of 8,000, chiefly engaged in the stocking and boot trades. About the year 1680 Henry Watts, M.A., who had been "ejected" from the rectory at Sweptow in 1662, came to live at Barwell, and opened services in Hinckley on Sunday afternoons, which he continued till his death, in 1699. He was followed by the Revs. John Southell (?) and William Bibby, who held the meetings in their own homes. In 1722 came the Rev. J. Jennings, M.A., "who," as the church record says, "was a gentleman of learning, and kept an academy for the ministry." From this "dissenting academy" came the celebrated Dr. Doddridge, who preached his first sermon in the "Great Meeting House," which the perseverance of his tutor had caused to be erected in the first year of his ministry. Towards the building of this the pupils subscribed the sum of £5 15s. 6d., in recognition of which special "boxes" were erected for their use on each side the pulpit. Mr. Jennings was succeeded by the Rev. Robert Dawson, who in 1727 found it necessary to erect a gallery, increasing the sitting accommodation to about 450. He also caused the chapel to be repaired throughout in 1740. Then followed a long list of faithful ministers whose years of service are carefully recorded, and among whom we find such well-known names as those of Thomas Porter, William Severn, John Lane, Evan Jones, and C. C. Nutter. There is no break in the succession till the year 1876, when affairs seem to have reached low water mark. In 1866 a schoolroom had been built over the front entrance to the chapel, but in less than ten years after the school, like the congregation, had dwindled away almost to nothing.

There were still some good Unitarians left, however, and the chief cause of failure seems to have been the absolute deadness of the minister, and, perhaps, something of conservatism in the congregation. I have been surprised to find how large a number absented themselves during this gentleman's ministrations, and then refused to attend any other place of worship when their own was closed. It was the action of these, together with the zeal of the late Mr. Arthur Atkins, which brought down some supplies during 1877-8, and which brought congregations together during the winters of 1879-80 and 1880-81 to hear week-night lectures by the Revs. H. Ierson, R. A. Armstrong, Page Hopps, and others.

The sudden death of Mr. Arthur Atkins, the energetic leader of this movement, and the great love borne him by all [who knew him, seem to have given a new impulse to the desire for a re-opening of the chapel. He had constantly appealed for this; he had led the singing, and officiated at the organ when the number of the choir (once very famous throughout the neighbouring towns) was larger than that of the congregation; and had stood by his faith when others of its supporters were turning to the church. He kept the Sunday-school open till the children of the teachers seem to have been the only scholars, and when the chapel was closed busied himself to remove a small debt so that it might open again without any burden. He did not live to see it re-opened, but his memory has acted all along as an incentive to good earnest work.

The re-opening took place in January last, and the numbers in attendance on the services have steadily increased ever since. On my first visit, in March, 44 were present in the morning and 73 in the evening; now there are never less than 75 in the morning and 110 in the evening. Last Sunday evening we held a flower service, and without any announcement, except from the pulpit on the previous Sunday, we had a congregation of nearly 400, the chapel being sorely taxed to find room for so large a number, many of the seats being as old and rotten, and withal so narrow and uncomfortable, as to be of necessity unoccupied. The chapel was tastefully decorated with wreaths and bunches of flowers, and the base of the pulpit was "like a bank for love to lie and play on," being completely hidden by the wealth of foliage and blossom, to which palms and ferns made a very chaste and effective background. The service was most impressive, the attention being intense, and the singing far more hearty than is generally met with in our chapels.

This will show that there is room for a large work here, and every prospect of a successful and healthy cause being built up in this ancient centre. The people are but poor, but all seem willing to assist, and there is no doubt that their faith in friends outside will not be betrayed. My own experience of the Unitarian public has hitherto been that it is far readier to assist with its purse than with its hand and voice.

One thing which has been instrumental in bringing about the present success is the total absence of all ceremony. We have no liturgy, no robes, no elaborate anthems (except on such an occasion as last Sunday). Everything is Congregational, we are not ashamed that our hymn tunes are not of the newest, for we know that all can join them. And the prevalent desire is to make the church a large family, in which all growing aspirations and growing tendencies of thought shall be carefully nurtured and not extinguished under a rigid formality.

My letter is already too long, but I should like to add a word more. That there are decaying congregations among us no traveller in the Midlands can be ignorant of; but it is not the decay of the fallen log with which they are afflicted, but it is that which sets in upon a healthy plant placed in unhealthy circumstances. The truth is not dead, and the need for proclaiming it is not dead. What is needful is that it should be taken from the cold atmosphere of a mistaken respectability, and made warm and vital by being brought into contact with the needs of ordinary men and women. So long as our churches are turned into refrigerators, so long will all who value their spiritual warmth keep out of them, and we shall find our children seeking other places in which to worship. The young life needs to be provided for in a manner suited to its comprehension and its peculiar needs; if this is neglected, how can we wonder that our churches should diminish and decay?

Hinckley, Aug. 21.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The death of the late William Annette Pope by a fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the Minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London, Mr. Pope had been for about twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the Free Churches generally.

Donations will be received by either of the undersigned.

"OPEN TRUSTS" CHAPELS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It has been my desire and endeavour to conduct my share in the discussion which Mr. Jeffery has elicited out of a simple statement of undisputed facts in a temper and spirit becoming those who, being of the same household of faith, can "agree to differ." But when your correspondent invokes the aid of some vaguely defined persons in taking legal proceedings against certain of his co-religionists I must express my regret that, in doubt of being able to answer, he would be willing, by such means, to silence those who differ from him, thus displaying a theological intolerance akin to that which we Unitarians so strongly and justly condemned half a century ago in those orthodox Dissenters who instituted the "Lady Hewley" suits. With this brief reference to the latest "side issue" raised by Mr. Jeffery I lay down my pen, and leave this new attempt to stir up strife in our churches to the calm judgment of the descendants and representatives of those early Presbyterians whose Open Trusts fostered that religious development which a few amongst us now desire to arrest.

G. B. DALBY.

Preston, Aug. 21.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION.—The ninth annual report on the local lectures scheme of the University of Cambridge (popularly known as the University Extension Scheme) has recently been published. The movement started nine years ago continues to manifest a most satisfactory degree of vitality. It not only holds its own in the centres where the lectures have already been established, but the lectures have been successfully resumed in towns where they were discontinued for some years. Too much appears to have been attempted at the outset, and towns which succumbed under three concurrent courses find ample support for the single course. That the University Extension lectures are fitted for mixed audiences is shown by the fact that at some of the centres 200 to 400 people, from all ranks of society, attended the courses from week to week for twelve weeks.

AMONG the recognised nuisances of the day charitable appeals are entitled to a high place. They are successful for the most part in the degree, not of their merit, but of their demerit; not of the goodness of their cause, but of the pertinacity with which it is urged. Their gains represent not so much additional money secured for public purposes, but so much money diverted from one public purpose to another which has less claim upon it. The man who is pestered out of a sovereign by the importunity of some distant applicant has so much the less to spare for objects nearer home, about which he cares more, and to which he would far more willingly subscribe. The charitable fund of the country, like the wages fund, is not a precisely fixed amount, but it varies within fixed limits. If it is unduly trenchant upon in one direction, it falls short in another; if supplies are drawn from it for one class of objects, some other class must go without. The thing we complain of, the thing we point out as mischievous, is the manner in which the supplies are drawn, the shamelessness with which application is made for them, the beggary which is conducted on system and which will take no denial as long as the least hope remains that anything is to be got by going on asking for it.—From a "Times" Leader.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—The Greatest Boon of Modern Times.—These searching Pills act directly on the liver, correct the bile, purify the system, renovate the debilitated, strengthen the stomach, increase the appetite, invigorate the nerves, and reinstate the weak to an ardour of feeling never before experienced. The sale of these Pills throughout the globe astonishes everybody, convincing the most sceptical that there is no Medicine equal to Holloway's Pills for removing the complaints which are incidental to the human race. They are indeed a blessing to the afflicted, and a boon to those who suffer from any disorder, internal or external. Thousands of persons have testified that by their use alone they have been restored to health after other remedies had proved unavailing.

SCARBOROUGH: WELCOME TO THE REV. D. AMOS.

An exceedingly successful and well attended meeting was held at this place on Monday evening last, to welcome the Rev. D. Amos, late of Southampton, who was appointed minister at Scarborough last April.

An excellent tea having been partaken of in the schoolroom, the meeting was opened by the Chairman, W. D. Cliff, Esq., of Leeds, at 7.30 p.m. Letters of apology for non-attendance were read by the Secretary from various ministers and other friends.

The CHAIRMAN then addressed the meeting, expressing his great esteem for Mr. Amos and his congratulations to the Scarborough congregation at their having secured the services of such an able minister.

Mr. MORTON, as one of the trustees of the church, then addressed the meeting, and urged upon the congregation the necessity not only of active co-operation with their minister, but also their duty of assisting him with their goodwill and unity amongst themselves.

Mr. LUPTON, as another trustee, followed, and rejoiced to find that their body in Scarborough was steadily advancing in numbers. He hoped that the time was not far distant when they would be entirely self dependent, as this would enable their friends from a distance to divert some of the aid which was at present gladly given to the Scarborough Church to other congregations at present standing in great need of it.

The Rev. SYDNEY MORRIS, of York, as representative of neighbouring congregations, then addressed the meeting, and in a humorous speech urged upon the Scarborough congregation the necessity of allowing their minister the fullest liberty of speech in the pulpit, notwithstanding that what he might tell them might possibly not be in harmony with all their views.

Mr. MATHERS, of Leeds, followed, and referring to the last speaker's remarks said, that although he agreed with Mr. Morris that the fullest liberty should be granted to a minister, compatible with his position as a minister of the religious body to which he belonged, yet there was a wide difference between liberty and license, and he, for one, would be the first to intimate to a minister whose views were not in accordance with those of his congregation that he had better dissolve the connection.

Mr. H. BRAMLEY, of Sheffield, made an able speech, expressing the willingness of himself and friends in Sheffield to assist the minister and people of the Scarborough church to the best of their ability.

Mr. AMOS, the minister, replied, and alluding to the comparison which Mr. Morris had made between the marriage of minister and people to the matrimonial contract, said that he quite agreed with him that time was the best test as to the fitness of the union in the one case as in the other, and that he for one thought it would perhaps have been better if they had delayed their welcome to him for some two or three years instead of six months. In conclusion, alluding to the appeal made by Mr. Morris on his behalf for liberty of speech, and to those afterwards made by Mr. Mathers, he said that even should he have to tell his people anything new he trusted that he should never wish to preach to them any other than the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The Rev. J. BIRKS, of Taunton, made an encouraging speech, expressing his pleasure at finding the congregation in such a healthy state, and his hopes for their future success.

Mr. PADLEY, referring to the remarks made by Mr. Lupton on the necessity of self-dependence, said that he might rely upon it that the Scarborough congregation would not encroach on their friends' generous aid any longer than they required it, and that he for one would only be too glad if they had arrived at the happy position indicated, which he was afraid would not be for many years to come.

The meeting, after thanks had been given to the chairman, visitors, ladies and choir for their assistance, terminated with the singing of a hymn.

Mr. GUILDFORD ONSLOW, M.P. for Guildford, in the Liberal interest, from 1858 to 1874, died at Ropley on Sunday, at the age of sixty-nine. Mr. Onslow will be remembered for his advocacy of the Tichborne Claimant, in whose cause he spent nearly £15,000.

THE REV. W. BINNS ON THE SALVATION ARMY.

On Sunday the Rev. W. Binns delivered a discourse on the Salvation Army, in Charing Cross Unitarian Church, Birkenhead.

After alluding to the Salvationist demonstration in Hengler's Circus on the previous Thursday, which he had attended, and describing the publications and various agencies of the army, he said the army had now become an important fact in social life and modern religion, which we were bound to consider. Of the sincerity and desperate earnestness of General Booth and his officers and privates there could be no doubt. Salvation itself was always a weighty matter. It was weighty as he understood it, namely, a salvation from sin and from the dominion of the lower nature; and it was also weighty as popularly understood, namely, salvation from the wrath of God, the power of the devil, and the eternal pains of hell. Indeed, these two were different ways of expressing the same fact. He would consider (1) the theology; (2) the methods; (3) the practical outcome; and (4) the lessons that might be drawn for the benefit of the larger salvation army to which they all belonged—a salvation army of which General Booth only commanded a skirmishing party, that did rough-and-ready work.

First, the theology. This was old-fashioned, though not as old-fashioned as Christ and the apostles. Few things could be more opposed to one another than the Sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer on the one hand, and the excited utterances of these new crusaders on the other. But the substance of the theology was as old as the Protestant Reformation. It was a republication of the extremer doctrines of Luther and Calvin, without their historical justification, without their learning and logic, and without the religious common-sense which largely counterbalanced many of the extravagances of those two great souls. It was the Bible without the criticism that Professor Robertson Smith applied to it; the devil without the modern philosophy which professed to banish him into the realms of modern mythology; hell, without the merciful gleams of Canon Farrar's "Eternal Hope;" the vicarious satisfaction, without the healthy modifications of Frederick Denison Morris; the Trinity, without Archbishop Whately's Sabellianism; or Dean Stanley's Hegelianism, and utter depravity, without any inkling of the broader faith of Mr. Lowell, the present American Ambassador in England, who said—

"All that hath been mystical
In life or death since time began
Is native in the simple heart of all—
The angel heart of man."

This theology, therefore, lent itself to pictorial representations and dramatic displays. It stimulated the sensational side of human nature, while it failed to reach directly either the intellect or the conscience. Still, indirectly, it did, no doubt, a deal to both, and he could readily believe that it might be a greater power for good than a better theology would be with the people with whom the Salvation Army had to do. It might be a schoolmaster for A B C classes, though it could not lift them to the level of the first standard. But it served to rouse multitudes who would not stop to listen to cardinals and archbishops, and who would find neither sweetness nor light in the talk of Mr. Matthew Arnold. And there was also this to be said in its favour—it was substantially the same theology that was counted true by all the orthodox standards of faith, although preachers might have allowed many of the dogmas to drop into oblivion, or might have partly explained them away. General Booth and his officers reproduced these dogmas in their original shape and vigour, and they proved as powerful now as they did when John Wesley proclaimed them to the Cornish miners. These roused roughs, who shouted bad music in gratitude for their salvation, turned away terrified from a grim personal devil and a hell of fire and brimstone for ever burning, when the devil of philosophy and the hell of a guilty conscience would awaken no fears and have no meaning to them. So the theology did serve some useful purpose; it was better than blank indifference, and it aimed at righteousness.

Second, the methods. Over and above the preaching and praying, these methods were quasi-military in form. The soldiers used popular language to the extent of almost blasphemy, and they were boisterous in their behaviour to the extent almost of rowdiness. General Booth and Mrs. Booth—particularly Mrs. Booth, for the grey mare was the better horse—often preached and prayed in a style that would do anybody good to hear or read. Barring a touch here and there of seeming pharisaical self-consciousness, there was nothing in the form of General Booth's talk at Hengler's Circus that was unfit for the pulpit of the pro-cathedral. He did not like the theology, but he had read the same in Bishop Ryle's tracts. It had great merits in the eyes of the majority of Christians, if not in his own, and he did not wish to set himself up as an absolute judge. The officers and the rank and file of the army were, however, less reticent than the general and his wife. They talked of God and Christ with brutal familiarity, and reverence, as displayed by ordinary worshippers, was conspicuous by its absence. Quietness they seemed to consider a sign of religious death. Even a revivalist meeting of the Moody and Sankey type would be slow to them, and a Quaker's meeting would be wretchedness unspeakable. They were bibliolaters when the Bible told them to do things that they liked, and out of the common religious rut. It told, for instance, the people of God to make a joyful noise with various instruments, and they made a joyful noise with drums, and trumpets, and tambourines in many ways, but with more vigour than music. It told them to leap and dance for joy, and they leapt and danced. When the general told a captain on Thursday that he might be sent on a foreign mission ten thousand miles away, the captain leapt as high as his head. General Booth defended these methods of his subordinates. He said to the church clergy, "You ring the people in; we drum them in, and in our experience the drumming answers better than the ringing." The Salvationists were in advance of other religious bodies in admitting women to equal privileges with men, and in this respect they would fill the breast of stout John Knox with indignation and dismay. He could not say much for the mental powers of the women majors, captains and lieutenants, but they were certainly not inferior to the male officers, and mental power was not the chief qualification which the general required. He required enthusiasm, and what he called "a hallelujah hurdygurdy in the inside, constantly played on by the Holy Ghost." With the exception of the equality of the men and women, these methods were repellent. We found them in the lowest phases of religious life, and they smacked of barbarism, for barbarians, like the Salvationists, were distinguished from civilised races by inability to control their emotions, and by letting themselves run loose. Yet here again we must judge of the suitability of the methods pursued by the character of the people whom the Salvationists wished to reach. They snatched their converts from the gutter and the ginshops, from the thieves' den and the brothel, and boisterousness and rowdiness and wild singing and wild music, and turbulence and irreverence verging on blasphemy might be the most effective weapons they could use against the devil—at least the Salvationists thought so. They adopted some of the devil's ways in order to outwit him. They had the lowest classes to deal with, and as they stood only one step above the lowest classes themselves, perhaps they could reach them and lift them up more easily than wiser men who pursued more refined methods, but stood on an eminence and could not, or would not, come down. This was the rationale of the Salvation Army methods. He could excuse them, and, under the circumstances, to some extent he could praise them, though he could not imitate them or recommend them.

Third, the practical outcome. This was the main test both of the value of the theology preached and the methods pursued. He thought it would be a mistake for any decent worshipper at any church or chapel to abandon his old religious home and join the Salvation Army. Better let him remain a Roman Catholic, an Anglican, a Nonconformist, a Jew, a Mahom-edan, or a follower of Auguste Comte. The army, however, descended to a deeper social strata than these decent worshippers. It attacked drunkards, and made them teetotallers; it attacked thieves, and made them work honestly for their living; it attacked fighting husbands and wives, and made them outwardly conform to their marriage vows; it attacked corner-men and street arabs, and made them respect policemen and the law; and all this was an undoubted gain to society. Of course, the roughs who were gathered into the net did not all permanently remain there. Probably four-fifths of them quickly slipped out again. But if roughs gave up their roughness even for a month, it was something to be thankful for so far as it went. If he might judge from the experiences that he had heard related, the army had certainly made tolerably decent people of a large number of desperate characters. According to their own confession, these desperate characters had ceased from drunkenness, thieving, fighting, and forgetfulness of God, and they had taken to honesty, industry, peace, sobriety, and trying to save their fellows in gratitude for their own washing in the blood of Christ. Yet this did not amount to much when we examined it closely, for the saved only became what all people must be, if they are to be decent in any ordinary fashion; and to say that a man does not steal, or get drunk, or beat his wife, was to say very little. Taking them at their own word, he should not care to give up his gardener or his domestic servant, unconverted as these might be, for a Salvation Army convert.

But there was also the religious outcome to be considered, and here the army converts were melancholy specimens of human nature. On the strength of a slight change for the better, joined to belief in their own salvation, they used the current evangelic language of the day in a way that was downright shocking to pious susceptibilities, and set themselves up as spiritually perfect. Their religious ideal was sadly low. He never knew a smaller capital with which to carry on a great enterprise. Their boastfulness, with scanty reason to boast, was unbounded. They were Pharisees who prated of their holiness when they had only taken the first step in morality. There was no spring of future progress in them. They were better than they had been, but their improvement was of such a sort that it prevented further improvement, except they drifted into other religious organisations, and that they were not likely to do. For if they joined other organisations they would not be allowed to finish their religious education so soon. All alike would tell them to move on, and to seek for an excellence even more beyond their present condition than their present condition is beyond the brutal rudeness from which they have been emancipated. The Salvation Army had snatched them out of the mire and filth of their old habits. Now, instead of walking and running as they ought to do, they were jubilant and satisfied, just because they were out of the mire and filth. And they lowered the standard of religions by their self-glorification over what, after all, was a wretched trifle if they stopped at what they had already done; and, unhappily, they seemed to be willing to stop there, and to dream of nothing higher.

Fourth, the lessons of God's larger Salvation Army. If we had theological doctrines the same as those of General Booth and his enthusiastic soldiers, or if we had doctrines we thought better than theirs, surely we might learn from them to state these doctrines in plain and popular language, so that the common people might hear us gladly, and at the same time we might avoid the Salvationists' errors. It was possible to bring the highest truths home to the lowest minds. We wanted the boldness that would defy conventionalism, and that would venture on talk straight from warm and loving hearts, disciplined by reason and by culture. Although we could not adopt the Salvationists' methods pure and simple, still every church might usefully modify the methods which it at present pursued. There might be heartier singing and more frequent social gatherings, and the drums and bands which paraded the streets in the interests of the Salvation Army might be used by other churches in the public halls and parks on Sunday afternoons—in St. George's-hall, and in Sefton, Stanley and Birkenhead parks

The Salvation Army had set the example, and we might improve upon it.

On the whole, the good done by the army amounted to this—it had stirred up forgetful hosts to think of God; it had weaned them from low vices; it had induced them to give money according to their means, and to labour according to their lights, and there its power terminated, and its ambition also. Now was the time for the larger army to carry on the war in a more efficient way, and to try and lead these raw recruits from victory to victory. By education, by attractive forms of worship, by plain and forcible statements of religious truth, by the practical application of religion to everyday duties, by the refining influence of art and rational amusement, by the enthusiasm of humanity, and by the life of God in the soul of man, according to the spirit of life that was in Jesus Christ, we could all do God's work, and help on the evergrowing salvation of God's children. For salvation was never a completed thing, but it was a process of endless development.

THE FUNERAL OF PROFESSOR JEVONS.

The remains of the late Professor William Stanley Jevons, who died under such sad circumstances, at Bexhill, on Sunday week, were on Friday, the 18th inst., interred in the cemetery at Hampstead. In accordance with the wish of the deceased gentleman's immediate relatives, the funeral was not only strictly private, but of the simplest description. Shortly before three o'clock—the hour fixed for interment—the mournful procession left The Chestnuts, Branch Hill, where the deceased resided, and slowly wended its way across the picturesque heath to a quiet and carefully kept cemetery, a mile and a half away. The body was followed to the grave by Mrs. Jevons and her little son, Herbert Stanley, who is about eight years old; Mrs. John Hutton (the deceased's eldest sister) and Mr. John Hutton, Mrs. Frederick Jevons (Mrs. Jevons's elder sister) and Mr. Frederick Jevons, Mr. Henry Jevons, Dr. Evershed, Mr. Russell Scott, Mr. George Allen, Mr. E. J. Broadfield, Mr. William Hunt, Professor Foxwell, the Rev. J. Worthington, Mr. Roscoe, and Mr. R. A. Hutton. The funeral ceremony was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Sadler, Unitarian minister, Hampstead, of whose congregation the late professor was a member.

Dr. Sadler met the hearse at the entrance to the mortuary chapel, and as the coffin was borne to the bier he began the service, in the course of which he delivered the following address: We are called together to-day by an event which has not only filled us with grief, but also come upon us with appalling suddenness. In the midst of his days our friend has been taken from us, and we are left to deplore the loss of one dear to us and of a mind capable of rendering vast service to our own and coming times. There was, perhaps, no one in our day whom the student in abstract reasoning would find so effectual a guide, or who had a larger or firmer grasp of these great questions which have to do with interests "public and universal" in the department of political and social science. His arguments had weight with statesmen, his theories engaged the earnest attention of philosophers, and his prophecies were listened to by all thoughtful men with a consideration and respect rarely accorded. He combined with his thoroughness of investigation and his mastery of facts an originating power which gave to his views their special and characteristic value. Happily all of us have the means and opportunity of doing some good, if only in a small way. We may fill well some place in which we may be useful, in at least a narrow circle; but to only a few is it given to influence the thought and opinions of men on subjects of great national importance; and Stanley Jevons was one of these. The aim and work of his life was to establish the practical principles which would have the widest application, and the benefit of which would extend to countless multitudes of his fellow-men. Though, however, he accepted what he could not but have felt to be his calling, and loyally devoted himself to it, his need of close abstraction and freedom from noise and disturbance of every kind shows how exact and severe was the mental process by which alone the gift that was in him could produce its highest results. There is no harder work in this world than the thinking which is required to work out such difficult problems as those to which he applied himself. But the good that may be done by those who are qualified and repared to work out these problems is incalculable, and may well lead them to make little of any cost it may be to themselves. Not without seriously tasking his vital energies could our friend have been of so much use as he was, and yet to all appearance there was nothing to prevent his being of even greater service in the future than in the past. He was in the maturity of his powers, his devotedness to his chosen department of study was entire and the field of his labours was inexhaustible, but the hour of his departure has come, and we are here to lay his mortal part in its earthly bed. Perhaps when we think what a frail thing mortal flesh is and of the dangers to which it is exposed from within and without, we should rather wonder that it lasts so long and so well as it does than that at any time it should give way. On the other hand, however, how impossible it is to believe that its fate can be shared by the mind which for a time animates it. This must strike us all the more in the case of minds in which there has been a marked superiority. That such a mind should be subject to a thousand accidents, should be destructible by a thousand diseases, should moulder in the dust, should become nothing, or at best only a memory, having indeed a lasting place in the honour of men, but no place in the universe of God—this truly is no consummation to be feared. Much, however, as we regret the loss of a brilliant talent in our midst, we cannot help thinking chiefly now of the friend whom henceforth we shall miss, with so much in his nature and in his life to esteem and love. His retiring habits and disposition were but as a thin veil over the light and the warmth that had their seal in the sanctuary of his heart. If great intellectual abilities, winning, as they sometimes do, a kind of earthly immortality, be a witness to man's future being, there is another witness which comes still more home to us. It is that of lofty principles of goodness guiding the conduct and moulding the character. It is that of the leader affectionately sweetening the ties of family and friendship. Here we have the very spirit of God manifesting itself in us, and amidst all our weaknesses and sins drawing us to one another, to righteousness, to Himself, and to heaven. As an old writer has said, "God will never forsake the life He has quickened in us." If there were nothing for us beyond our brief sojourn here, "He would not raise us to such mounts of vision" as He does in our better moments—

In souls that of His own good life partake,
He lives as His own self;
Dear as his eye they are to Him,
He'll never them forsake;
When they shall die then God Himself will die.
They live in blest eternity.

People sometimes ask for evidence of a future state. Our belief in such a state has for its foundation our whole faith in God. So, then, my friends, let us perform our sad office to-day with hearts uplifted to Him in whom is all our support. From the mysteries which surround both the life that now is and that which is to come we have a sweet and peaceful refuge in the simplicity which is in it. It was said of him that he came "to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death;" and he himself said, "Let not your hearts be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions." For much which we may desire to know we can wait, but sure and simple grounds of trust we want now and we have them. We commit the departed spirit not into darkness, but into the hands of our heavenly Father. For all the time that remains to us here below, we now, therefore, bid our dear friend and brother farewell. He is gone to "the great and famous nation of the dead" who all live unto God. O Death! thou layest on us a heavy burden of sorrow in the separation, such as it is; but thou dost not lay upon us the sorrow that is without hope. Thou drawest the curtains of time, but thou liftest the veil of eternity. Thou dost close the story of our earthly days, but thou dost open to us the glorious beyond. Thou dost separate, but thou dost unite. Thou dost take from us our beloved, but thou wilt take us also, and lead us to where they are. When thy work is completed we shall be together in the home which is above.

On the conclusion of the service in the chapel the massive oak coffin was carried to the grave, where Mrs. Jevons and her son and Mrs. Hutton deposited loving wreaths of beautiful flowers upon it. After a short prayer had been offered the service terminated, and the mourners left the cemetery.

DR. CARPENTER sailed for the United States about a fortnight ago.

CHINESE SUPERSTITIONS.—Much curious information on this subject is conveyed in the Report of the Health of Wenchow, for the six months ending September 30, 1881, compiled by Dr. J. Macgowan. The author has gathered together a miscellaneous collection of memoranda concerning many of the superstitions prevalent in the Celestial Empire. He deals with "epidemic frenzies"—the popular crazes which sometimes affect whole communities and of which the most noted Western example is the witch mania which devastated Europe in the 16th and 17th centuries. Such epidemics are very common in China, the most conspicuous recent instance being the terror created in 1876 by the supposed supernatural clipping of queues. It appears that sorcerers are in the habit of scattering charmed bits of paper representing men, which are the means of disseminating evil spirits throughout the community. When one of these enters a house he proceeds to cut off a piece of the queues of the inmates, and the sorcerer, on obtaining possession of this, can evoke at will the soul of its owner, which he is able thereafter to use as a servile demon, while the man dies through the loss of his spirit. The only cure is for the sufferer to cut off an inch or two more of the remainder of his hair and keep it for eighty days soaking in a cesspool, thus severing the mysterious connection between his head and the portion of hair in possession of the sorcerer. But for prevention, reliance is placed on amulets and charms. In 1876 the Governor of Kiangsu issued a proclamation, embodying a charm of his own invention, to be posted over the doors of dwellings or to be worn as an amulet. He further recommended an anathema attributed to Tao-Tsze, the founder of Taoism, which was to be chanted while copying it on yellow paper with the blood of a cock mixed in vermilion, the paper being thereupon burned and the ashes swallowed. Dr. Macgowan states that there was scarcely a house-door that was not protected by a charm, and scarcely an individual who did not wear an amulet on cap or sleeve; but it subsequently appeared that the panic was the work of secret revolutionary societies, whose emissaries found little difficulty in creating a disturbance by clipping off a few queues from the unwary in each large city, and by loudly announcing in places of public resort that they had been treated in the same way.

An important scheme (the Manchester Guardian says) for obtaining in a more effectual manner than hitherto a complete record of published scientific work is to be brought before the British Association this year by Professor Sollas, of University College, Bristol. It requires first that each nation furnish a record of its own work and of that only, and second, that each nation receive the records of every other nation in exchange for its own. For the working out of this scheme national committees, on the one hand, for the preparation of the national records, and on the other an international congress for the interchange of ideas between the members of committees, will be required. Professor Sollas's scheme will receive large support from scientific men, as they think it contains the germ of a great international scientific association.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—Among the Exchequer receipts in the year ending March 31 was £8,909 as "fees of candidates."

SCHOOL BUILDING AND CHAPEL ALTERATION FUND.

To meet the wants of a densely crowded neighbourhood, a large school-room, capable of holding 500 children, is being built. The Chapel is also being altered and improved, so as to make it a better centre of usefulness in the district. The congregation is almost entirely made up of people with small incomes, and they cannot raise more than £200. They can only rely, therefore, on the generosity of those who have the moral and religious elevation of the people at heart to help them to carry through the work.

We find that the cost of building the School-room, of re-roofing, repairing, and improving the interior of the Chapel, and providing new heating, ventilating, and lighting apparatus for both, will be between £1,800 and £1,900. Many liberal friends have already promised to assist, but nearly £800 is still wanted.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER, 151, Brixton-road, S.W. (Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), will be glad to receive further subscriptions to the Fund. The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWK, 4, Wincott-street, Kennington-road, S.E., will furnish any information required.

AUTHORITY.

A LITTLE time ago a person of the orthodox persuasion asked the writer what he thought to be the meaning of a certain passage in one of the Epistles. The writer gave what he thought to be the sense of the passage. "But that is the orthodox meaning," said the questioner. "Very well," was the reply, "so be it; that seems to have been PAUL's meaning, and that is what we have to do with, I suppose, at present." "But why do you reject the doctrine, then, seeing that it is here clearly stated?" was asked in evident surprise. "Because I believe the good man was under a mistake," was the answer. "Ah! you self-willed, angular-minded Unitarians, you know not how to submit to authority in anything," he said, in evident mental excitement. Without continuing the conversation, the writer replied that no one knew how to submit to real authority so well as they who were guided by reason and conscience, for none understand the benefits of a true standard so well.

What is Authority? Real authority decides questions and determines the convictions and the conduct of the individual. It is what is final to him in reaching a decision, and to which all other influences whatever have to yield as less and inferior. And wherever this may be there is the principle of a man, the principle on which he bottoms all his convictions.

In Christendom there are four standards set up as authoritative, the advocates of each asserting their respective one as the only and final authority.

1. The Roman Catholics assert that the Church is the final Authority in Religion. On page 90 of Essays on Religion and Literature, edited by Cardinal MANNING, it is said that "the Church we must never forget is an infallible guide, not in faith only, but in morals also; and every single proposition of which right or wrong is a predicate is under her jurisdiction."

2. The Protestants dissenting from this Church assert that the Bible is the Word of GOD, that it is the infallible authority to which all conviction should yield, and before which all consciences should bow.

3. As we can prove the Bible not to be infallible, say others, we cannot accept it as a whole, and constitute it our final authority; CHRIST must be your Master, you must yield reason and conscience into his keeping, and let him absolutely rule your convictions and conduct. And this is tempting to men who admire the divine beauty of his character, the elevation and grandeur of his life; who thrill to the spirit he has poured into the world as the telegraph wire thrills to the electricity sent through it. Here is one to whom reverence can bend in humblest attitude of discipleship, and own him highest teacher of the world's great instructors. But, while giving him affection, reverence, and gratitude, we cannot accept even him as final authority in matters of conscience. We are disciples of the spirit, not mental slaves. Perfect moral purity and transcendent religious genius give neither the mental omniscience nor the absolute spiritual perfection which infallibility implies; and we know that in one or two of his judgments he was mistaken.

4. The Christian Theists—those who are in spiritual discipleship to JESUS—assert that nothing external to man can be a final authority; they therefore assert that conscience must be the standard, up to which they must act, and to which they must conform, whatever or whoever is opposed. Of course each of the parties here referred to claims to hold to conscience, but the real point at issue is, which shall be supreme, and which, if they happen to disagree, shall yield to the others? The answer to that question decides in and under what category a man shall be classed. We assert, without fear of successful confutation, that conscience is the highest authority to a man; that it is his duty in all circumstances to yield to its obedience, and that it never can be his duty to disobey it, or to obey any outward authority opposed to it. When it speaks a man ought to be deaf to every other voice; and if the need arises of vindicating it, he is bound to be rebellious to every command, come from what external source it may. Moreover, conscience is free, or it ceases to act: from its very nature it is an inward power, and it cannot be rightly dictated to from without. Conduct dictated from without is no expression of the inward life, for that can only be by the outflow of its own energies. Personal and individual conviction is the only true and final authority to a man; for in asserting personal conscience he is but practically acknowledging his responsibility.

It may be asked, what is it that gives to conscience a dignity that is not shared by the thought of interest, however pressing, or expediency, however plausible? The answer is, that interest belongs to the temporal world, or to the occasional circumstances, while conscience belongs to the permanent—the eternal—and it will remain in a pure or a perverted state when the temporary and expedient have passed away. In present importance, and in enduring interest, conscience surpasses ought of circumstance that time can lend a passing influence to. Of course, by conscience we mean not personal egotism, the whim of fancy, or the caprice of appetite in the individual, but personal fidelity to what is highest in the man's nature, which would suppress whim and banish caprice, if always obeyed. For conscience is the centre and core of man's being, the faculty which hears the divine voice declaring, "Thou ought," and that translates it into the human decision, "I will!" He who obeys conscience obeys GOD, as it is that part of our nature which is in close moral contact with the Holy Spirit—it is the organ through which that Spirit pours itself into his heart, and by which it pervades his whole being.

We will go so far as to say that conscience is always right. It may not always fix itself on right objects according to the absolute right as existing in the mind of GOD; but as it is faithfulness to what is highest in the soul it is a pledge that if it even reach to anything higher it will be faithful to that, too, and so it is approved by Him who accepts the meaning of the soul, the intentions of the will. Thus all opinions are equally innocent that are held with equal sincerity.

So have we an authority—not infallible, but vital and even progressive, by which we can be assured of fidelity to whatever is truest and most divine to us at any given stage of development, and which will lead us on and upward from good to better through never ceasing progress. That which rules the conscience commands the conduct and shapes the life; our conclusion is, therefore, that as the responsibility towards GOD rests with the individual the personal conscience in all moral and religious matters is the true final authority to the individual. In science, fact is the rightful authority; in government power; in religion authority is but another word for coercion. In science and government authority is legitimate, in religion it is but usurpation. The test of institutions is their utility; the criterion of a principle is its truth; the proof that a man is really religious is that he is reverent, pure and pious; that he loves GOD, and serves Him by doing good to his fellow man. Goodness and piety are the final authorities in religion.

MISS COBBE'S "PEAK IN DARIEN."

THE vivacity, the fluency, and the lofty purpose of the essays of Miss COBBE are too familiar to the readers of the Inquirer to need any praises of ours. These characteristics all appear in their full measure in her latest volume.* Miss COBBE has also linked her name indissolubly with two or three great subjects; and it is these that occupy her mind again in the essays which she has now collected.

The volume opens with the article entitled "Magnanimous Atheism," which will be within the memory of the readers of the Theological Review. The main contention of this paper is that while the modern Atheist or Agnostic often presents the very loftiest type of disinterested morality, Atheism and Agnosticism are per se unfavourable to the development of such character. The man of to-day who has cast off the Theistic faith and the hope of Immortality still has the roots of his character in Christian soil, and his soul was set towards purity and unselfishness before the reconstruction of his philosophical creed. He learnt to love goodness from those who believed both in its eternity and in its actual ideal perfection in an existing Being. The forces that are to teach that same sacred love to generations reared without the idea of God or of the imperishable energy of goodness will be indefinitely weakened, and are less likely to prevail in the struggle with the lower tendencies of the natural man. We think this contention absolutely sound. It is not advanced as an argument for the truth of the beliefs in God and the future life. It has in it no tinge of bigotry towards the apostles of the godless creed. No writer ever more lavishly confessed the exalted moral sense exhibited by many of these new Evangelists. But Miss COBBE holds that in the long run purity, unselfishness, and truthfulness will suffer, if their gospel wins acceptance.

If it is replied that the belief of what is true must by its very nature be most promotive of goodness, we rejoice that we entirely concur in that faith. But that faith rests on the faith in God. If there be no God we see no reason whatever to suppose that the knowledge of the truth may not—as was fabled in the old Hebrew story—be in its very nature provocative of sin. It is because we believe in a God, in whose eyes goodness is more precious than all else, that we believe that knowledge of the truth and growth of goodness must go together; or, if you will, it is by seeing that truth and goodness are for ever wedded that we are fortified in our belief in the utter goodness of God.

Turning to the third essay, entitled "Pessimism and one of its Professors," we fear Miss COBBE runs some risk of being charged with that discredited method of controversy which consists in holding up to reprobation the moral character of your intellectual opponent. Yet it is difficult to see how this charge is to be avoided. No one will deny that each man's outlook on the universe is coloured at least as much by his own temper as by the actual tints of the heavens and the earth. He whose nature is sunny, in whose heart love springs up inextinguishable, whose soul is always touched to gratitude by each happy experience that comes to him, is hardly likely to settle down to the creed that the world is a dismal swamp and the skies are heavy with thick darkness, and man is a wretch who had been better never born. But he who is arrogant, vain, morose, cowardly, sensual, and selfish is pretty sure, if he falls to philosophising, to conclude that the world is desperately out of joint. We hope that not many mothers have had to write to their sons: "Your ill-humour, your complaints of things inevitable, your sullen looks, the extraordinary opinions you utter like oracles which none may presume to contradict, all this depresses me. Your eternal quibbles, your laments over the stupid world, and human misery, give me bad nights and unpleasant dreams." Yet so wrote the mother of ARTHUR SCHOPENHAUER to her son while he was still at college. With Miss COBBE we shall trace in the character which an amiable mother was thus constrained to recognise in the lad the seeds of the gloomy and godless wisdom of the man.

One of the most interesting essays in this volume deals with the fitness of women for the ministry of religion. Women are already beyond all question—as the Comtists teach us—the chief ministers of religion. But Miss COBBE discusses the propriety of their admission to the pulpit and the ministry. We believe, with her, that there are women whom it is a dead loss to the religiousness of mankind to exclude from the functions of the preacher and the pastor. But our chief profit in the perusal of the article has been in the large and beautiful ideal of the ministry of religion which it sets before us.

Two other short papers deal with religious topics. "The House on the Shore of Eternity" is an allegory, essentially beautiful and true, if, perhaps, a little strained. "The Peak in Darien: the Riddle of Death," will to many be the most interesting member of the volume. From the height of Darien at the southern extremity of the narrow strip of land which unites two of the greatest continents and divides the two vastest oceans of the earth, the spectator, making a moment's pause, beholds behind him the troubled seas on which rides the commerce of the world, and scans in front of him the peaceful waters which stretch beyond the setting sun, and have gained the fair name "Pacific." Miss COBBE marshals many instances in which, in the very moment of dissolution, the soul has seemed, while still linked to the body which was its tabernacle in past days, already to discern the presences which people the spirit world. Some of these stories are very touching, and full of a lofty suggestiveness. We should be inclined to associate them with another group of incidents, very many of which are authenticated beyond all cavil. We mean those in which distant friends have apprehended the presence of the loved at the very instant at which it has afterwards transpired that these crossed the river which divides two worlds. Both classes of stories seem to us to indicate a triumph of the spiritual powers over physical conditions at the moment of death, which points irresistibly to the conclusion that even then soul is taking up its heritage in the realm where flesh no more constrains and space no more confines.

The remaining essays deal with "Hygeiolatry," with "Zoophily," and with "Sacrificial Medicine." The last is an unsparing exposure of the pompous folly of medical "science" in the past, leading up to the suggestion that even now much which passes with the "faculty" and their clientèle for science rests on no broader foundation of observation and reasoning than the hideous animal "Arcana," and quintessences to which our ancestors in all good faith submitted.

In the paper headed "Hygeiolatry" Miss COBBE lays a very heavy indictment against modern society, no less than this, that in the eagerness of the pursuit of health the pursuit of the higher good has been relaxed; that whereas in more chivalric and more Christian times the sacrifice of health and strength for the good of others was esteemed a virtue, the teaching now is that health is to be nursed at all costs, that "the interests of health are so supreme that they themselves constitute the highest law and render any practice conducive to them ipso facto lawful."

There can, we fear, be no question that there is much truth in this condemnation. It is most manifest in the province of legislation, and the strange abnegation of their functions which leads legislators, municipal and imperial, to accept the dictation of medical men at the cost of all constitutional principle, and some of the highest laws of humanity. But Miss COBBE has not pointed out how, side by side with this postponement of the spiritual to the physical law, we have, strangely enough, a practical contempt of physical law of the widest sweep and the most alarming prevalence. The social consciousness of our time regards "overwork" as a venial sin in others and as a virtue in oneself. At the very moment when it is insisted that the "laws of health" shall be taught in schools, those laws are violated wholesale in the most reckless manner under the direct instigation of parliament and government. The pressure on managers and teachers to "push on" lads and tender little girls is so tremendous that many a little life is sacrificed to the new insanity, and thousands of delicate bodies are impressed with disease which must descend to the third and fourth generations. At the same time, professional men are breaking down, score after score, under the stress of their unnatural labours, and clever ambitious girls are goaded on to destroy the health God gave them with the excitement and anxiety of multiplied examinations. We are all wrong in our ethics of health. But it is not on one side only that we err. We want the radder of a principle in this matter. And that principle must be the recognition of the body as an instrument entrusted to us by God for the highest purposes. On the one hand we sin if we are content with oiling the instrument and polishing it and bringing it to the highest pitch of beauty without ever applying it to the sacred toil there is in hand. On the other hand, we sin if we apply it to purposes for which our particular instrument clearly was never meant, if we overstrain it, and let it get broken by improper uses. God indicates to each man and woman pretty clearly what duties the body ought to undertake. He or she who transgresses God's command by defect, by excess, or by perversion, sins against the solemn trust of life.

No one could preach this gospel—the real need of our times—with more chastising power against the wilful transgressor or more eloquent persuasiveness for the hesitant and tempted than Miss COBBE. Will she do it? Whether or no, we thank her heartily for this charming and most suggestive volume.

PHASES OF THE FAITH.

While making a brief stay lately in an important county town curiosity led me to pay a visit to four different places of worship, and it has occurred to me that a brief account of what I saw and heard might interest readers of the Inquirer. My first visit was to a Congregational church—a handsome building with a large congregation, a good organ, an efficient choir, and an impressive style of service. The whole thing was got up well, and the congregation consisted largely of the middle and professional classes. Everything indicated prosperity, and the number of young people present promised well for the future. But what drew my attention most was the sermon. The text was Phil. ii. 5, "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." I was not prepared for such a sermon, and I have seldom listened to one with which I was more generally in accord. It was almost entirely in harmony with Unitarian thought. We were told at the outset that

* The Peak in Darien; with some other Inquiries Touching Concerns of the Soul and the Body. By Frances Power Cobbe. London: Williams and Norgate. 1882.

"Christ is Christianity," which implies that Christianity is not any system of doctrine embodied in creeds, articles and confessions of faith. Christ, his life, teaching and character; that is Christianity. From this point the preacher—an able and earnest man of middle age—proceeded to discourse on the mind of Christ, and the sermon was no less remarkable for what it stated than for what it ignored. He spoke of the mind of Christ as characterised:—1st, by one dominant purpose—his devotion to the will of his Heavenly Father; 2nd, by his moral courage in bravely facing danger, persecution and death in fulfilment of his great work; 3rd, by his spiritual insight, and it was explained that Christ's spiritual insight resulted from his obedience to the will of God. Certain passages from the Gospels were quoted in illustration of this point; 4th, an inward harmony which blended all the elements of his nature in perfect accord and gave him perfect calmness and self-possession at all times. While dwelling on this point the preacher forgot what is narrated about Christ's visit to the garden of Gethsemane, when his "soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death, and being in an agony he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." That was not a moment of calm. There are other indications to the same effect in the Gospel narratives. The fifth and last characteristic of the mind of Christ was his love, and in eloquent language the preacher pointed out how this sentiment filled the mind of Christ and inspired his whole being. After this enumeration we were told distinctly that to have the mind of Christ as its leading features even thus indicated, that was salvation, and the preacher powerfully insisted that this was precisely the salvation which the world needed. To be like-minded with Christ, this was the one thing needful for subduing all evil and realising all possible good; and each one might in some measure have that mind by aiming to live with Christ and cherishing his lofty ideal of duty.

Such was the sermon. It omitted all reference to the Trinity, the Godhead of Christ, man's total depravity, and the Atonement. The whole Calvinistic scheme of salvation was conspicuous by its absence. It was the way of salvation without orthodoxy. With very slight alteration in the form of expression more than in the thought, it might have been preached with acceptance in any Unitarian chapel. I regard all this as very significant. It is one of the indications, which are multiplying daily, how completely the old narrow orthodoxy is passing away, and how it is being superseded by a broader, purer, and more rational form of Christian faith. We are reminded how different these times are from those of a generation or two ago, when no sermon was thought worth listening to unless it was well seasoned with the doctrines of the Fall of Man, the Atonement, Supernatural Grace, and Eternal Punishment. Now these doctrines are falling into the background. In their once popular forms we hear less and less of them. Even the personal Deity of Christ is dwelt on less than his true humanity and the graces of character by which that humanity was adorned. The change is towards a rational Christianity—a Christianity more in accord with the higher thought and better knowledge of our time. When I looked round on the large assembly in the Congregational Church, and thought that the preaching there were accustomed to hear was that of which I have endeavoured to give an outline above, I rejoiced, and I accepted heartily the leading thought of the preacher—that to have the mind of Christ is the true salvation.

I have dwelt so long on the foregoing that I must be briefer with my other notices. My next visit was to a Roman Catholic Chapel. The situation of this chapel is not good, and neither the exterior nor the interior is attractive. Indeed, the Roman Catholics are about to build another in a more open and prominent situation. However, there was a numerous congregation, and the devoutness of the worshippers admitted of no question. The music was good and the congregation joined heartily in the singing. An extempore discourse was delivered by a priest whose bold confident tone of address was his chief merit as a preacher. With a little book in his hand he came to the front before the people and announced his text, Matt. xxii. 16: "Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, neither carest thou for any man; for thou regardest not the person of men." From these words he deduced the extraordinary doctrine that Jesus had no human respect! and proceeded to denounce human respect as the main source of the sin and wickedness in the world. It was through human respect we were told that sin came into the world at first, for that was the cause of Adam's fall. He had too much respect for Eve, and so yielded to her temptation to eat the "apple." Other illustrations were given from the Bible, every one being taken in the most strictly literal fashion. Thus it was human respect which led Aaron to make the golden calf in the desert. He paid too much regard to the solicitations of the Israelites. He had respect to their demand, and so he and they were led into idolatry. Examples from the New Testament and from Christian history were added. One great defect of the sermon was this—that no attempt was made to distinguish between a just respect for our fellow men and a timid unworthy deference—between a becoming respect for others and a yielding to them which is altogether mischievous and wrong. The distinction was not once drawn—the line between the two never hinted at. We were to "trample human respect under our feet, as Jesus did, who cared for no man." The Catholic Church, we were told, had never yielded to human respect. It never had made any concession, and never would, to gain any consideration from the world. Coming down to present times, he said it was human respect which kept many from joining the Catholic Church who were in secret sympathy with it. They were afraid of what their friends and relatives would say. On this point the preacher waxed vehement, and denounced all such timidity in unsparing terms. Some Catholics also had too much human respect, and this kept them from coming to confession as often as they ought to, because they would be exposed to the criticism and sneers of others. And so he went on for nearly three quarters of an hour, incessantly repeating the main points of his argument. Some things that he said were enough to shock any rational mind, and I came away with the conviction strengthened that the foundation on which the Catholic Church really rests is the abject, unquestioning credulity of the laity.

I next visited a Baptist chapel. There I saw a congregation not so numerous as the others, but still considerable. The musical part of the service was not equal to that in the Congregational church. The Revised Version was used for the lesson from the New Testament. The text was Matt. iv. 3, 4—the temptation to change stones into bread. It was not above the average of pulpit efforts. The preacher set out with saying that as to the mode or manner of the temptation, how it took place he could say nothing, for the sufficient reason that he knew nothing. On those points his hearers knew as much as he did, and they had the same narrative to study that he had; but this at least appeared clear to him, that it was as man Christ met the tempter, resisted the temptation, and fought man's battle. He did not bring his divine powers to his aid at all, but as man fought the battle with sin and gained the victory over it. I was quite struck with the prominence he gave to the humanity of Christ throughout the sermon. The Godhead of Jesus was kept completely in the background. We were told that by resisting the tempter Jesus did no more than we might do. He shared our nature and was tempted in all points as we are, and the victory gained by him is the same victory which is possible to us. It was needful that he should be tempted, and that he should overcome temptation, in order to become a true saviour and a true example to us. It is obvious what the practical application of all this would be, and the preacher dwelt upon it in the concluding part of his discourse. It seemed to me, however, that he missed one important lesson which the text conveyed—that man cannot live by bread alone—he cannot realise the full life of man by ministering only to the wants of the body—the lower nature. He needs more than this; he needs intellectual food for the mind and spiritual food for the soul; and only by supplying all these varied wants of his nature can the full life of man be attained.

My last visit was paid to the Established Church. On a Sunday evening I found myself in a large and handsome church—a modern building. Here I met the largest congregation of all—the church was filled from end to end. There did not appear to be a seat unoccupied. The service was far advanced when I entered; however, I was in time for the sermon, and more besides. The preacher was a youngish man, with plenty of self-confidence. He read easily from his MS., if genuine manuscript it was. His text was Rev. iii. 20, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," &c. Here there was a stronger flavour of orthodoxy than at the Congregationalist or Baptist chapel. The doctrines of the Church creed were kept more in view. The divinity of Christ was taught or implied throughout. Christ or God—the two terms seemed to be interchangeable—knocked at the door of our hearts by the ministry of the Church, by the order of his natural providence, by the blessings that Providence brought to us, by the trials and sorrows of life, especially by sickness and bereavement, and by the pleadings of the Holy Spirit—by these and such as these God, Christ, the Holy Spirit knock at the door of our hearts. Of ourselves we could not open the door, but grace and help would be given us if we sought it. Our impotence, our hardness of heart, our deafness to the calls of God were dwelt upon at some length; and then the preacher brought his discourse to a close, reserving the latter part of the text for consideration on a future occasion. There was nothing new in this discourse. It went over the old ground, and there was no freshness in presenting the various points considered. On the whole, I heard more liberal thought in the two dissenting chapels than in the Episcopal churches. I heard nothing to shock me, except in the Roman Catholic chapel. My conclusion is that liberal thought is making way chiefly among the Dissenters, and that it is in the Catholic Church only that the old superstitions unflinchingly maintain their ground.

SCARBOROUGH.—An interesting wedding took place at the Unitarian Church on Tuesday morning last, the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., of Gorton, Manchester, formerly the minister at Scarborough, being the bridegroom, and Miss Clara T. Wurtzburg, daughter of Edward Wurtzburg, Esq., of Scarborough, the bride. The church was beautifully decorated for the occasion, the Communion table being covered with white flowers, maiden-hair ferns and palms, tastefully arranged. Other plants were placed on the altar steps, and flowers were distributed in various portions of the building, notably on the pulpit, the effect of the whole harmonising with the already beautiful interior decorations. The service commenced at eleven, but long before that hour a numerous congregation had assembled, and at the commencement of the ceremony the building was crowded to excess. On the arrival of the bridal party an extremely pretty and melodious march, composed expressly for this marriage service by Mr. Palin Saxby, organist of Christ Church, was played by him. The first part of the service having been conducted by the Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., of Oldham, the choir sang the 67th Psalm, and after a short prayer by the minister, the wedding Anthem, "O God, Thou art worthy to be praised." This work, on the whole, was exceedingly well rendered, the power and fine quality of the voices in the choir telling with great effect. After the Anthem a simple but eloquent address was given by the minister to the bride and bridegroom, and following a prayer the "Lord's Prayer" was chanted by the choir unaccompanied. The Benediction closed this part of the service, and whilst the bridal party were in the vestry the marriage hymn "Rest in the Lord" was effectively sung, the music having been specially composed by Mr. Saxby for the occasion. As the bride and bridegroom left the church Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" pealed from the organ, and flowers were strewn before them by some of the children connected with the Sunday-school. During his residency in Scarborough Mr. Agate secured the esteem of all with whom he came in contact, and he and Mrs. Agate carry with them the best wishes of a large number of friends.

Occasional Notes.

MR. SMART, of Kidwelly, South Wales, writes in reference to the first of our "Occasional Notes" last week:—"I remember many years ago seeing somewhere in either Macaulay's or Sydney Smith's writings this famous sermon attributed to Dean Swift, and on account of its audacity the fact of its having ever been preached was much doubted. I think it was also mentioned that Swift took for his text the whole of the seventeenth verse of the nineteenth chapter of Proverbs. Here it is in full. "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will He pay him again." And, if my memory serves me, this was the sermon verbatim. "There, my brethren, is the security which the Lord offers you; examine it, and if you are satisfied with it, down with the dust. Now to God, the Father, &c." I think it is given by Macaulay."

THE following incident recently occurred in a Massachusetts town. While the Orthodox church is being rebuilt, the society worships morning and evening in the Unitarian church, the building being occupied in the afternoon by the Unitarians. A visiting clergyman at the evening service, having called upon the Lord to bless the evening and morning service, added, "And wilt thou bless as much of the afternoon service as thou approvest."

A MAJORITY of the Highland clergy belong to the strictest sect of the Calvinists; and the following illustrates very well the extraordinary strictness with which "the Sabbath" is still observed. A young man, going to church one Sunday with an old gentleman in Skye, ventured to remark, after they had walked some miles in silence, that it was "a beautiful day." "Yes, indeed, young man," answered his companion; "it is a very beautiful day; but is this a day to be talking about days?"

A PARTY of Belgian architects, sculptors, painters, archæologists, and ecclesiastics, members of the Guild of St. Thomas and St. Luke, whose object is to promote the study of Christian art, have come over to England on a fortnight's tour, with the intention of visiting the principal ecclesiastical cities. They arrived in Canterbury, and spent several hours in the cathedral, the Dean and the Bishop of Dover acting as cicerones. The party numbers nearly eighty, and includes Professor Reusens, of Louvain, Canon Delbigne, of Brussels, M. Van Henkelom, President of St. Bernulphus Guild, Utrecht, M. Jules Helvig, of Liège, and M. Blanchaert, of Ghaut. The other places to be visited by the travellers are Rochester, London, Winchester, and Oxford.

IN the course of a sermon preached on Sunday evening in the Derby Chapel of the Cathedral at Manchester, upon St. John xiii. 7—"What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter," the Rev. R. H. Cotton, formerly of Owens College, and some years ago Unitarian minister at Padiham, made the following reference to the late Professor W. S. Jevons:—"While trying to follow out this thought, let me give you the words of one to whom I am, under God, indebted for more than I can tell you of the little faith I have, and the memory of whose modest life and thoughtful teaching has been sadly, rudely quickened by the news received to-day. 'The hypothesis that there is a Creator at once all powerful and all benevolent is pressed, as it must seem to every candid investigator, with difficulties verging closely upon logical contradiction. The existence of the smallest amount of pain and evil would seem to show that He is either not perfectly benevolent, or not all-powerful. No one has lived long without experiencing sorrowful events of which the significance is inexplicable. But if we cannot succeed in avoiding contradictions in our notions of elementary geometry, can we expect that the ultimate purposes of existence shall present themselves to us with perfect clearness? I can see nothing to forbid the notion that in a higher state of intelligence much that is now obscure may become clear. We perpetually find ourselves in the position of finite minds, attempting infinite problems, and can we be sure that where we see contradiction an infinite intelligence might not discover perfect logical harmony?' William Stanley Jevons perhaps little thought when he wrote these words that in his own sad departure we who mourn his loss should have had to experience one of those too 'sorrowful events' of which, as he says, the significance must be, as far as we can see, 'inexplicable.' It may be that some in this church may hardly be prepared to give much heed to the thoughts of such as he. But, as for ourselves, let his own earnest words lead us on to that 'higher state of intelligence'—higher perchance than that which he was at the moment contemplating—in which much that is now obscure to ourselves shall become clear as the noonday light; and in which those great ideas of the 'infinite intelligence,' and 'the more perfect harmony' shall be fully and completely realised. 'What I do,' says the Master, 'thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.' Let us believe Him, at any rate, and for 'that highest, most perfect state of intelligence,' let us all be looking in humble faith, that when 'that which is perfect' shall have come, that which is 'in part' shall be done away. There, after all, is the ultimate solution for us of all the problems. Now, indeed, we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now we know in part, but then shall we know even as also we are known."

THE Athlone Franciscan church is possessed of an image of the Virgin Mary which has got something the matter with its eyes, lips, and arms. At any rate, different individuals have declared that they have seen them move. The church has consequently been thronged with hundreds of deaf, dumb, blind, and lame persons, and cures are said to have been effected. Curiously enough, these phenomena do not take place in broad daylight. The priests keep the statue veiled during the day, removing the veil only in the evening.

THE discomfort arising from sea-sickness is as much felt by philosophers as by persons of less intellectual powers. We regret to learn that Mr. Herbert Spencer, who arrived at New York last week, was ill nearly all the voyage, and suffered greatly from sleeplessness. The day of his arrival was spent on the couch, and he left the city in the afternoon for the country, seeing but few people in New York. We understand that he intends to stay in the States for three months, and if the climate improves his health he may prolong his stay.

LAST week a member of the Salvation Army was sent by the Hanley magistrates to an industrial school for five years for picking pockets and stealing 12s., and her mother, another member, was sent to gaol for three months for receiving the same. At the Clerkenwell Police Court another member pleaded guilty to stealing a watch from his captain, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, at the end of which time he is to be apprehended for stealing a cash-box in 1871. These are ugly facts in connection with the army.

MR. C. H. JAMES, M.P. for Merthyr-Tydfil, late President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, writing to one of his constituents, says:—"I think Mr. Bradlaugh a very ill-used person. I have always voted for his admission into the House, and in the interests of liberty, which I consider imperilled in his person, I shall continue to do so."

THE compiler of college news for the New York World computes that the number of honorary doctorates of law, divinity, and philosophy granted yearly by American colleges and universities is about three hundred. These represent 75 different colleges, of which 63 have given the doctorate of divinity to 115 clergymen, while 43 have bestowed the doctorate of laws upon 71 persons of whom, perhaps, half are lawyers, and 14 have conferred the doctorate of philosophy upon 20 teachers. The last degree is now being given chiefly on examination. The D.D.'s are pretty plentiful among the chief denominations. In the Congregational body in Massachusetts there is one in eight; among the Presbyterians the proportion is about the same—610 out of 5,086 ministers; the Episcopalians 545, or 1 in 6½. The larger and more popular Baptist and Methodist denominations do not despise this honour, at least, since their colleges have become numerous; but among them the proportion of those who have received the scholastic recognition is certainly very much smaller—perhaps one in twenty.

ON Sunday last the Rev. Stopford W. W. Brooke (Oxon), son of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, preached his first sermons to large and deeply-interested congregations in the Brixton Unitarian Church. Bedford Chapel and Stamford-street Chapel being closed, many friends were present from those places of worship. In the morning the Rev. Jeffery Worthington conducted the liturgical service, Mr. Brooke reading the Lessons. In the evening the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie also assisted by reading a portion of the prayers. We understand that Mr. Brooke will conduct the morning services at Wandsworth on the two next Sundays.

THE Spectator endeavours to find a resemblance between Mr. Green's case and that of Daniel, and maintains that with the change of a word or two, here and there, the narratives of the two offences are identical. "Now, when Daniel knew that the writing was signed [that the Public Worship Regulation Act had received the Royal Assent], he went into his chamber [church], and, his windows being open in his chamber towards Jerusalem [eastward position], he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime [made no change in his manner of performing divine service]." It does not require a very high order of intelligence to discern the fallacy of comparing the two cases. Daniel had never undertaken to obey the law relating to the religion of the country in which he found himself, as did Mr. Green. The "church" does not belong to Mr. Green, but is that of the nation by law established. Daniel was forbidden to do certain acts, wholly apart from any question of his being a member of any particular Church. Mr. Green is as free as the air to pray three or any number of times a day, and to turn to whatever point of the compass he may prefer, so long as he does not do so as a priest of a religion by law established, contrary to that law. But the Spectator's logic on this sort of subject has never been its strong point.

IF the example set in France be widely followed, schoolmasters and teachers will find that they will have to take into consideration the wishes of their pupils far more than they have been in the habit of doing. This is an age not only of freedom but of conferences and congresses; what wonder, then, that that long-suffering class—the schoolboy—should follow the lead given by their superiors, and emancipating themselves from their thralldom, should seek to set forth their wants and views in the same way they have learned from their elders? There has just been held at Bordeaux, under the patronage of M. Victor Hugo, a congress which at present stands unique. The meeting was composed of delegates from several schools and colleges, its purport being to discuss grievances and the best methods for their redress. There were two sittings, which lasted from ten A.M. to midnight, with only an hour's interval for what, in schoolboy phraseology here, would be called "grub," and during this time several resolutions were passed almost unanimously. Among these there was one making the teaching of Latin and Greek optional; another to the effect that the school libraries should be enlarged and opened for the use of day scholars as well as of boarders; another that higher education should be provided free of cost for such students as could pass a satisfactory education. These, however, one feels are of minor importance compared with others, affecting what most of us recollect to be the real interests of school boys. The unfairness of a master being judge, jury, and prosecutor in his own cause, the improvement of fare, and consequent condemnation of "resurrection pie," the sacred and inviolate character of a weekly holiday, naturally came up for consideration, and strong resolutions were passed on these subjects. The patronage extended to the congress by M. Hugo called for

Reviews.

The Hibbert Lectures, 1882. National Religions and Universal Religions. By A. Kuenen, D.D. Professor of Theology at Leiden. Williams and Norgate, 1882.

The Hibbert Trustees maintained that "international character" which is one of the striking features of the Lectures when they invited Dr. Kuenen, Professor of Theology at Leiden, to fill the chair which Renan entitled "A Chair of the Comparative History of Religion." In so doing they enabled us to see the "face o' fire with labour" of a scholar well-known to English theologians by his admirable application of the critical method to the religious history of Israel. We are glad that the friendly reception we gave to him made him "feel quite at home in the foreign country, both in London and at Oxford."

The title of Professor Kuenen's Lectures is "National Religions and Universal Religions." Although this is a classification which would be accepted in the abstract by all students, yet it is obvious that national religions differ too widely from each other to be included in one group. Nevertheless, we may say that a national religion is in every case "confined to a single people, or to a group of nearly related peoples." All religions are at first national, but some have the power of spreading beyond the limits of the nation and embracing other nations, and so becoming international. A religion, however, may be international and yet not establish its claim to genuine universality. What, then, is the criterion of universality? A religion may be universal in two ways. Its universality may signify either a fact or a quality. Islam, for instance, is a great international religion. By the outward test of fact Islam's claim to be a universal religion cannot be questioned; but whether it possesses the higher attribute of universality as a quality, and shows a natural fitness for the moral requirements of mankind, is one of the debated questions among the students of the Science of Religion. The criterion of universality lies in the quality of the religion, that it shall have the power to "combine with every nationality, satisfying the special needs of each, and yet must not be inseparately bound to any one nation. 'Born of the nation and rising above it,' must not this be the formula of that which is destined for all nations?" Therefore the claim of a religion to true universalism must be judged by an appeal to its history among the nations. The historical problem to be solved is—"The connection between the universal and the national religions as furnishing the explanation and the measure of their universalism;" and the method of solution lies in examining the so-called universal religion in connection with the national, from which it has sprung, for every religion is the lawful heir of its own past. The full treatment of this subject is a large one, and Professor Kuenen wisely limits himself to the connection between Christianity and the national religion of Israel. He only touches on Islam and Buddhism in so far as they shed light on the origin of Christianity; for he regards them as universal only in fact and not in quality. The task he sets himself is to show that—

"Judaism was something more than one of the many forms of religion exclusively destined and adapted to one single people. . . and that its promise of something broader and more exalted was fulfilled, or, in other words, that there grew out of Judaism a world-religion—Christianity."

We propose to lay before our readers a brief outline of the method by which he arrives at the conclusion with which all are familiar who have read the author's works on the Hebrew Prophets and "The Religion of Israel."

The antecedents of Judaism, with the motives and character of the spiritual conflict in Israel, which preceded the rise of Christianity, can only be understood when we have determined the preliminary question—Was the worship of Yahweh amongst the pre-exilic Israelites national? Professor Kuenen's answer shows that from the earliest period down to the Babylonian Captivity Yahwism was the national religion, and was interwoven with the ordinary life of the Israelite. The historians, indeed, give the impression that Israel continually deserts and forsakes Yahweh, but this is due to taking as their standard of worship the Mosaic Law. Tried by this the popular religion was far indeed from deserving the name of Yahwism. But we must not join with the Israelite historians in their condemnation of the popular religion before the exile. The usages of the popular worship may not have been of a high order, but "all sincere religion is true religion," and without it, such as it was, Israel would have been poorer—"poorer in the wealth that uplifts, consoles, and strengthens." Attached to the popular worship were the priests of Yahweh. Often as the priest may have fallen short of the ideal of his calling, yet the ideal remained before his eyes, and with it the ethical character of Yahweh, which differentiated Israel's God from the gods of the nations who from time to time were worshipped at his side. In addition to the priests were the "Prophets of Yahweh," who constituted for many successive centuries a special social order, and were the "organ-extraordinary" of Yahweh. In them "prophecy reached its full dimensions and bore its ripened fruit," and they all endorse the fundamental conception of the popular religion, that "Yahweh is Israel's God, and Israel is Yahweh's people."

But if the worship of Yahweh was the popular religion, whence came that divergence, almost amounting to hostility, between the prophets and the people? It came from their different conception of Yahweh. The people trusted in the might of Yahweh, the prophets in His holiness. Yahweh is the Holy One, and the true prophet is the preacher of righteousness. As the representative of the strict moral demands of Yahweh, the prophets raised the conception of God into a higher sphere. Monotheism was the gradual result of this conception, for Yahweh as the only God sprang out of the ethical conception of His being. This antagonistic position of prophet and people is aptly illustrated by the effects of the Assyrian invasion. King Ahaz placed a new altar in the temple, modelled after one that he had seen when visiting the Assyrian king, and Manasseh made the temple into a sort of Pantheon, and both kings "consecrated their sons (to the Deity) by fire." These acts point to the popular feeling that there were other gods of power besides Yahweh who needed to be propitiated. But the victories of Assur did not shake the ethical faith of the prophets, who saw in the power of Bel or Mero-dach an instrument in the hands of Yahweh to chastise the sins of Israel; and so to the eye of their spirit was gradually revealed the august idea of the moral government of the world.

It is this purer and more exalted conception of God which influences the ideas of the prophets as to the future relation between Yahweh and the other nations of the world, until they proclaim the universalism of His sway. The Second-Isaiah, for instance, sees Him adored by some of the remotest peoples. "Turn unto me and be saved, all ye ends of the earth, for I and no other am God! . . . Before me every knee shall bow, and by me shall every tongue swear," and Malachi declares the universalism as already accomplished. "From the rising of the sun to its setting my name is great among the heathen, and in all places is incense offered to my name and a pure sacrifice, for my name is great among the heathen." Under the influence of the prophets the leaven of universalism leavens the whole people, and when they were dispersed from their fatherland a severance took place between their religion and their nationality, so that a deeply religious man might be but a lukewarm patriot. And on the other hand, the influence of the religious ideas of the countries to which they were scattered tended to intensify this universalism by showing the power of adaptation latent in Judaism, for Judaism becomes "one thing in the Greek world, another in Babylonia, and yet another at Rome."

This power of self-adaptation in Judaism makes us pause when we seek to trace in it the antecedents of Christianity. Where are we to make our search? In Hellenism, in Palestinian Judaism, or in both? Professor Kuenen's treatment of this question is most interesting. He shows that Hellenism did not "contribute to the rise or the foundation of Christianity, for there is no trace of it in the first three Gospels, wherein the teaching of the Founder of Christianity is presented in its most original form."

recognition, and a resolution was duly passed including his works among the French classics. It appears, too, that a newspaper has been started to advocate the "rights of youth," and accordingly a resolution pledging the Congress to further its interests, and especially "to increase its circulation among parents," found its place among the proceedings. It cannot be said that the Congress wasted its time, nor that there was an absence of practicality in its proceedings; but if this kind of thing spreads, those of us who are parents may find ourselves holding to our young folk a very different position to what we do now. Any exercise of parental authority will call forth the vigorous denunciation of the editor of the "Rights of Youth," and—but we do not like to dwell on the awful prospect. All that we can do is to watch the movement carefully, so as to be prepared for it, should it make its appearance in this country. Perhaps, by that time, we may be in a position to recommend a course of united action on the part of parents and teachers, which at present we think it prudent to withhold.

MR. S. F. GREEN, who has been such a thorn in the sides of the Bishop of Manchester and the Archbishop of York, is no longer a benefited clergyman of the Church of England. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act, where a defendant continues to be contumacious after a period of three years, he is deprived of his benefice. But he cannot be let out of prison, because he is there for contempt of Court, unless his prosecutors apply for his release, or he purges his contempt by promising not to act as he has hitherto done. We have never felt any sort of sympathy with this gentleman, but have regarded his posing as a martyr as savouring more of obstinacy than of principle. Fanny Kemble, in her memoirs, tells us that she once greatly edified Mr. Combe by declaring that if, by behaving well under torture, she could have vexed her tormentors very much, and if she might have had plenty of people to see how well she behaved, she thought she could have managed it; to which Combe replied, "Oh, well now, Fanny, ye've just got the very spirit of a martyr in you." If that be the true story of martyrdom the palm may be awarded to Mr. Green. At the same time, we think that the prosecutors would be well advised to apply for his release.

THE Library Association, whose proceedings have resulted in so valuable a collection of papers on the subject of bibliography, and particularly on the economy of large libraries, will hold their annual meeting this year in the hall of King's College, Cambridge, under the presidency of Mr. Henry Bradshaw, the well-known librarian of the University. The proceedings commence on Tuesday next, and will extend over four days. Besides the usual routine of business there will be numerous papers read and discussions held on topics connected with the objects of the Association. Mr. Richard Garnett will, on the occasion, read a paper on the printing of the British Museum catalogue. On the last day Mr. Nicholson, Bodley's librarian, Oxford, will move a resolution that the Association is in favour of the general principle of opening public libraries, museums, and art galleries for some part, at least, of every Sunday. The programme includes arrangements for visiting particular libraries and other institutions; and a small exhibition has been organised, with a view to illustrate the history of the art of bookbinding.

At the recent examination for clerkships in the General Post Office there were 1,500 female candidates.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk sold only in packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO. Homeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Neither did Essenism, for the difference between it and Christianity is one of principle, and therefore agreement in details is of secondary importance. We must seek for it in the Palestinian Judaism as a whole; and especially in Pharisaism, which was "an attempt—so thoroughly earnest as to claim our profound respect—to realise the principle of Judaism itself, viz., complete obedience to the will of God expressed in the Thorah." It was the aim of their schools to simplify religion and to strike some deeper ground of principle, as when Hillel described the religion of the Jews to be the formula, "What thou wouldst not have done to thee, do not that to others. This is the whole law, all the rest is but interpretation." This is not surprising:—

"For amongst the scribes there were men gifted with deep piety of heart and with warm emotions; men of imagination and talent; in a word, successors of the prophets, an echo of whose preaching, we can hardly doubt, sounded sometimes in the ears of their hearers."

And yet the essence and enduring characteristic of their work was a rigid legalism, which proves its insufficiency, so that:—

"Whenever they extol the inward disposition as the highest, or even as the one thing needful, they remind us of a captive bird pecking at the wires of its cage, or, if you will, raising its song as though it were soaring freely in its own element. . . . The spiritual and emotional elements in the teaching of the scribes were little more than its helpless protest against its own essential character. . . . There is no real correlation between the dispositions and emotions which they rouse, and on which they desire to rest, and the practical goal to which they direct their efforts."

But Palestinian Judaism could not escape the influence of the "overmastering power of the heathen world." This is seen first in the Messianic idea, that is, in the conviction that the subjection of God's people to the heathen was an anomaly that could not last, but must end in a total revolution and a universal dominion. And, secondly, in the amazing dimensions which Proselytism had assumed, which shows that Judaism was not without consciousness of its own broader destiny, and was extending its borders in many directions. But even then the legal obligation of circumcision arose, and with it the question between national and universal religion. This was the test to which Pharisaism was brought. Tried by this test it was found wanting, for were the prophetic dreams of universalism, were the powers of adaptation which Judaism had already shown in foreign countries, were the treasures of piety and morality which laid stored within it to be sacrificed to rigid legalism and to Pharisaism? Assuredly not! Internationalism had become an historical necessity. Thus has Professor Kuenen traced through its course the ascent of Judaism towards an international religion:—

"The problem is now set, and that in such definite terms as to bring the solution as close as possible. One thing only is wanting, and that is the solution itself. The elements lie mingled one with another, and the 'Let there be light' must still be spoken. . . . For as we have seen that prophecy was the moving power of development, and that at the turning-points of this age-long process of evolution stood the prophet, so it seems to lie in the nature of the case, that in the transition from the national to the universal the chief part is reserved for the prophet; what Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the 'Great Unknown' had begun, it was reserved for Him to finish. 'To me,' he says, 'the rise of Christianity would be an insoluble riddle were I to set aside Him who for eighteen centuries has taken rank as its founder, . . . and yet what Jesus founded can only be called a new creation in a very improper sense of the word.'"

In view of the distinction between Universalism as a fact and as a quality, our author has "no hesitation in pronouncing Christianity the most universal of religions; and that because it is the best qualified for its moral task to inspire and consecrate the personal and the national life." And it is in this universalism of Christianity that he sees the "sheet-anchor of all our hopes for the future." J. N. H.

Mind, a Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy. April and July, 1882. Williams and Norgate.

By far the most important papers in these two numbers are contributed by the late Professor Green, and form the second and third instalments of his answer to the question, "Can there be a Natural Science of Man?" The profound and widespread regret for the early death of this acute metaphysician and noble philanthropist is in a small measure lightened by the knowledge that he has not departed from us without leaving some matured fruit of his philosophical genius. It is consoling to read in a note appended by Mr. A. C. Bradley to the last of the three published articles, that:—

"These papers form the opening portions of a work on which Professor Green had been engaged for some years before his unlooked-for death, in March. The book was to be entitled 'Prolegomena to Ethics.' The part hitherto printed amounts, perhaps, to a fifth of the whole, and only about twenty pages remained to be written. The manuscript was entrusted to me, and I hope it may be published by the end of this year."

From this work, to which we eagerly look forward, taken in conjunction with the introduction to Hume's philosophical writings, and the articles in the Contemporary Review on Mr. Herbert Spencer and Mr. G. H. Lewes, we shall doubtless be enabled to realise the main features of Professor Green's matured views on the most momentous philosophical questions; and though we do not think that these views will afford a wholly satisfactory philosophical basis for the positive doctrines of Christian Theism, they will certainly form a mighty and, as we believe, an impregnable bulwark against that miscellaneous horde of assailants who, equipped with weapons now drawn from the philosophical armoury of David Hume and his recent followers, and now again from that pretentious mixture of true science and baseless speculation called Evolution, are vehemently seeking, and for another generation or two will probably continue to seek, to overthrow all religious belief, and to convert all places of worship into theatres for scientific discourses or æsthetic attractions.

The articles by Mr. Green which appear in the last three numbers of Mind furnish particularly a most opportune and formidable protest against the attempts, at present so numerous and popular, to explain the evolution of all the endowments of human nature from the merely sentient condition of the lower animals. That physiological science may possibly make out the descent of man's bodily organism from the anthropoid apes Mr. Green does not dispute, but his contention is that in man, as an intelligent and moral being, there are essential elements which cannot possibly be accounted for as developments out of merely sentient antecedents. As there is no doubt that many adventurous Evolutionists will essay to prove that all that is characteristic of humanity is found in the lower stages of the animal kingdom, we think it not unreasonable to place somewhat at length before our readers the well weighed opinions on this subject of the profound and honest thinker whose untimely decease is so great a loss both to science and philosophy. After explaining that the knowledge of the changing phenomena of nature implies the existence and activity of a mind which is itself persistent, and no mere phenomenal series of changing states, Mr. Green proceeds to explain that:—

"This conclusion can in no wise be affected by any discovery or (legitimately) by any speculation, in regard either to the relation between the human organism and other forms of animal structure, or to the development of human intelligence and the connection of its lower stages with the higher stages of the intelligence of brutes. Having admitted that certain processes in time are organic in man to that consciousness exercised in knowledge which we hold to be eternal, we have no interest in abridging these processes. If there are reasons for holding that man, in respect of his animal nature, is descended from 'mere' animals—animals in whom the functions of life and sense were not organic to the eternal or distinctively human consciousness—this does not affect our conclusion in regard to the consciousness of which, as he now is, man is the subject; a conclusion founded on analysis of what he now is and does. This conclusion could only be shaken by showing either that a consciousness of the kind which, for reasons already set forth, we describe as eternal, is not involved on knowledge, or that such a consciousness can in some intelligible way be developed out of those successions of feeling which can properly be treated as functions of the animal system; and this must mean that it has some element of identity with them. That countless generations should have passed during which a transmitted organism was progressively modified by reaction on its surroundings, by struggle for existence, or otherwise, till its functions became such that an eternal consciousness could realise or reproduce itself through them—this might add to the wonder with which the consideration of what we do, and are, must always fill us, but it could not alter the results of that consideration. If such be discovered to be the case, the discovery cannot affect the analysis of knowledge—of what is implied in there being a world to be known and in our knowing it,—on which we found our theory of the action of a free or self-conditioned, or eternal mind in man. Till some flaw can be shown in the doctrine previously urged, we must hold that there is an absolute difference between change and the intelligent consciousness or knowledge of change, which precludes us from tracing any development of the one into the other, if development implies any identity of principle between the germ and the developed outcome. When we speak of a development of higher from lower forms of intelligence there should be no mistake about what we mean, and what we do not mean. We mean the development of an intelligence which, in the lowest form from which the higher can properly be said to be developed, is already a consciousness of change, and therefore cannot be developed out of any succession of changes in the sensibility, contingent upon reactions of the 'psychoplasma' or nervous system, however that system may have been modified by accumulated effects of its reactions in the past. To deny categorically on this account that the distinctive intelligence of man—his intelligence as knowing—can be developed from that of 'lower animals' would indeed be more than we should be warranted in doing. We have much surer ground for saying what, in respect to our knowledge, we are than for saying what the animals are not. The analysis of what we do and have done in knowledge, which entitles us to certain conclusions as to what we must be in order to do it, is inapplicable to beings with whom we cannot communicate. If the animals have a consciousness corresponding to that which we exercise in knowledge, at any rate we cannot enter into it. Their actions, as observed from the outside, would seem to be explicable without it—explicable as resulting from the determination of action by feeling, and that of feeling by feeling, in other words, as resulting from successive changes of the sensibility, without any need for ascribing to them any consciousness of change, any synthesis of the modifications they experience as belonging to an inter-related world. We are thus warranted in saying that we have no evidence of the presence in 'brutes' of such an intelligence as that which forms the basis of our knowledge; and that, if it is absent, there can, properly speaking, have been no development of our mind from such a mind as theirs. But this hypothetical negation is quite compatible with the admission that there may have been a progressive development, through hereditary transmission, of the animal system which has become organic to the distinctive intelligence of man; that the particular modes of successive feeling upon which a unifying intelligence supervenes in man, rendering them for him into a related world, may be the result of a past experience on the part of beings in whom such intelligence had not yet supervened, and who were in that sense not human; and that certain modifications of the sensibility, arising from this pre-human history, may have been the condition, according to some unascertained law, of that superintention of intelligence in man."

If the doctrine here expounded rests, as we believe it does, on foundations which no criticism can undermine, it evidently sets a necessary limit to all scientific theories as to the origin of man; for while it leaves one portion of human nature accessible to physiological and psychological research, it at the same time requires the admission that man in his characteristic cognitive and moral faculties is raised above nature, and that consequently his origin, his moral responsibility and his future destiny must be explained not by his relation to the changing phenomena of nature, but by his deeper affinity with the Eternal, in whom all phenomena have their ground and their explanation; who is the adequate cause of phenomenal succession, because He is himself no phenomenon, and because in relation to his essential being Time and Change have no meaning. In thus maintaining that there is an ontological, or eternal, as well as a phenomenal side to human nature, and that it is the latter only that is accessible to the natural sciences, Mr. Green is only re-asserting in the full light of recent knowledge the same antithesis which the world's most esteemed philosophers have always more or less explicitly declared. It is because our too engrossing devotion to the study of nature has, at present, led to a neglect of this antithesis, and therefore to an imperfect and one-sided view of humanity, that our recent speculations seem so hostile to religious beliefs. And we venture to think that if the contributors to Mind carefully weigh Mr. Green's profound words they will be less inclined to assume that the thorough study of science and philosophy necessarily means the repudiation of theology. We are constantly being told in the pages of that journal, as, for instance, in the April number by Dr. Burns-Gibson in his notice of Harper's "Metaphysics of the School," that the study of consciousness reveals no entity called self, but only sequent and concomitant phenomena. If such writers penetrate to the true sense of Mr. Green's account of the necessary conditions of knowledge they will hardly continue to maintain that "sequent and concomitant phenomena" can have any cognizance either of themselves or of anything else. And when Mr. Alfred Benn at the close of his able and interesting paper in the same number, on "The Relation of Greek Philosophy to Modern Thought," asserts that "modern philosophy is slowly disengaging itself from the compromising alliance with religion," he seems to us to misrepresent the actual fact; for while a numerous body of savans and philosophers have broken away from all theology, there is also a considerable and, as we think, increasing number of most competent thinkers who hold with Professor Green that true philosophy inevitably leads up to Theology, and that the essential bases of theistic belief are not only not impaired, but are disclosed in greater distinctness by recent physical and psychological researches.

The sensational idealism set forth in the writings of J. S. Mill and Professor Bain, which seemed twenty years ago to be assuming a dominant position in English thought, has during the past decade rapidly declined in influence. In these two numbers of Mind there are not only the two papers by Professor Green, which show how utterly incompetent this form of idealism is to account for the fact of knowledge, but there are also two able articles on "Causation and its Organic Conditions," by Dr. Edmund Montgomery, who from the physiological point of view strenuously advocates a realistic conception of the external world. He appears to hold an agnostic view of the causes of our perceptions, but gives reasons for not accepting Mr. Spencer's doctrine of Transfigured Realism. His own view he describes as the Philosophy of Organisation, and thus compares it with the Kantian doctrine:—

"Kant called his system Transcendental Idealism, placing the powers and their efficient operations within the mental sphere. He gave in contradistinction the name of Transcendental Realism to that philosophical system which hypostatizes things in themselves as efficient causes of things in perception. The view of reality here explained may likewise be called Transcendental Realism, but with the understanding that under the causative things in themselves are to be reckoned nothing actually mental, but only all inferred powers, as far as they are capable of affecting the organic individual, together with all such inferred powers as constitute the organism itself."

In saying that things-in-themselves, or the powers that cause our perceptions are not "actually mental," Dr. Montgomery does not mean to assert that they may not possibly partake of the nature of mind; but only that as they are never apprehended in our states of consciousness, they never become parts of our actual mental furniture.

Other articles worth noting in the April number are a very brilliant critique of Hegel's fundamental principles, by Professor W. James, and the concluding portion of Mr. Alfred Benn's valuable essay on "The Relation of Greek Philosophy to Modern Thought;" and in the July number an able and interesting paper, by Mr. James Sully, on "Versality." Mr. Sully is of opinion that our school and college systems, and our apparatus of examinations, are adapted to two classes of learner—the clever specialist, and what he terms the dull indifferentist. "Eminence in a narrow range of knowledge, and a comparatively humble position in a wide diversified region, seem to have been the two goals pursued." Mr. Sully accordingly inquires whether more elasticity might not be introduced into the examination system, whereby the peculiar qualities of the versatile mind might be cultivated.

"Examinations like those of the Civil Service, by allowing candidates to determine the area of their studies, and by rewarding multifarious distinction, do, no doubt, tend to promote intellectual many-sidedness. What is wanted besides is a mode of testing the range of general and extra scientific information, and readiness of mind to master new subjects and to take up new points of view. Perhaps the art of examination may some day prove itself equal to dealing with the subject."

Among the numerous and useful critical notices which are contained in these two numbers we have been most interested in Dr. Shadworth Hodgson's notice of Hinton's "Philosophy and Religion," and Mr. Carveth Read's account of Von Hartmann's treatise on "The Religious Consciousness." C. B. U.

The Magazines.

Fraser's Magazine gives up a large portion of its space to the powerful story of yachting adventure on the Ocean, entitled "The Lady Maid." Karl Blind concludes his interesting "Personal Recollections about Garibaldi," and it need only be added that the remaining articles are "Race and Life on English Soil," an instructive address on the varieties, vitality and future of the races in this island; "The Cock," a pleasant account of one of the most interesting relics of Old London, the inn in Fleet-street which is disappearing before the new Law Courts; "Better Away," a characteristic sketch by "A. K. H. B.," "Historical Cookery," an archaeological paper, by Mrs. Henry Reeve, on one of the fine arts which comes home to the hearts—and stomachs of all of us; and "A Venetian Medley," a light and graceful paper which has its own commendation in the well-known signature "J. A. Symonds." Altogether an exceptionally good number.

The Sunday Magazine, under the heading "Our Principal Contributors," gives a pleasing portrait of Sarah Doudney, who has contributed to its pages several well-written tales, among them "What's in a Name?" some chapters of which appear in the present number. There are also stories, or instalments of stories, by George Macdonald. "Weighed and Wanting," and "King Roy," a story for the young, by L. T. Meade. Mrs. C. Garnett gives a true story of "Billy Bray, the King's Son," a poor old Cornish miner, so-called, who was famous for building little Methodist chapels. Under the quaint title "Leaves, Leaves, Nothing but Leaves," Mr. W. C. Proctor contributes a pleasing and edifying paper. Mr. J. Ewing Ritchie pleads, in his usual graphic way, for the "Industrial Home for Crippled Boys" at Kensington. "Munkacsy's Christ before Pilate" is described to the life by the author of "Raphael's Cartoons." The Rev. J. G. Wood contributes one of his pleasant Natural History sketches, "Homes Under the Sea," and there are the usual always attractive "Sunday Evenings with the Children."

Good Words has continuation of the two serials, "Kept in the Dark," by Anthony Trollope, and "The Golden Shaft," by Charles Gibbon." Mr. J. G. Bertram describes "The Scotch Herring Fishery," with illustrations, and under the curious heading "Treacle and Lamp Posts" Theodore Wood gives an account of the evening work of a young naturalist in catching moths. Among the other articles are "Christian Socialists—I," a sketch of Lamennais, by the Rev. M. Kaufmann; "Léon Lhermitte," an interesting account of the well-known French artist, by R. Walker; "Autumn Leaves," by F. G. Heath; "In and Out the Dales," a lovely picture of Derbyshire scenery, by Francis Francis; an account of "Correspondence Classes" for the higher education of women, by Miss J. S. McArthur; and "Work and Over Work," a useful warning against a prevailing danger, by Dr. Fothergill.

The Journal of the National Indian Association contains an interesting article on "English Indifference Towards India," by Arabella Shore, a daughter, we believe, of Lord Teignmouth; the second part of "An Explanatory View of Indian Customs," by J. N. Mitia, of the Indian Medical Service; a continuation of the tale illustrative of family life in India, entitled "The Spoilt Boy," by Tekchand Thakur; and an article on "High Education in India," by A. Ramkrishna. Besides these there are reviews, reports, and interesting items of intelligence respecting Indians in England and elsewhere.

The Magazine of Art has for its frontispiece an engraving of "Teucer," the fine bronze statue in the Academy this year, by Hamo Thornycroft, A.R.A. Mr. Austin Dobson gives an account of "The Normanston Hogarth," with an engraving of the famous picture of "The Graham Family." There is also a fine engraving of Emile Hébert's fine bronze statue of Rabelais, recently erected at Chinon. Mr. W. W. Fenn gives a pleasant biographical account of "R. Ansdell, A.R.A." with portrait and engravings of two of his popular works. Among the other articles, all with excellent illustrations, are "After the Herring," by Aaron Watson; "Art in the Garden," by Barclay Day; and "Current Art," with illustrations from the Academy and Grosvenor of this year. The popular writer Mr. Richard Jefferies has a very interesting paper entitled "New Facts in Landscapes," the object of which is to show the mistake in art of omitting the modern aspects in country scenes, the landscapes thereby lacking the force of truth and reality.

Cassell's Family Magazine, besides two serial tales, has two shorter complete illustrated stories, and light and sketchy papers on such attractive subjects as "Soups for Hot Weather," "Gardening in September," "At Home with a Dutch Family," "How to Paint on Glass," "Girl-Life at Home," "A Quaint Corner of Old England," a pleasant sketch of the scenery of Romney Marsh; "The Tricycle: a Means of Obtaining Health and Enjoyment," by a Family Doctor; "Wild Flowers for Home Decoration," and "The Ways of the Ant," a familiar sketch in Natural History, by R. Brown, F.L.S. In the interesting department entitled "The Family Parliament," the old question, "Ought Trial by Jury to be Abolished," is debated with the usual arguments.

We have also received from Messrs. Cassell:—The Bible Educator, edited by Dean Plumptre, Part VI., completing the first volume.

The New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXX.

The Family Physician, Part XXXII.

The Illustrated Universal History, Part XII., completing the first volume; and Arabian Nights, Part I. of a new illustrated edition of this favourite book, the illustrations in which, some of them by G. Doré, seem to have caught a good deal of the genius of Oriental life. The text is based on the admirable version of M. Galland, and notes are given illustrative of Eastern customs.

Literary Notes.

An Index will shortly appear to the first five years of the Revue Historique.

MR. PARKMAN'S work upon the Jesuits in North America during the seventeenth century has been translated into French by the Countess de Clermont-Tonnerre.

We have already made mention of the Gilchrist Lectures to be delivered next winter; we can now add the following details. The so-called English Courses will be held at Leicester, Lincoln, Chesterfield, York, Doncaster, Reading, and Banbury, in alternate weeks, commencing on January 8, 1883, and concluding before Easter. They are as follows:—The Evolution of the Solar System, by Mr. R. A. Proctor, F.R.A.S. An Hour with the Modern Microscope, by the Rev. W. H. Dallinger, F.R.S. The Dynamo-Electric Machine and its Uses, by Mr. W. Lant Carpenter, B.Sc. Energies within the Earth: (1) Mountain-making, (2) Volcanoes and their Causes; or, The Great Fossil Mammals and Birds and their Teaching, and Evidence of the Antiquity of Man, by Dr. Martin Duncan, F.R.S. The Voyage of the Challenger: (1) Physical Conditions of the Deep Sea, (2) Animal Life of the Deep Sea, by Dr. William B. Carpenter, C.B., F.R.S.—The Lancashire Courses are to be held at Burnley, Bolton, Bacup, Bury, and Stockport, commencing October 4, and continued every night save Saturdays and Sundays:—Lectures I. and II.: Principles of Electric Lighting and of the Electrical Transmission of Power, by W. Lant Carpenter, B.Sc. III. The Sun, by Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S. IV. Beginnings of Animal Life: the Jelly Specks that form Chalk and Limestones, by Professor W. C. Williamson, F.R.S. V. Beginnings of Vegetable Life, with especial reference to Fermentation and Disease Germs, by the Rev. W. H. Dallinger, F.R.S. VI. Beginnings of Animal Life: Infusory Animals, by the Rev. W. H. THE Athenæum is informed that M. Maspera, before he left Cairo, found several hundred of Coptic MSS., which had been walled in since Woide's time. Unfortunately they are not Sahidee, and are therefore of no great value for the New Testament text.

MR. MORGAN, we learn from the Nation, is now engaged in preparing a new edition of his "Sketches of Celebrated Canadians and Persons connected with Canada." He has also in hand a "Bibliotheca Canadensis; or, Manual of Canadian Literature."

THE Critic announces that a translation of Machiavelli's historical, political, and diplomatic writings, by Mr. Charles E. Detmold, will be published this autumn by Messrs. Osgood, of Boston. No complete translation of Machiavelli's correspondence on his many diplomatic missions has before appeared in English.

THE English Dialect Society have undertaken to print Mr. H. Percy Alsoop's glossary of public-school words and phrases, and also (in conjunction with the Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature, and Art) the list of Devonshire plant-names compiled by the Rev. Hilderic Friend.

In order, apparently, to avoid an unseemly competition after their death, the poets Whittier and Wendell Holmes are both reported to have made arrangements that their biographies shall be undertaken by Mr. F. H. Underwood.

A NEW Royal Commission is gazetted on Historical Manuscripts. It is authorised to secure the co-operation of all possessors of manuscripts and papers, giving them full assurance that no information is sought except such as relates to public affairs, and that no knowledge or information which may be obtained from their collections shall be promulgated without their full license and consent.

THE second volume of Dr. Ginsburg's work on Massorah, finishing the text, is complete. As an appendix to this second volume Dr. Ginsburg has reprinted the entire Massorah, both Magna and Finalis, as it is given in the first edition of Jacob ben Chayim's Rabbinic Bible, Venice, 1524-5, thus furnishing the Biblical student with a clue to the extant printed Massorah. This appendix is also intended to enable students to decipher the Massorah in the various manuscripts of the Bible. The second volume contains upwards of 800 pages. The third volume, which contains the English translation and explanation of the two volumes of text, is already in the printer's hands.

ACCORDING to the Academy, Messrs. Stoddart and Co., publishers, of Philadelphia, are bringing out an important work, entitled "The American Supplement to the Encyclopedia Britannica," consisting of original articles by American and European writers, bringing all the most important subjects down to the point of the latest information. Professor Robert Ellis Thompson, Ph.D., is acting as editor in chief, with a competent staff.

M. NEMIROVICH-DANCHENKO, it is said, will shortly publish a volume containing personal reminiscences of the late General D. M. Skobelev. During the campaign of 1877-78 he was attached to General Skobelev's division as correspondent of a Russian newspaper, and formed very intimate relations with him. The book will contain a number of characteristic anecdotes of the deceased General.

MISSIONARIES IN INDIA.

The Singapore correspondent of the Times gives some interesting information respecting the character and work of missionaries in India and China. He describes them as follows:—

Having never taken into their minds any adequate conception of the depth and the height and the exceeding breadth of Christianity, they, with some exceptions, have merely become saturated with the special and artificial forms of their respective schools, concerning which all that can be said is that the vital principle of Christianity is no doubt hidden away somewhere. These various conventionalised systems, fitting so easily into the ways of Western society, seem to us who have grown up in the midst of them as part of the natural order of things. The mysteries of the Incarnation, the Trinity, and the Atonement, "familiar in our mouths as household words," present to our minds nothing startling or hard of belief, particularly if we have never given an honest thought to the subject at all. Does it, therefore, follow that these are the shapes in which to present Christianity to men who have grown up in a wholly different intellectual and religious atmosphere? The new-fledged missionary, with no experience of mankind except that derived from the seminary of his sect, presents all he knows or can comprehend of Christianity in the form of a thorny paradox; indeed, the greater the paradox, the more the system shocks common sense, the greater, it is often maintained, is the evidence of its Divine authorship!

Thinking they are invading a country as soldiers of the Cross, attacking the strongholds of Satan (misapplied Biblical rhetoric is unwholesome food for babes), these young missionaries go forth conquering and to conquer, denouncing the beliefs, the traditions, the worship of the people, calling on them to curse all that they have ever held sacred, and to accept, on pain of eternal perdition, the peculiar arrangement of belief which the missionary has compounded for them, and of which Christianity is one, but not always a very perceptible, ingredient. And so the poor heathen, hungering, however unconsciously, for the bread of life, is offered instead the Shibboleths of a very Babel of sects. Is it surprising that this method of propagandism fails? Does it deserve to succeed? Nay, would its success be altogether desirable?

The excellence of the Hindu and Buddhist religions, which between them sway half the human race, forms a stumbling-block in the way of the ordinary missionary, but is full of hope and promise to the enlightened few who realise the idea that God has made of one blood all the families of men. These latter begin to admit—to themselves, for they dare not, perhaps, let their catholicity be known to their societies—that there are good features even in those systems opprobriously called "heathen." The united prayers of all sects of Indians for the recovery of the Prince of Wales ten years ago was probably the means of opening the eyes of more than one of our missionaries to the truth that "we are all His offspring." We seem still, however, a good way from the platform of the true apostle who, if he were addressing Hindus or Buddhists, would teach them out of their own scriptures and would probably tell them—"Whom ye ignorantly worship Him declare I unto you." When the time does come for pure Christianity, purged of its Romanism and its anti-Romanism alike, unsectarian, all-embracing, as it was in its origin, devoted to loving deeds and claiming only such from its adherents, the millions of India and China will perhaps be found ready enough to embrace it without any bait, either educational or eleemosynary. Of course there are some, perhaps even a considerable number, whose views of life are really elevated by their Christianity, but it is a fact worthy of all attention that the really devout Indians who have, under the influence of Christian teaching, cast off Hindoism, have preferred to create a new and, as they say, purer religion for themselves rather than accept Christianity in the form in which it is presented to them by the missionaries.

ISLAM.

The Spectator, describing the secret of the power of Islam, writes:—

It abolishes caste and all social and hereditary distinctions. Within the polity of Islam all Moslems are equal; but in relation to the rest of mankind they are an aristocratic brotherhood. It is easy to understand the fascination of such a creed for the oppressed and down-trodden everywhere. And nowhere could this fascination have been so attractive as in India, where the teeming population was divided into castes, separated from each other by impassable gulfs. On all these castes the Moslem looked down with contempt. Being all outside the pale of Islam, they were all in his eyes equally degraded. The high-caste Brahmin and the low-caste Pariah were on a level outside Islam, and became equal inside it. The high-caste Brahmin had thus, perhaps, no very great inducement to become a Moslem; but the low-caste Hindoo had the strongest inducements that can appeal to human nature. The ragged beggar of yesterday became, by the initiatory rite of Islam, the social equal of the Great Mogul, and socially entitled, if qualified on other grounds, to claim the hand of his daughter in marriage. No wonder the converts to Islam, in a world where the masses were degraded and oppressed, were numerous, even without the argument of the sword. All the same, however, Islam bears within its bosom the germ of inevitable decay. This is, of course, obvious, whenever it rules over a non-Mussulman population. It cannot possibly govern that population justly. It cannot give it equality before the law. It cannot mix with it. It cannot assimilate it, or be itself assimilated. There is a wall of eternal separation between the two populations. A Mussulman Government ruling over a non-Mussulman population is thus always of necessity in the cruel dilemma described by Livy—"it can neither endure its vices nor their remedies." It is obliged, by an unchangeable constitution, to refuse the simple necessities of political life, and its choice lies between atrophy and a violent death. And even where the population is all Mussulman, Islam must decline, when it ceases to advance by the sword. It is bound for ever to remain at the level of enlightenment occupied by a Bedouin chief of the seventh century. Mahomed's ignorance and prejudices, and, we must add, his vices, are stereotyped for ever as the highest tide-mark which Moslem civilisation, depending on itself, can reach. It cannot accept Western education and civilisation, for their acceptance would be fatal, as every Moslem feels, to Islam. Language is the instrument of education, and the Moslem world, when seeking what we call learning, is religiously restricted to two sacred tongues, Arabic and Persian. Individual exceptions do not touch the general argument. Polygamy, also, and unlimited divorce and slavery are gangrenes which are an essential part of Islam, and continuously corrupt each class as it rises to wealth and power. Freedom of thought and toleration, too, are absolutely forbidden by the Sacred law, and an impassable barrier is thus interposed between Mahomedanism and modern civilisation.

JEWISH FLEXIBILITY.

The Jewish Chronicle writes:—

The Jewish race is as distinguished for its flexibility of emotion as for its plasticity of intellect. Each is a necessary condition of the other; without readiness of interest there can be no quickness of comprehension, without quick understanding there can be no ready play of sympathy. The trait is, indeed, one common to all Semites; the Arabs were and are very emotional. We may even trace in the fact a certain measure of the quality due to physical characteristics of the Semites. They seem for the most part to be of small frame and highly nervous, both of which qualities seem to go along with a nature prone to enthusiasm, as we may see in the analogous instance of the Celtic race.

This original tendency has been immensely intensified by the history of the Jews. They have for the most part lived a life of continual peril for the last two thousand years. Holding at each moment their life in their hands, their nervous temperament must have become more and more ingrained. They have travelled about, and nothing is more likely to develop wide sympathies. Their long martyrdom testifies to their enthusiasm for the ideal, an enthusiasm which argues a high-strung nature. The scorn of their fellow men has doubtless had its share in increasing their sensitiveness. And the city life to which they have for the most part been confined is proverbially more stimulating than a bucolic existence.

Perhaps more than anything we owe to this flexibility of our nature the decided Jewish joyousness and capacity to bear trouble. No nation except the Japanese can vie with us in general cheerfulness of disposition. The connection of the two qualities is obvious. A nature that can change its moods easily can more easily bear sorrow than one which broods on its troubles. A less mobile character than the Jewish would probably have been crushed and certainly embittered by the centuries of persecution that Jews have passed through. Yet it is undoubtedly most characteristic of the Jews to be bright and gay. Jewish family life is more attractive on this account, and this prevents that seeking for amusement outside the family circle which is the quickest dissolvent of family love. It is likewise due to this fact that servants who have lived a long time with Jews are "spoiled" for any other service. In a wider sphere this joyousness led to an optimistic view of things in general which was the Jewish trait that had incited the ire of Schopenhauer, the father of modern pessimism and the hidden source of much of modern Judenfresserei. Wagner's opposition to "Judaism in music" is due to his pessimistic manner and to the more peaceful and happy strains which emanate from Jewish musicians.

While, however, pliability of emotion induces joyousness and ability to cast off care it may tend to destroy the capacity for ruth and to dull somewhat the edge of conscience. The ascetic view of sin is more an Aryan than a Semitic trait, and has given the artistic production of Aryan genius that deeper intensity of noble sorrow which gives to Danté and Shakespeare their unique position in the literature of the world. Generally speaking, this brightness has somewhat detracted from the dignity which would otherwise have attached to the Jewish character as the result of such noble fortitude in an ideal cause.

RELIGIOUS RADICALISM IN SWITZERLAND.
Dr. de Pressensé, in a letter to the Christian World, writes:—

The theological crisis which is agitating and dividing Protestants in France is becoming, as your readers are probably aware, still more acute in Switzerland. We watch its progress, therefore, with very keen interest. The session of the Swiss Pastoral Society, which has just been held at Liestal, in the Canton of Bâle, has been of special interest this year, from the character of the subjects discussed. As it was my privilege to be present at the meetings, I am able to speak from my own knowledge of what transpired. These sessions furnish the best possible means of arriving at a true idea of the state of Protestantism in Switzerland, especially in German Switzerland. The clergy of this district are remarkable for the absence of all clericalism in their appearance and address, and for the manliness and cordiality of their whole deportment. I could but admire the frankness and high tone of the discussions, the high standard of theological culture maintained, and the admirable blending of piety and patriotism in all that was said. Love for their country was expressed not only in the speeches, but in the hymns sung with so much spirit, and with that full harmony which to my mind makes a choir of men's voices one of the grandest forms of musical expression. Nevertheless, the Church of these districts is in a lamentably low state, weakened by hopeless divisions. The system of union of Church and State here reaches its reductio ad absurdum, and yet it is maintained with much demonstration, to the great peril of souls. The democratic, or rather radical system, is hurrying things on to a violent crisis. The Church is falling more and more under the control of the electors. All guarantees of religious opinion are being swept away by the strong current of universal suffrage, which interprets literally the adage, "Vox populi vox Dei." Thus, one synod elected by this general suffrage has not only authorised, but enjoined the omission in public worship of the reading of the Apostles' Creed. At Bâle, where religious radicalism is gaining more and more power, a proposal to make baptism optional as the rite of admission to the Church will, in all probability, be accepted by the Synod. At the same time, the so-called Reformed party is pressing its daring negations to the utmost limit. Truly, if things continue as they are going, we shall come to say with astonishment as the witty journalist said of Pius IX., "Truly this pastor believes in God—I mean, a living and personal God." The Evangelical party is painfully alive to the situation; it feels that things cannot go on as they are; hence it is rapidly abandoning the principle, so long cherished by it, of the union of Church and State. There is every indication that a great rupture is at hand. The representatives of both parties met in the pastoral Session at Liestal, but all were conscious of the pressure of the boding religious and ecclesiastical crisis.

SOME MODERN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.

In a volume of sketches written by Mark Twain, recently published, there is a story told of a captain, who had his own ideas of interpreting the Bible narrative, which is intended no doubt as a good humoured satire on some better informed Biblical critics:—

One trip the captain had a clergyman on board, but did not know he was a clergyman, since the passenger list did not betray the fact. He took a great liking to this Rev. Mr. Peters, and talked with him a great deal; told him yarns, gave him toothsome scraps of personal history, and wove a glittering streak of profanity through his garrulous fabric that was refreshing to a spirit weary of the dull neutralities of undecorated speech. One day the captain said, "Peters, do you ever read the Bible?"

"Well, yes."

"I judge it ain't often, by the way you say it. Now you tackle it in dead earnest once, and you'll find it'll pay. Don't you get discouraged, but hang right on. First you won't understand it; but by-and-by things will begin to clear up, and then you wouldn't lay it down to eat."

"Yes, I have heard that said."

"And it's so too. There ain't a book that begins with it. It lays over'em all, Peters. There's some pretty tough things in it—there ain't any getting around that—but you stick to them and think them out, and when once you get on the inside everything's plain as day."

"The miracles, too, captain?"

"Yes, sir! the miracles, too. Everyone of them. Now there's that business with the prophets of Baal; like enough that stumped you?"

"Well I don't know but—"

"Own up, now; it stumped you. Well, I don't wonder. You hadn't had any experience in raveling such things out, and naturally it was too many for you. Would you like to have me explain that thing to you, and show you how to get at the meat of these matters?"

"Indeed I would, captain, if you don't mind."

Then the captain proceeded as follows:—"I'll do it with pleasure. First, you see, I read and read, and thought and thought, till I got to understand what sort of people they were in the old Bible times, and then after that it was all clear and easy. Now, this was the way I put it up, concerning Isaac* and the prophets of Baal. There was some mighty sharp men amongst the public characters of that old ancient day, and Isaac was one of them. Isaac had his failings—plenty of them, too; it ain't for me to agologise for Isaac; he played it on the prophets of Baal, and like enough he was justifiable, considering the odds that was against him. No, all I say is, twan't any miracle, and that I'll show you so'st' you can see it yourself. Well, times had been getting rougher and rougher for prophets—that is, prophets of Isaac's denomination. There was four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal in the community, and only one Presbyterian; that is, if Isaac was a Presbyterian, which I reckon he was, but it don't say. Naturally, the prophets of Baal took all the trade. Isaac was pretty low-spirited, I reckon, but he was a good deal of a man, and no doubt he went a prophesying around, letting on to be doing a land-office business, but 'twan't any use; he couldn't run any opposition to amount to anything. By-and-by things got desperate with him; he sets his head to work and thinks it all out, and then what does he do? Why, he begins to throw out hints that the other parties are this and that and 'tother nothing very definite, maybe, but just kind of undermining their reputation in a quiet way. This made talk, of course, and finally got to the king. The king asked Isaac what he meant by his talk. Says Isaac, 'Oh, nothing particular; only, can they pray down fire from heaven on an altar? It ain't much, maybe, your majesty, only can they do it? That's the idea.' So the king was a good deal disturbed, and he went to the prophets of Baal, and they said, pretty airy, that if he had an altar ready, they were ready; and they intimated he'd better get it insured too."

"So next morning all the children of Israel and their parents and the other people gathered themselves together. Well, here was that great crowd of prophets of Baal packed together on one side, and Isaac walking up and down all alone on the other, putting up his job. When time was called, Isaac let on to be comfortable and indifferent; told the other team to take the first innings. So they went at it, the whole four hundred and fifty, praying around the altar, very hopeful, and doing their level best. They played an hour—two hours—three hours—and so on, plumb till noon. It wa'n't any use; they hadn't took a trick. Of course they felt kind of ashamed before all those people, and well they might. Now what would a magnanimous man do? Keep still, wouldn't he? Of course. What did Isaac do? He graveled the prophets of Baal every way he could think of. Says he, 'you don't speak up loud enough, your God's asleep like enough, or may be he's taking a walk; you want to holler, you know'—or words to that effect; I don't recollect the exact language. Mind, I don't apologise for Isaac; he had his faults."

"Well, the prophets of Baal prayed along the best they knew how all the afternoon, and never raised a spark. At last, about sundown, they were all tuckered out, and they owned up and quit."

"What does Isaac do now? He steps up and says to some friends of his there, 'Four barrels of water on the altar!' Everybody was astonished; for the other side had prayed at it dry, you know, and got it whitewashed. They poured it on. Says he, 'Heave on four more barrels.' Then he says, 'Heave on four more.' Twelve barrels, you see, altogether. The water ran all over the altar, and all down the sides, and filled up a trench around it that would hold a couple of hogsheds, 'measures,' it says; I reckon it means about a hogsheds. Some of the people were going to put on their things and go, for they allowed he was crazy. They didn't know Isaac knelt down and began to pray; he strung along, and strung along, about the heathen in distant lands, and about the sister churches, and about the state and the country at large, and about those that's in authority in the government, and all the usual programme, you know, till everybody had got tired, and gone to thinking about something else, and then, all of sudden, when nobody was noticing, he outs with a match and rakes it on the under side of his leg, and jiff! up the whole things blazes like a house afire! Twelve barrels of water? Petroleum, sir, petroleum! that's what it was!"

"Petroleum, captain?"

"Yes, sir; the country was full of it. Isaac knew all about that. You read the Bible. Don't you worry about the tough places. They ain't tough when you come to think them out and throw light on them. There ain't a thing in the Bible but what is true; all you want is to go prayer-fully to work and cipher out 'how' 'twas done."

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.—This annual Congress, which is to be held at Derby in the first week in October, commencing on Tuesday, October 3, and terminating on the following Friday, will be opened by morning services at the churches of All Saints' and Saint Alkamund's, the preacher in the former being the Archbishop of York and at the latter the Bishop of Truro. The meetings will take place at the Drill Hall, Wardwick, and the sectional meetings in the adjacent Temperance Hall, Curzon-street. The President, the Bishop of Lichfield, will deliver his presidential address in the Drill Hall on Tuesday afternoon, and immediately after the Dean of Wells will introduce, in a paper, the first subject in the programme, viz.:—"Unity of Belief in Relation to Diversities of Thought," on which papers will also be read by the Rev. Canon Furse and the Rev. R. B. Girdlestone, the Rev. Randall T. Davidson and the Rev. Philip Brooks, D.D., being the appointed speakers. Among the topics fixed for consideration during the sittings are "Evangelistic Work at Home," to be introduced by the Bishop of Liverpool; "The Church of Modern Thought," to be introduced by the Dean of Manchester; "Political Relations of the Church," to be introduced by Earl Nelson; "The Church and other Communion," to be introduced by the Earl of Lincoln; and "Synodical Action," to be introduced by the Rev. W. W. English. On Friday evening there will be a conversazione, and a working men's meeting will be held in the course of the week. Miss Ellice Hopkins has arranged to deliver two addresses on the subject of "The Degradation of Women," one to women only, and the other to the clergy.

The publication of a curious collection of the London signs of booksellers, publishers, and printers up to the end of the seventeenth century will be commenced in the September number of the Bibliographer.

Correspondence.

"A LOYAL CHURCHWOMAN."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As I read the review in this week's Inquirer of the Rev. Fletcher Williams's lectures on the Deity of Christ I was prompted to give utterance to some thoughts which often trouble me. I am a loyal Churchwoman, but for many years have been associated by ties of affection and friendship with Unitarians, and I am not ashamed to confess that I entirely owe to them what liberality of spirit I now possess. My husband, whose memory is still fresh with those among whom he lived and laboured, was a staunch Unitarian, yet did he never fail to sympathise with my religious aspirations, and was always willing for me to contribute to any object that I had at heart in connection with the Church of England. Thus I have been led by his example and that of others to admit, I am thankful to say (though, I must confess, slowly), that there might be, nay, there is, much in these same Unitarians whom the Orthodox despise, which members of my own too self-satisfied Church would do well to emulate. When I think of the useful and devoted life my husband led, irrespective of creed, it grieves me to find how utterly the nature of the Unitarian faith is not only not understood, but unknown. On this subject most of our clergy manifest a scarcely excusable ignorance, as it was expressed to me only a few weeks ago by a certain rector in these words: "I do not know much about Unitarians, but I suppose they do not believe in Christ." Many battles I fight for your body, and I invariably tell your detractors that their views arise simply from their ignorance.

Naturally I am considered to be very far gone in heresy, but I am content with the better part I have chosen. Instead of marriage with a Unitarian being a blot upon my life, as was predicted to me, it has proved a blessing, and I will express a hope that if Mr. Williams, by his pamphlet, can prevail on the good Manx people to listen, that they may have grace given them to "hear also with the understanding."

It may not be that Orthodox people will change their own views, nor, except as to one or two points in the doctrines of the Church of England (on which we need not now enter), do I desire them to do so. But there are many such who would be amazed to know how much there is in common between them. I have often astonished some of my liberal self-called Christian friends, who heard with incredulous ears, that the beautiful hymn "In the Cross of Christ I glory" was written by a Unitarian, and I could tell them that my husband when asked what his creed really was would reply, quoting from 1st Tim. ii. 5: "I believe in One God the Father, and One Mediator Jesus Christ." I look for a happy time to come, when the Church of England may in a truly catholic spirit make good her claim to the name of Christian, by extending it to others who as fully deserve it. I must apologise for so far trespassing on your valuable space and courtesy, and beg you and your readers to excuse all apparent egoism in this letter.

A LOYAL CHURCHWOMAN.

THE LATE PROFESSOR JEVONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Under all the circumstances perhaps I may be excused for asking you to publish a few words from me in reference to the late Professor Jevons. I was one, I suppose, of a great number of young men whom the Professor honoured with his helpful friendship, and when I came to settle in Ireland Mr. Jevons wrote to me in the following terms: "My interest in Ireland is rapidly increasing, and when I had a rapid run of a week through some parts I resolved to come again. I think when you have had time to become thoroughly acquainted with your part of the country I should much like to spend a few days with you, and see the state of things with my own eyes. My impression is increasing to the effect that landlordism is a terrible burden on the country, and that the just laws of England are rather a myth." According to his request I constantly kept him informed with reference to the Irish question, especially that portion of it relating to the land. His engagements, however, and the state of his health prevented him from coming to Ireland; he required bracing up a good deal, he said, and he was afraid the climate here would be too relaxing for him in the summer months. Consequently his design of studying the Irish question on the spot, and then "coming to some clear conclusion about it," had to be postponed, and now, unhappily, his "clear conclusion," which would have been so enormously helpful to Ireland as well as to England, is never to be announced.

Permit me now to refer particularly to two letters which I received from the Professor. Writing to me in November, 1881, Mr. Jevons said he regretted that he must differ very considerably from my recent course of conduct, and added that, much as he had formerly sympathised with the Land League, all his sympathies were estranged as soon as they (the League) began to work against the new Land Act. The Professor went on at some length to say that that measure was the greatest concession that could be made, though he admitted that other reforms were needed. These would follow in due time, but they would not be hastened by the intense ingratitude to Mr. Gladstone shown by those who ought to have been his truest followers. The letter concluded with the observation: "I am quite unable to understand how you can be found to be amongst his opponents."

I felt this letter to be a "caning," and I replied to it. I pointed out that the League did not propose to work against the Act; that the test cases which it proposed to submit to the Court were, so far as my knowledge went, and I had had some hand in preparing those from Ulster, fair and honest cases; that the League in recommending the tenants to abstain from applying to the Courts until these cases had been adjudicated upon adopted a wise course, since supposing the reduction in these cases to be substantial, the League would doubtless recommend the people to make terms with the landlords upon the basis of these decisions—a course provided for by the Act itself, and a course which her Majesty's ministers publicly said they hoped the people would adopt; that Mr. Gladstone in denouncing these test cases as he did, before they were adjudicated upon, not only provided all England with an adverse opinion upon them, but in saying that the Courts would scout these cases actually was guilty of instructing the Courts what to do; that in point of fact the policy of the League was, in the circumstances of the country, a wise policy in my judgment, since the Courts would stand in need of pressure from the country to counteract the adverse pressure of the landlord party; and that finally, much as I lamented the disapproval of Professor Jevons, I was compelled by simple honest convictions to take the course I did. This letter was published in the leading commercial weekly journal of London, accompanied by some editorial comments. Writing to Mr. Jevons again, after an interval, to acknowledge his kindness in sending me a copy of his latest work, I referred to these comments, and in reply, the Professor, after dealing with some other matters, to wit, Mr. Davitt's proposals and Mr. Henry George's works, went on to speak thus boldly:—

"The remarks in the — on your letter were not written by me. Having shown your letter to the editor, in the course of discussion, he wished to print it as a text, and I saw no reason to refuse. Being an economist and not a politician I hardly like to venture upon the wide and stormy field of the Irish Question. There can, however, be little doubt that the progress of events tends to justify your position more than it was formerly easy to foresee. I never, indeed, believed in Forster's Coercion policy, which struck at the wrong parties, and was calculated rather to irritate than suppress or amend what was wrong. I may also add that though I was formerly of the opposite opinion, both the course of events and the course of my studies has tended to suggest grave doubts as to whether the whole tendency of English agrarian law, policy and practice is not radically wrong. In England the immense wealth and social power of the landowners has disguised the question, but it has broken out in Ireland, and it will break out sooner or later elsewhere. I have quite satisfied myself that whatever may be the economic results, the social and political results of an opposite agrarian policy are infinitely superior to what we experience. Some day I may perhaps try to write out these opinions and support them, but it is too heavy a subject to venture upon in a hurry."

It will be easy to understand that this letter, written on the 2nd of July of this year, was exceedingly gratifying to me. I felt that I was entitled to regard it as at least, to some extent, a withdrawal of the rebuke contained in the former communication, and it gave me reason to hope that some day, when the heat of the controversy has passed away, and certain injudicious expressions attributed to me, some, at all events, erroneously (to wit, that about "making it hot" for Lord Cavendish), are forgotten or condoned, many more friends, whose alienation has been to me most painful, would come to think that even your humble servant was not so black as he has been painted.

"AGNOSTIC SERVICES."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me just a word of personal explanation, made necessary by a surprising imputation in Mr. Dalby's last letter? Let me, then, assure Mr. Dalby that when I expressed a hope that Unitarians would be more prompt and zealous in maintaining the positive grounds of their faith I had not the remotest thought of counselling a resort to "legal proceedings." I was thinking not of courts of law, but of the moral force of earnest religious conviction in our own congregations. Nevertheless, it must be a case of conscience for Agnostics whether they can acquit themselves of wrong when chapels, declared by the trust-deeds to be erected for the worship of God, are used by them for the very purpose of ignoring His existence and deprecating His worship.

MAIDSTONE.—On Sunday last, August 27th, the Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by the minister, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., before large and appreciative audiences. The chapel was tastefully decorated with flowers supplied by the teachers, and choice plants kindly lent by Mrs. George Ruck. There was a good attendance of scholars, who, under the leadership of an excellent choir, sang special hymns, one of which had been composed for the occasion by Mr. Richard J. Nicholson, External Scholar of Manchester New College. An anthem was also beautifully sung by the choir at the close of each service. The school is now in a very flourishing condition, there having been of late a large accession both of teachers and scholars. At the last examination in connection with the Manchester District Sunday School Association thirty-four of the scholars passed, of whom twelve were placed in the "Honours Division." Also the following young people connected with the school were successful at the "Manchester New College Local Theological Examination" last May:—Branch IV. "The Doctrine of a Future Life," Francis James Brothers, Mary Emily Brothers, Arthur Hickmott, William Mann, and Edith Mary Tillet. Branch V. "The Text of the Greek Testament," Richard T. Nicholson. The same month, Mr. Nicholson, who was then "head boy" and Lubbock scholar at the Maidstone Grammar School, obtained one of the Manchester New College External Scholarships and the Gunsley Exhibition at University College, Oxford. Eight young people have also obtained certificates this year from the South Kensington Science and Art Department.

THE MORAVIANS.—The Moravian Brothers have been celebrating in the little German town of Herrnhut the 120th anniversary of the sending forth of missionaries from among their body to spread a knowledge of the Gospel among the negro slaves. It was in 1732, ten years after the foundation of Herrnhut, that the first mission set out for the West Indies. Since that period it is stated that upwards of 2,000 of the Brethren have founded Christian communities, numbering at present more than 76,000 souls.

THERE is a talk of putting up a monument to Longfellow in Westminster Abbey.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual meetings of this Association were held on Sunday and Monday last at Newport, Isle of Wight.

On Sunday morning the Rev. Dr. Crosskey, F.G.S., preached from Romans ix. 26 on some of the great revelations made by Science to the modern world. First, Science reveals the ever-present activity of the living God, his never-ceasing action in the universe. Secondly, Science reveals harmony among all created things, and a third revelation of Science is the law of progress. In the evening the same gentleman preached from Revelation xxii. 3 on some of the oppressive superstitions from which Science has set us free. Both these admirable sermons were delivered in a very impressive manner, and were listened to with profound interest by large congregations, comprising several strangers as well as friends from neighbouring congregations. The collections for the Association amounted to £7 13s. 8d.

On Monday there was a luncheon in the commodious and handsome school-room lately erected, which was well attended by members of the Association and their friends, all of whom were invited guests of the Newport Congregation. After luncheon the annual business meeting of the Association was held, Mr. R. PINNOCK, J.P., president, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. Dr. Crosskey, T. L. Marshall, H. Hawkes (Portsmouth), E. Rattenbury Hodges (Newport), J. W. Smith (Ringwood), G. Wooller (London), D. Amos (Scarborough), Mrs. Eveleigh (Shide), Professor Henry Morley (Carisbrooke), Messrs. T. Chatfield Clarke, J.P. (Wootton), W. Hughes (Widcombe), C. Ellis, J.P. (Maidstone), G. W. Rayner Wood (Manchester), H. Blessley (Portsmouth), W. Carter and J. Hutchings (Bournemouth), C. E. Edmunds, Howard Clarke, and many others.

The toast of the Queen having been duly honoured, the PRESIDENT gave a cordial welcome to the deputation from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to which Mr. MARSHALL replied. Mr. T. CHATFIELD CLARKE gave welcome to the ministers of the district, which was responded to in appropriate speeches by the Revs. H. HAWKES and J. W. SMITH.

After a brief interval the annual report of the society was read by Mr. H. BLESSLEY, secretary, and is subjoined in full. The PRESIDENT, on behalf of the treasurer, Mr. Haddon, who was unavoidably absent, read the financial report, which showed that the balance in hand amounted to £14 7s. 6d., out of which the meeting voted £5 to the rising Bournemouth congregation.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports, expressed his regret that three important congregations of the district were without ministers, and drew attention to the fact that the Book Society was originally called "The Society for the Promotion of Virtue by the Distribution of Tracts," because at that time it was illegal to form a society for the diffusion of Unitarianism. A brief discussion was raised by the Chairman in reference to a bequest of £100 by the late Mr. James Silver for the dissemination of Unitarianism, and the matter was referred to the committee.

Mr. T. C. CLARKE moved, and Mr. BLESSLEY seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Pinnock for so ably presiding over the meeting, and proposed his re-election for another year, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. T. C. Clarke was elected vice-president, and Mr. Carter treasurer, a vote of thanks being awarded to the outgoing treasurer, Mr. Haddon.

Votes of thanks were also carried to the Rev. D. Amos, who had acted as secretary until his removal to Scarborough, and to Mr. Blessley, who had taken his place, and the latter gentleman was cordially re-elected secretary. Thanks to the committee and to the Newport congregation for their liberality in entertaining the meeting were cordially passed, and acknowledged by Mr. PINNOCK on behalf of the congregation.

The evening meeting, which was not quite so numerously attended, was also presided over by the President. Interesting and able addresses were delivered by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL on "Liberal Christianity, its Aims and Hopes"; Professor MORLEY on "Literature, its High Mission and Purpose"; Dr. CROSSKEY on "Science and Religion, their True Relations"; Mr. T. CHATFIELD CLARKE on "The Need of urging the Claims of Christianity on the People"; and the Revs. D. Amos and E. RATTENBURY HODGES on "Our Social Life."

A vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. H. BLESSLEY, and seconded by Mr. W. CARTER, brought the very interesting proceedings to a close.

COMMITTEES' REPORT, 1882.

The Committee Meetings have been well attended throughout the year, and an earnest desire has been evinced by all to make the most of the small resources of the Association.

The President and Secretary attended the National Conference at Liverpool, in April last, as delegates of your Association, and report with pride and satisfaction the privilege they felt it to be present at those remarkable meetings, the largest, in point of numbers, ever known in connection with the Unitarian body, and from the enthusiasm pervading, the high tone and devotional character of the meetings from first to last, your committee rejoice to believe that the Conference of 1882 will prove an important epoch in the history of the English Unitarian Churches.

CHICHESTER.—Letters have been received by the Secretary of this Association from several gentlemen in Chichester expressing a hope that something may be done by way of re-opening Baffin-lane Chapel, and starting afresh a liberal movement in religion in the city. Again, the British and Foreign Association have cordially co-operated with this Southern Association, and the committee hope that within the next few weeks steps may be taken to re-commence Unitarian work in that ancient and interesting locality.

WAREHAM.—Your committee forwarded in October last a resolution earnestly requesting the executive of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to take into their early consideration the endowments and chapel buildings now closed at Wareham; and that they should take strong and active measures, if necessary, to secure the endowments, the accumulated fund, and the chapel building for those religious purposes for which they were originally intended to be used. Notwithstanding the difficult and delicate work necessary to bring about a better state of things at Wareham, your committee still hope that a way out of the present condition of stagnation which prevails in that neighbourhood will by-and-by be found.

RINGWOOD.—In these days of startling and sensational appeals to various orders of intelligence, by means of Salvation Armies on the one hand, and Ritualism on the other, it is no slight achievement to hold our own in a place like Ringwood, and this we can fairly claim to do. The average attendance keeps up, and in proportion to the population, would compare favourably with that in some larger places; the Sunday-school flourishes; the various institutions in connection with the chapel are in a healthy state; and during the year the side windows have been entirely renewed. At the commencement of the services at Bournemouth our minister, the Rev. J. W. Smith, rendered assistance to our friends there by conducting the service on two occasions, his place at Ringwood being supplied by lay agency. Mr. Smith also attended the recent Conference at Liverpool, as delegate from the congregation. During the past year the old chapel has afforded opportunities of Unitarian worship to friends from a distance, who have come to reside temporarily in the district, and would, but for the existence of our chapel, have been without a spiritual home. Thus a practical illustration is supplied of the importance of maintaining our smaller congregations so long as they show any signs of life.

NEWPORT, ISLE OF WIGHT.—Our position is much the same as last year. The Rev. E. Rattenbury Hodges continues with us as our minister. In December last the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, of London, opened our new school building. On this undertaking there remains a debt of £100, which we hope shortly to be in a position to pay off.

BOURNEMOUTH.—After the course of lectures delivered in the Bijou Hall, under the auspices of the Southern Unitarian Association, it was decided by the few resident Unitarians to make an effort to establish regular Sunday services in Bournemouth. Our first service was held on the 8th of January, in the Board-room of the Town Hall. The attendance on that occasion was not very encouraging, and we were advised to give up the attempt; but we decided to give the movement a fair chance of success, and with the kind assistance of the Revs. F. T. Reed, of Poole, and J. W. Smith, of Ringwood, the services were continued till the middle of February, when we were fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. Alfred Hood. As the number attending the services in February were larger than those of January, and those of March still larger, it was thought advisable to commence an evening service in April. Accordingly, the Rev. H. Ierson, M.A., paid a visit to Bournemouth on the first Sunday of that month, and took the services both morning and evening. Since then the evening service has been continued with very fair success, many strangers in the evening congregation coming over and over again; some of them have since become members of our Church. The average attendance was, at morning services in January 18, including friends who kindly came from Poole to assist in the singing; in February, 22; in March, 27, and at morning and evening services in April, 45; in May, 48; in June, 54; in July, 55; in August, 70. It must be mentioned, however, that those who attend our evening services are for the most part a different class of people from those who come in the morning, and do very little towards defraying our expenses. During May, June, and July we had very few visitors, so that for three months we were chiefly dependent on residents. In July it was thought advisable to form ourselves into a Church, and friends in sympathy with us who desired to see a permanent church established in the town were invited to become members. At the present time we have thirty-four resident members. But for some years there is no doubt that the cause here must be looked upon as mission, and will require a large amount of assistance from the Parent Society in London. But with this help, and with the zeal and ability of the Rev. Alfred Hood, and the active co-operation of Mrs. Hood, we hope that a permanent and self-supporting Church will eventually be established in this growing town. From various causes we have not commenced a Sunday-school as yet, but we hope to do so shortly, as some of the friends who come to us have children.

POOLE.—Since your last annual meeting we have had to regret the loss of our late minister, the Rev. Wm. Agar, who was compelled from ill-health and other circumstances to resign the charge. He has been succeeded by the Rev. F. T. Reed, who received an unanimous invitation to settle with us, and the connection thus commenced we trust will be permanent and mutually satisfactory. Our numbers remain about the same, but we have to regret the loss by death of an old and respected member, Mrs. Pike, who was formerly for many years an active worker in the Wareham congregation. The numbers of the Sunday-school keep up, the total number of names on the books being 71, with an average attendance, in the morning 30, afternoon 52, with 11 teachers.

PORTSMOUTH (HIGH-STREET).—During the year the work of this Christian church has been carried on earnestly and effectively by the minister and congregation. We have lost by death, removals, and other causes, twenty, and sixteen new members have joined. The various institutions connected with the church, viz., the Ladies' Sewing Circle, the Libraries, the Benevolent Society, and the Sunday-schools, are, as usual, doing good service, the Ladies' Sewing Circle has rendered substantial aid to the church. A number of lectures given during the year by our pastor, has no doubt brought forth good fruit. The annual concert was held in December, and was very successful. The Mayor of Portsmouth presided. At the harvest thanksgiving services and at Christmas the church was prettily decorated. The outbuildings connected with the church have been thoroughly drained, the ventilation of the library improved, and other improvements have taken place, at a cost of £42, which amount was paid from the legacy of the late Miss Edwards. The committee, acting upon medical advice, have granted leave of absence as a holiday to our minister (the Rev. Thos. Timmins) for six months, which we hope may prove both beneficial to his health and fruitful to his speedy recovery and safe return. During his absence the services have been conducted by the Rev. Charles Hoddinott, of London, the Rev. E. R. Grant, of Northampton, Mr. F. Allen, of London, Messrs. T. Smith and T. Haddon, of Southampton, and by Mr. T. Bond, of our own congregation.

PORTSMOUTH (ST. THOMAS'S).—In presenting the annual report of the above church, the committee feel that they have a duty to perform which is neither pleasant nor encouraging, the past year having been marked by events which have given them deep anxiety, and occasioned painful feelings among the congregation for many months. That they cannot consistently report satisfactory progress during the year arises from various causes, as in the first place they have for a long time laboured under the disadvantage of being without a minister, in consequence of the growing and continued infirmities of the Rev. John Ellis, which have utterly unfitted him for the proper discharge of his ministerial duties. His illness at length rendered it necessary (by the advice of his friends) to resign the pastorate of the church, after a ministration of over ten years, in order to seek that rest and retirement so necessary for the restoration of his failing energies. During Mr. Ellis's illness the committee availed themselves of the services of several lay brethren, who very kindly came forward and conducted the services gratuitously, and to those gentlemen, Messrs. Ward, Batchelor, Bond, Henry Blessley and William Blessley, the committee tender their best thanks. The committee sincerely regret that there has been a visible falling off in the congregation attending worship, that being followed by a corresponding decrease in the chapel funds. The cause of this decadence the committee think is due principally to the total neglect of Sunday-school work, as the schools, which a few years ago afforded religious instruction to over 120 children, do not number one single scholar, nor have we (with the exception of a small benevolent society and struggling sewing circle, kept together by a few energetic and zealous ladies) a single auxiliary institution connected with the chapel. These circumstances, unfavourable in themselves, added to a debt of £400, by which the church has long been fettered, render the prospects of the society at present most gloomy and discouraging. The committee are now negotiating with candidates, with the view of filling the vacancy caused by Mr. Ellis's resignation, and they feel that if they can secure the services of a talented, faithful and zealous Christian minister, who would go heart and soul into the work, the church might soon recover her former prosperity and be filled with Christian worshippers. They believe a great work could be done in Portsmouth, as among its 130,000 inhabitants a large proportion are advocates of unfettered thought and true liberal Christianity, and would gladly attend the ministry of a clever, earnest, and consistent pastor, while a large number of our old subscribers would return and assist the cause. The committee are determined to spare no pains in order to secure so desirable a result, feeling confident that a sufficient stipend could be raised, supplemented by the endowments to satisfy the claims of a thoroughly efficient minister. With those aims in view they are not without hope that the blessing of the Almighty may rest upon their endeavours to restore the church to its former prosperous condition, and that brighter and happier days may be her lot in the future is the earnest prayer of the committee and congregation.

[There was no report from Southampton, on account of the illness of the secretary of the congregation, Mr. B. K. Spencer.]

Your committee during the past year have lost the energetic and efficient services of the Rev. D. Amos as secretary of this Association. A warm expression of thanks on your behalf was tendered to Mr. Amos in January last for his past services for four years, and good wishes for his future usefulness and happiness at Scarborough. Mr. H. Blessley has kindly undertaken the duties of the secretaryship up to the present time.

Another earnest worker in the person of the Rev. W. Agar, late of Poole, has left the district, and taken with him the best thanks and earnest good wishes of your Association. Your committee beg to impress upon you the importance of the subscriptions for the coming year being punctually paid, and, if possible, increased in amount. Whilst feeling and appreciating the earnest labours of the ministers now in the district, your committee trust that arrangements may be made in the engagement of any new minister at either of the vacant pulpits, by which it may be possible to secure a man of power and earnestness in one of the large centres of industry; and your committee believe that by such appointment the work of the Association will be greatly aided, and that it will be of material service to the district at large.

As this Southern Unitarian Association has to depend for success mainly upon the individual zeal and earnestness of its members, your committee, in conclusion, would strongly impress upon you the importance of each continuing to do something—it may be necessary in some cases to even make some little personal sacrifice—in order to help forward the work of this Association; but feeling as they do that some encouragement has fairly come to us this year from Bournemouth, and hoping that more still may come next year from Chichester, they trust that steady, useful work will continue to be done by Unitarians in the South of England towards liberating and uplifting the religious tendencies of our time.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.—The following letter, sent by Mr. Gladstone to a gentleman in Manchester who had charge of a men's Sunday afternoon Bible class, is now published:—"Hawarden, September, 4, 1877. Sir,—It is wholly out of my power to reply to your letter in the manner which its purpose would recommend and its subject requires. But I am unwilling altogether to withhold a few words which may, at any rate, serve as an indication of sympathy with your desire to profit by the treasures of the Divine Word. I will not dwell on the need of light from above, or the duty of seeking it, of being vigilant against the excuse of the private spirit, of cultivating humility, of bearing in mind that God has through all these long ages had a people whom He has led; that we are not the first who come to the wells of salvation opened by Christ and his Apostles. I will also assume that you are strict adherents of method in this great study, so as to make your results comprehensive. In this view, if you are Churchmen, or, indeed, if you are not, I recommend you to consider whether the table of lessons, old or new, may not be of much use. Two things, however, especially I commend to your thoughts. The first is this—Christianity in Christ, and nearness to Him and to His image, is the end of all your efforts. Thus the Gospels, which continually present to us one pattern, have a kind of precedence among the books of Holy Scripture. I advise your remembering that the Scriptures have two purposes—one to feed the people of God in 'green pastures,' the other to serve for proof of doctrine. These are not divided by a sharp line from one another, yet they are provinces on the whole distinct, and in some ways different. We are variously called to various works. But we all require to feed in the pastures and to drink at the wells. For this purpose the Scriptures are incomparably simple to all those willing to be fed. The same cannot be said in regard to the proof or construction of doctrine. This is a desirable work, but not for us all. It requires to be possessed with more of external helps, more learning and good guides, more knowledge of the historical development of our religion, which development is one of the most wonderful parts of all human history, and, in my opinion, affords also one of the strongest demonstrations of its truth and of the power and goodness of God. I have sent you this very slight outline, all that my time allowed, with the knowledge that if I postponed my reply to make it fuller it might, amid the pressure upon me, end in sending no reply at all.—With every good wish, I remain your faithful servant, W. E. GLADSTONE."

NEWPORT, ISLE OF WIGHT.—The Department of Science and Art, South Kensington, have awarded an art class teacher's certificate to Miss F. M. Minns, organist of the Unitarian chapel, whose high artistic attainments are well known in the neighbourhood.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.—We understand that the Rev. C. H. Waid, late Senior Student of Manchester New College, has undertaken the temporary charge of the Mission at Spicer-street till the end of the year, with the kind assistance of Mr. Corkran.

THE second issue of the Browning Society Papers has appeared in a magazine consisting of 190 pages. It is published by Messrs. Trubner at the prohibitory price of 10s. In the introductory address the Rev. J. Kirkman claims for Browning the credit of being the greatest Christian poet we ever had, not in the narrow dogmatic sense, but as the teacher who is as thrilled through with all Christian sympathies as with artistic or musical.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Hale Constitutions.—When the human frame has become debilitated from the effects of exposure, excesses, or neglect, then these Pills will work wonders. If they be taken according to the lucid directions wrapped round each box, Holloway's Pills exert the most exemplary tonic qualities in all those cases of nervous depression in which the vital powers have become so weakened that the circulation has been rendered languid and unsteady. They improve the appetite, strengthen the digestion, regulate the liver, and act as gentle aperients. The Pills are suited to all ages and all habits. A patient writes:—"Your Pills, to be valued, require only to be known. During many years I sought a remedy in vain, was daily becoming weaker, when your Pills soon restored me."

The Liberal Pulpit.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE IN RELATION TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

BY THE REV. E. RATTENBURY HODGES.

[Preached at the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, Aug. 27, during the visit of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.]

Romans i. 20:—"For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead."

The phenomena of nature have in all ages stirred in man's mind sentiments of awe, admiration and fear. Hence it was that wonder came to be the parent of imagination and inquiry. Man observing matter in a state of motion, it excited within his mind the idea that a number of unseen intelligences were working for or against his well-being.

And so fetishism, and ultimately nature-myths, grew up with the multiplication of our race.

As far as we can judge, the earliest men on our globe could not think of atmospheric, terrestrial or marine phenomena without connecting them with some spiritual agency, a god or a demon, or many such. Side by side with the growth of observation there was the development of reflection and of reverence, or the religious sense.

Science has not yet advanced sufficiently to give us any reliable chronology in reference to man's first appearance, or when fetishism, animism and polytheism actually came into existence.

It will, perhaps, never be able to decide the point, but the main facts which have been collected are sufficient to establish the general statements which we have just made. They are established, I say, and the prejudices of those who decline to accept or even to inquire into them cannot affect them as reliable evidence, and as the basis of great philosophic conceptions and conclusions.

Moreover, modern scientific discovery, acting and reacting upon religious thought, has for the most part overthrown, and is now setting aside, those crude conceptions about God, the world and man which are part of ancient systems of theology.

In a word, physical science has helped us to see that religion is not necessarily associated with or dependent upon any theological system, whether old or new.

In the study of nature, whether by close observation or severe introspection, we may learn more religious truth than by a rigid scrutiny of sacred books which profess to act as guides to divine communion. Creeds must have a rational and therefore verifiable basis, or they are worthless. Reference to ancient authority is no real safeguard against moral or spiritual error. All through the ages of his history man has been slowly and steadily advancing in knowledge. But how has he thus progressed? By thoughtful inquiry and observation, in the course of which he has been constantly erring, and as constantly correcting his errors; thus knowledge has grown "from more to more." And at length when men learned the value of the experimental method of research, the horizon of objective truth began rapidly to widen. The Scientific Congress now assembled within this ancient city not only attracts our attention, but naturally leads us to survey with keenest interest the great achievements of modern physical investigation. What marvellous revelations have come to us from the glorious Universe by which we are surrounded! Regions vast, tenanted by orbs innumerable, realms minute, peopled by countless forms of life, provinces through which subtle but mighty forces gyrate and undulate—like a gorgeous panorama pass before us.

Let us, then, briefly review some of the sublime truths revealed by modern discovery and note their bearing upon religion. The old Ptolemaic system and the ideas akin to it were doomed to pass away when Galileo made his first astronomical discovery. In place of the old conception there stands before us the cardinal fact (1) of the vastness of the materia universe. Suns, planets, systems move in transcendent harmony.

There is motion everywhere. Absolute inertia does not exist. All matter is seen to be in a state of motion; there is the motion of translation. Masses of matter travelling with awful velocity in grand circles, wheel within wheel, in numbers infinite. Moreover, the eye of reason sees molecular motion, i.e., that atoms as well as planets rotate, that there is a molecular motion so subtle that it eludes the senses as such. And with the exaltation of our conceptions about the material cosmos there has been a proportionate enlargement of our ideas about space and time. Astronomy tells us of the diameter of the solar system, the orbits of planetary bodies, the vast elliptical courses of comets, the long journeying of light from the nearest of the so-called fixed stars to our earth. And though this science also tells us much about time, yet still we turn to the testimony of geology for the more manifest and striking evidence of its duration.

Geology carries the mind back to ages inconceivably remote, from the earth's gaseous or comet condition to its semi-solid stage, over innumerable epochs to the time when life dawned upon its surface, through countless generations of organised existences until the advent of man, destined to mastery over all that he can press into his service.

And now, after vaguely contemplating Nature for many centuries, he comes forth not only as her explorer, not only as the interpreter of some of her choicest secrets, but as the intelligent utiliser of her mightiest energies. We are thus environed by and share in the possession of matter, force, and life. But whence came they? There is no proof that they always existed. Materialistic hypotheses offer no satisfactory solution to the problem of their origin.

To any unbiased mind, to the minds of not a few of our profoundest philosophers, to the minds of those who discern entities in this universe which cannot be brought within the range of physical tests, one Supreme Power and Intelligence must be the author of all Nature. Moreover, a Being whose works in their totality far exceed the grasp of our highest intellects must Himself ever transcend human comprehension. Again, (2) physical science demonstrates unity of plan throughout the material universe. The spectroscope shows us that our sun and some of the most distant stars are composed of elements identical with those of our planet.

Carbon, hydrogen, sodium and other bodies seem to be widely diffused throughout the sidereal system. Light, heat, chemical energy and other forces are now known to be likewise as present in the most distant nebule as on this earth. The molten and seething surface of the sun, on which rest metallic vapours, is swept by colossal cyclones of red hot hydrogen, and Sirius, that remote but brilliant star, is also a sun of marvellous size, having a volume 4,860 times that of our luminary. And yet what is this giant sun, and the thousands more or less like it, with their circling planets poised in space, what are these to the universe in its entirety! Further proof of this unity of plan to which we refer is afforded by the sublime discovery of the correlation of the physical forces.

Light, heat, electricity, magnetism and chemical action are all modes or manifestations of one primal force. This protean energy is perhaps related to, or may be identical with, gravitation.

Physicists may eventually solve this enigma. Moreover, with this grand generalisation, effected by modern research, there is also associated another great truth—the conservation of energy. Nothing is lost, not a unit of force or an atom of matter.

The circulation of matter, through the play of telluric forces, is marked by no actual destruction, in fact, the agencies which break down are also constantly engaged in re-building the fabric of Nature. And thus the unseen cosmical forces preserve equilibrium and universal harmony.

These marvellous truths, which have been brought to light by the tireless zeal and skilful search of scientists, are further evidence to pious minds that such marvels could not have been self-existent, uncreated, or without origin from some source above and beyond Nature. That the entire system of things both seen and unseen must be, the products of One Divine Mind is the only truly rational conclusion, the only ground of certainty to the humble, reverent and devout.

Recognising this truth as an integral part of personal consciousness, we feel, moreover, that the fact of the conservation of energy, the dynamic economy which universally obtains, stands as a stern rebuke to the hideous theology which teaches that human souls will be lost, through sin and unbelief. If matter and force be preserved from annihilation, be not "cast as rubbish to the void," is it not a glorious assurance to us that the soul of man is precious in God's sight, and that not one life, however morally debased, can ever be lost to his divine love and care? (3) Furthermore, physical science has disclosed to us the reign of law.

Everywhere around us the earth, and sea, and sky teem with most beautiful and inimitable adaptations of means to ends. Time fails me to cite examples, nor is there any need of doing this, for such facts are daily becoming more widely known. I therefore pass on in order to refer to the stupendous generalisation which is now the prevailing topic of inquiry and of controversy among students of nature—the doctrine of evolution. Most of us know that Laplace, speculating on the origin of stars, suns, and planets, arrived at the conclusion that they all were condensed and solidified from nebulous matter; that the sidereal bodies were cradled in fire, passed through gaseous and vaporous stages to the condition of fluid spheres, and so cooled down to what they now are. Then Lyell applied this idea to his theory that the uniform action of agencies of change, slowly working through vast epochs, brought the surface of our globe to its present state. For a long time his uniformitarian theory was opposed by those who believed in the doctrine of geological convulsions or cataclysms. In due time the illustrious Darwin, whose loss the world of science has had so recently to deplore, came forward with the fruits of his long and patient researches. As we all know, he gave us his theory of the origin of species, i.e., the development of all organic life from a primordial germ. Moreover, he concluded that man was gradually evolved from the lowest form of animal life. And lastly, Herbert Spencer, working on these lines, endeavours to show that this doctrine of development or evolution is also to be seen exemplified in the ethical and social life of man.

These are grand efforts at unification, they are hypotheses so ingenious and attractive that we cannot ignore them if we would. But we must remember that they are still theories, and that they have not a few eminent opponents. Now it may or may not be true that nature, with all her variety, order, and beauty, with her vast systems and minute existences, is, in her totality, comprehended under one stupendous law of sidereal, geological, organic, and ethical evolution. At present we have here a magnificent theory, and therefore it is unwarrantable to dogmatise. It takes more than twenty or fifty years to dispose of the objections to so all-embracing a hypothesis as this.

We calmly admit, however, that if Evolution be proved as lying at the basis of the observed order of nature, the primal truth of all is not affected, the antecedent fact of the Universe still lies beyond the ken of physical philosophy, although such philosophy has come nearer to the great secret which underlies all phenomena. And why? Because Evolution logically presupposes an Evolver, and Development postulates a Developer. The reign of law is only rationally conceived of as the uniform action of a law maker. Adaptation also involves an Adapter. In a word, the Evolver and Adapter can be none other than God, and the operation of Natural Law none other than the ordered expression of His Will. And that Will we cannot but regard as in harmonious relation to us. The testimony of physical science not only strengthens and enlightens us, but it also affects our moral nature. We see the effects of stupendous forces in the starry heavens and on the verdant earth, but we also know that there is a power operating within us and in human society, a Power which transcends analysis (being, indeed, not amenable to physical tests), "the Power which makes for righteousness." True science is the handmaid of religion; nay, we would even say that scientific truth is a necessary part of religious truth, for they are one, even as their Divine Author is One.

Beauty and happiness are but relative terms, but the fact that they predominate around us is further proof not only of a Divine Cause but of His goodness. Our world and the orbs around us might have been so formed as not to excite admiration, but the sense of the beautiful is one of the purest joys which attach to our lot. There is much physical suffering in the world; man and the lower forms of life feel pain proportional to the complexity of their nervous organisation. But what may we learn from this? Such suffering is often due to the conscious or unconscious violation of natural law. Through pain Nature tells us of our error, and warns us to shun greater dangers.

The perception of beauty, the predominance of happiness over misery and physical pain and the discipline of suffering (moral or physiological), testify to the presence, power, wisdom and love of God.

As a rule, man discerns in some processes of Nature operations somewhat akin to, though invariably superior, his own, and on further reflection he sees that these processes bear the stamp of forethought and intelligent design. With the eye of reason man thus sees clear evidence of the presence and working of the Divine Author.

Nor do his thoughts rest here, for he is filled with the consciousness that he himself partly on this account can claim kinship to the Oversoul, and regard Him as his parent. Hence he is able to form some rational conception of the nature and character of God, notwithstanding the impenetrable mystery by which he has surrounded Himself.

And here I would remark, that it were better to see God by the light of reason, no matter by what methods that light may have been kindled, whether by the torch of philosophy, the lamp of science, or the fervent fires of moral consciousness or aspiration—than to grope after him amid the darkness of a blind faith.

As light with her viewless pencil paints the rainbow and the rose, and with actinic skill pictures nature on the chemic film, even so God touches by His awful presence the soul, and makes it bear the image and reflect the glory of His Divine and Eternal Mind.

Our attitude towards Him at this hour is that of a rational trust—not a bare recognition of His presence, but of a confidence in Him, which is accompanied by loving aspiration and profound reverence. And as we contemplate parts of His ways in nature, let the wondrous vision move us to pray with filial awe, "Thy will be done, O God! on earth and in our hearts even as it is done in heaven." To-day we worship in the vast temple of the Universe, but what do we worship? To whom do we make our orisons?

Some would tell us that we worship the unknowable. But they only mock us. We know by an experience too subtle for us to demonstrate that we worship one who is our Father, one who loves us with surpassing tenderness, and whose providence will safely lead us through whatever painful discipline we may yet have to pass, and that it will finally usher us into a sphere wherein His perfections are more clearly seen, and His love shall stir our souls to sublimer joys and more rapturous service.

Fortified by the conviction that amid a scene of perpetual change God is alone immutable, we can say with the poet—

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights from Thee,
But thou, O Lord! art more than they."

THE BISHOP OF TRURO ON FREE INQUIRY.

The sermon of the Bishop of Truro (Dr. Benson) at St. Mary's Parish Church on Sunday morning was a splendid vindication of the liberty to inquire and to express the results of inquiry in matters both material and spiritual, and of the harmony in this respect of Christianity and modern science, based on the words "These were more noble . . . in that they received the word with all readiness of mind examining the Scriptures daily whether these things were so" (Acts xvii. 2, Revised Version). Remarking that the nobility of mind here praised plainly did not consist in the choice of the subject examined, although that subject was the Scriptures,—it consisted in the openmindedness, and in the earnest toilsomeness with which the words were examined, the Bishop said the verse might be paraphrased "More noble in that they listened to new views with all readiness of mind, and examined daily into their consistency with facts. The Scriptures often named seven spiritual powers. One was called the spirit of understanding or the spirit of intelligence. So long as anything remained not yet intelligently known the activity of that intelligence would be the spirit of inquiry. It was, then, God's spirit working in capable men to enlarge the measure and the fulness of man's capacity; or from the human side, it was man's spirit being attracted ever nearer to the All-wise, the All-knowing, and when the magistracy, the clergy, and all the citizens of the ancient borough of Southampton welcomed with all honours this progressive Association and its President, they set their zeal to the necessity and nobleness of the spirit of God's working in capable man, whose knowledge, in the measure of his intellectual capacity, the necessity for search had not yet ended. There was a sum of created things, and, therefore, a real end, however far off, to what could be known of them. But the known was to the unknown, as a microscopic shell compared to the Pacific. Yet pass a little way into space and the whole Pacific and the globe itself was summed up into a speck. Things material were only practically and not absolutely limitless and apparently but not scientifically eternal. Religion itself was a science, and, viewed as a science, was at present the one science in which the effects led without a break up to the cause. The spirit of inquiry had in nothing more verified itself, its method, and its subject than in that it had advanced this one religion, had cleared and justified it, had demonstrated that the tolerance which marked its earliest teachings was essential to human progress, and had crumbled away much of the materialism with which faith had been incrustured. It had given deeper meaning to religious mysteries, by showing that it was not written alone, that the adoption of logical opposites was the only possible way of expressing truth. Meanwhile, before the spirit of inquiry every other religion faded fast away. It was not only on false religion that the spirit of inquiry acted, it was a specific solvent for false forms of Christianity itself. He knew not whether any stern or any sensuous religion of heathendom had held up before men's astonished eyes features more appalling or more repulsive than those of the vindictive father, or the arbitrary distribution of two Eternities; or, again, of the easy compromises of offences in return for houses and lands—dreadful shadows under which tens of thousands had been reared. If inquiry had yet reached any firm foundation on which they might build in working for the future social condition of man, it was the basis they had ascertained of the unity of life. The latest discovered law involved, at least, this—that the life of man was one life. Who could estimate what was wrapped up in this? Yet it was no more than the scientific verification of what was so long ago stated, and for a while acted on, by Christians. St. Paul said that all were one in Christ. From the liberty to inquire came the liberty to express the results of inquiry, and this was in the preamble of the charter of Jesus Christ, who said that he spoke with freedom of speech in the temple. His Apostles also claimed to teach with freedom of speech. Science could no more submit to be controlled than theology could be affected by every little alteration in scientific opinion. Intellectual work of every kind must be free, and the New Testament was the only book of religion which accepted that statement. The New Testament, moreover, taught man that his two great losses were recoverable—that his innocence might be recovered through faith and his dominion over nature by the arts and sciences. He prayed that this great Association, by its reverent freedom and noble research, might become the Divine instrument for the recovery of both these losses.

Dr. JOSEPH COOK describes Keshub Chunder Sen in India as "a Quaker-Unitarian in Hindu dress." Mr. W. D. HOWELLS, the novelist, who has recently arrived in England, proposes to spend at least twelve months in Europe.

Mr. WILLIAM PETERSON, formerly scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and recently assistant to Professor Sellar at Edinburgh, has been appointed principal of the new University College at Dundee, which it is proposed to open by the beginning of next year.

Obituary.

DEATH OF MR. WILLIAM BROWN, OF LEEDS.

In Mr. William Brown, of Bardon Grange, Weetwood, Leeds has lost no common citizen. Sprung from that vigorous, kindly, and upright race, the dalesmen of the Lake District, Mr. Brown was born at Kendal, on the 8th of September, 1805, and he had, therefore, all but completed his seventy-seventh year. He came to Leeds early in life, and was, we believe, first connected with the firm of Stansfeld Brothers. Subsequently he joined Mr. Hamer Stansfeld in business, under the style of Stansfeld, Brown, and Co., stuff merchants, and soon became known, like his partner, as a man of public spirit as well as of the highest commercial honour. Few persons in the West Riding took so conspicuous a part in the Anti-Corn Law agitation as Mr. Hamer Stansfeld, whose views on that subject and on Free Trade generally were shared, and, whenever occasion required, publicly manifested by his partner. Both gentlemen had the gratification to witness the legislative triumph of their principles, and the immense spring and enlargement of British industry and commerce consequent thereon.

At a latter date, when civil war broke out in the United States, and when the sympathies of the aristocracy and the larger portion of the middle class of England, under a misapprehension of the issues involved, leaned towards the people of the South, Mr. Brown never hesitated, in private or in public, to express his conviction that the North was in the right and must conquer.

As a politician Mr. Brown was a consistent moderate Liberal, shrinking from everything doubtful in principle or in party action.

But it was as a practical philanthropist that he was most distinguished. No good cause sought his help in vain, and yet he rarely took part in public meetings. In November, 1873, he was induced to accept the conjoint offices of Treasurer of the Leeds General Infirmary and Chairman of its Weekly Board, both of which he retained to his death. From the date of his election to this onerous and responsible post the interests of that great Temple of Healing were cared for and watched over by Mr. Brown as if they were his own; and we believe no hospital in the kingdom stands higher in reputation for the judgment with which it is managed and the comfort with which patients, nurses, and the entire establishment are provided for. We may say the same of the Cookridge Convalescent Hospital, in the supervision and management of which Mr. Brown has until quite lately taken a constant personal interest. The commodious building at the back of the Leeds Infirmary was erected mainly at Mr. Brown's instance, for the better accommodation of the nurses when off duty; and he gave £1,000 towards the cost, besides large donations to the general purposes of the infirmary. In private life also his benevolence was large and discriminating. It was characteristic of Mr. Brown that he always sought to conciliate rival interests in persons or institutions, and combine them in action for a common good. His own clear-sightedness and decision of character were at the same time not the less remarkable. His personal tastes were most simple.

The Unitarian was the religious body to which he was attached; but he was catholic in his sympathies, and glad to help the members of other denominations in good works.

In 1880 he lost his wife, and since then his health has been somewhat failing. After passing last winter at Bournemouth and a short time in Wales he returned home in the spring, but a succession of disorders of the respiratory organs has issued in his death, which took place last week. A son and daughter survive him.

Mr. Brown was Vice-Chairman of the Leeds, Bradford, and Halifax Railway Company before it was amalgamated with the Great Northern Company, and it was in a large measure owing to his exertions that the former improved its position so much prior to the amalgamation. He was a West Riding magistrate, and one of the Income-tax Commissioners for the borough of Leeds. Mr. Brown's funeral took place on Tuesday at Lawnswood Cemetery, the Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., officiating.—Leeds Mercury.

BISHOP STEERE.—A telegram from Zanzibar announces the sudden death of the missionary Bishop Steere, who was Bishop Tozer's successor in Central Africa. Bishop Steere, who was a graduate of London University, was a remarkable man. Besides being lawyer, preacher, and metaphysician, he was a printer, master carpenter, and architect. Dr. Steere was consecrated Bishop of Central Africa at Westminster Abbey in 1874. Besides being author of "A Sketch of the Persecutions under the Roman Emperors," and some essays, he prepared an edition of Bishop Butler's works, and published a history of the Bible and Prayer-Book, and many hymns and stories, in the Shamilia and Swahili languages. Deceased was fifty-four years of age.

THE LATE W. S. JEVONS.—There were some errata in the report of Dr. Sadler's address at the funeral of Professor W. Stanley Jevons, which was taken from the Manchester Examiner without the writer's correction on account of his absence from home. In the sentence "it is that of the leader affectionately sweetening the ties of family and friendship," read "it is that of the tender affections sweetening, &c." In the sentence "light and warmth had their seal in the sanctuary of his heart," read "seat" instead of "seal." For "the simplicity which is in it," read "the simplicity which is in Christ."

WE understand that the next exhibition of the Grosvenor Gallery will be devoted entirely to the works of Mr. Alma Tadema, with the exception of a few paintings by the late Cecil Lawson.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Urbino, under the patronage of the King of Italy, to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Rafael. It is proposed to erect a statue of the "prince of painters" in Carrara marble, upon a pedestal bearing bas-reliefs illustrative of his art. A public competition is invited, and the models sent in will be exhibited together for twenty days, beginning with March 28, 1883, the birthday of Rafael.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

London, August 22, 1882.

The death of the late William Annette Pope by a fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, 'on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends, they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London Mr. Pope had been for twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the free churches generally.

A LAYMAN ON METHODISM.

It has long been our opinion that the success of Methodism is chiefly owing to its efficient organisation. We are borne out in this view by a writer—an intelligent layman—who has made Methodism a subject of study for many years; who has been behind the scenes, and is evidently intimately acquainted with its plans, methods, and modes of working. We allude to Mr. JOHN EARP, whose book was reviewed recently in these columns. His opinion is not a favourable one, but its evident sincerity makes it well worth considering. He strips off the veil and shows us what is beneath—the inner agencies that are at work, and all for one purpose chiefly—to keep up before the world an imposing display of numbers and influence.

He begins by pointing out the undeniable fact, that during the last hundred and fifty years Methodism has increased much faster than any other ism. Taking the religious world as a whole, Wesleyanism has progressed more rapidly than Congregationalism or the Baptist body; and it may afford some interest to ascertain by what means Methodism has exceeded every other sect in its number of members. First, then, there are certain causes to which its rapid growth cannot be attributed. It is certain that it has not outgrown all other sects through any superior mental advantages. It is not a more intelligent, cultured, or learned sect than any other. On the contrary, the Methodists in general have been reputed the least intelligent and educated, or as our author plainly puts it, "the most ignorant of all modern sects." Nor can we account for the rapid development of Methodism by the supposition of any special sanctity or more real and vital piety on the part of its numbers above all other denominations. "Nor have we any reason," says our author, "to think that Wesleyan Methodists stand any higher in the favour of GOD than any other true believers in CHRIST." Of course not, all such claims are only the pretensions of vanity and presumption.

If, then, the exceeding progress of Methodism cannot be attributed to any special mental or moral power that it possesses, the means of its increase must be merely material or mechanical. This is truly the case; and these means are chiefly two, viz. :—class-leading and lay preaching. "Now the most useful and efficient of all Methodist machines is the class-leader. These class-leaders, who number by tens of thousands, carry on a constant rivalry, not as to whose class shall possess the greatest number of devout, earnestly religious persons, but merely as to the total number of members and the amount of money they produce. The class-leader is constantly on the look-out for names to enter in his class book; not being very particular as to whether the persons had been allured from some other religious sect. Nor is the class-leader very much concerned about the new members of his class being converted persons; all that is required is that they be free from gross immorality. At the weekly class meeting each member tells a sing-song tale about his or her experience; and the class-leader gives a ding-dong reply to each, and collects the pence each member gives. Now it is to this class-meeting organisation that Methodism owes its rapid increase a hundred-fold more than to its public preaching. The class-leader is the real pastor in Methodism. It is the class-leader that collects the members and the money to support and extend Methodism."

The second great agency for promoting the growth of this sect is lay preaching. In every part of the world, says our author, Methodism appeals very much to the ambition of young men, and gratifies that ambition by making them what are called "local preachers." Methodism has nearly twenty-fold more such preachers than any other religious sect; and Methodist preachers (both ordained and unordained) can preach the same sermon to thirty or forty different congregations. Methodist preachers can recite their old tales in a more fluent and attractive manner than can those preachers who are obliged to have all new sermons, and the flippancy and pertness displayed in Methodist pulpits lead ignorant people to conclude that Methodist preachers must be more God-inspired than the preachers of any other Christian denomination.

Besides these agencies there are other points to be borne in mind. "The Methodists are not so fastidious as other religious bodies about order in their public services. Indeed, the Methodists encourage a little rant, vehemence and animal excitement; and we know that people are always affected more by sound than sense, and will resort where there is the greatest number of persons assembled and where there is most noise and excitement. And many persons are frightened into Methodist societies to escape the fire and brimstone which they hear more about from Methodist than from any other pulpits."

Such, according to our author, are the means which conduce chiefly to Methodist success; and he counsels those who wish to increase as they do to go and do likewise. In the first place, he says, they must enlist a large army of class-leaders, and send them recruiting for members everywhere. And they must not be over particular as to the character of the persons they admit into their societies, especially if the persons be wealthy; for a thousand pounds will supply the want of twenty thousand religious qualities. Nor must they omit to swell the number of members in their societies from their Sabbath schools. Indeed, they must neglect no means by which they can make a great display of numbers. And then there must be a long list of lay preachers who will be able to gratify the principle of novelty and the itching ears of their congregations by giving them a different preacher every Sunday. If any religious sect will only conform to Methodism in regard to class-leaders and the heaping up of lay preachers, nothing in our author's opinion can hinder it from increasing perhaps more rapidly than the Wesleyans, because he says there is no other denomination of Christians so creed-bound as are the Methodists.

After this advice the author very justly adds—"But it will be well for every sect and denomination of Christians to strongly bear in mind that it is one of the greatest mistakes to judge of truth or the prosperity of religious societies by mere popularity or numbers; because it is still true that narrow is the way leading to high spiritual life, and few there be who find it. Neither popular opinion nor popular feeling is sufficiently deep or permanent to be a standard of truth or right." If the rapid growth of Methodism is owing to the means described above, we can only say that it would be better to remain as we are, a small denomination, unable to boast of much increase, than be indebted for success to such questionable tactics.

MR. BLUNT AND THE EGYPTIAN QUESTION.

It is curious, and not a little painful, to notice how patriotic feeling obscures the mental vision of the nation in judging of the unhappy war we are now waging in Egypt. This feeling is strengthened by the war-spirit which fluctuates in intensity with the progress of the campaign, being fierce and triumphant in the hour of victory, but less exultant when weary days of inevitable delay threaten to make the game of war long and expensive. Unfortunately, the Press, with one or two noble exceptions, is infected with the war fever, and does its best to blind the eyes of the people to the difference between might and right in international matters. It might be supposed, indeed, from what some of the newspapers say of our "vital interests" being involved in the Egyptian Question, that if we had not sent our fleet and army to arrest the machinations of ARABI he would soon have been master of London and the arbiter of our national life. Possibly we have interests in Egypt; it is no doubt desirable for us that the Canal should remain open to us as the great highway to India. But what of that? There is surely a vast difference between an interest of this kind and the moral right to make war upon the people through whose territory the Canal passes. Besides, we did not find either the engineering skill or the capital to make the Canal; our foremost statesman at the time was strongly opposed to the scheme. But we have found it useful, and now blood and treasure must be expended, and the right of a people trampled upon to maintain the advantages it affords us. This is the kind of plea that is put forward for the war, a plea in which meum and tuum are interchangeable terms. Those, however, who urge it forget that no Egyptian government would be insane enough to destroy or even in any way interfere with what is a great source of wealth to the country. Stript, indeed, of all flimsy pretences, the war is seen to resolve itself into a national quarrel on behalf of private bondholders. To ensure to them the best possible interest for the large sum they had recklessly lent to the late Khedive the control was established, and this was fatal to the hopes and aspirations of the National party which undoubtedly exists in the country.

Such is the conclusion which Mr. BLUNT, the author of the "Future of Islam," seeks to establish in a most interesting article he has contributed to the current number of the Nineteenth Century. The newspapers have done their best to weaken his arguments and damage his most telling statements. But no dispassionate reader can peruse his paper without being fully convinced that he is no mere dreamer, no mere sentimental theorist, but a man who speaks with authority. It is true he does not hesitate to say that he is in the strongest sympathy with our Egyptian enemies and violently opposed to the war. Speaking of the valiant stand such prominent Liberals as Sir WILFRID LAWSON and Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON have made against it, he says: "My position is less fortunate than theirs, for among my countrymen at the present moment I know of absolutely none who have the courage to say without reserve, 'God speed the right,' as I do in the coming struggle." It is quite natural that the majority of those who are "pleading the cause of peace" should "stop short of this." Still Mr. BLUNT is probably like the prophet ELIJAH with regard to the worship of Baal. Assuredly there are some who are not blinded by either selfishness, patriotism or military glory, and who place the claims of humanity, and the demands of the right and the true far above all other considerations.

Having referred to his isolated position, our author goes on to tell of his acquaintance with the East, which dates from 1874, and then of how he was unavoidably detained in Cairo during the autumn of last year, and thus became acquainted with Egypt and the leaders of the National party. His religious friends in the Aghar explained to him, he says—"the new situation, the conversion of the army to the National cause, the demonstrations of February and September, the overthrow of RIAZ, the installation of a Nationalist War Minister in MAHMOUD SAMI, the apparition of ARABI as the champion of popular rights, the new-born freedom of the Press, the rapid strides the anti-Circassian movement was making among the people." At the same time they complained bitterly, he adds, of the evils brought on them by the family of MOHAMMED ALI, the financial ruin of the country, and all the public scandals which had sprung from what they termed the foreign invasion. They spoke, too, it seems, of the injustice of the taxation which favoured Europeans, of the mis-management of the revenues, the railways and the customs under European control. But they were willing to believe that Mr. GLADSTONE might be induced to befriend them as he had befriended the Greeks and Bulgarians. Our author sympathised with the national aspirations thus manifested, and gradually acquired an influence among the leaders of the movement. This influence he seems to have used with Sir EDWARD MALET, the British representative with the Khedive, of whom he says—"From the moment he understood my position with the Nationalists he employed me freely as a means of communication between him and them, and so I was enabled to clear up many small apprehensions which before existed."

The interest of Mr. BLUNT's article will, however, largely centre in what he has to tell about ARABI, whom he describes as no ordinary man. Of the Egyptian leader, rebel, or patriot, or whatever other name he is to be called, he says:—"It was evident he believed he had a mission to restore good Mussulman government in his country. On the other hand, he was as evidently the reverse of a fanatic." And when told that our author's wife, Lady ANNE BLUNT, who was with him, was a granddaughter of Lord BYRON, who "had fought for the Greeks," he appears to have shown the greatest interest and satisfaction. The result of our author's sympathy with the Egyptian Nationalists and his interviews with ARABI was a letter to Mr. GLADSTONE, written on the 28th of December, in which he speaks as follows:—"I have had much conversation with ARABI, and can assure you he is no common man. He is an acute reasoner, a man of education and practical good sense, and a theologian of the most enlightened school of orthodox Mohammedanism. . . . He disclaims, and I believe him, all personal ambition, and there is no kind of doubt that the army and the country are devoted to him." In this same letter to the Premier ARABI is described as saying of the army:—"As Egyptians we do not love blood, and hope to shed none, and when our Parliament has learned to speak, our duty will be over; but until such time we are resolved to maintain the rights of the people at any cost, and we do not fear with God's help to justify our guardianship if need be against all comers." The difficulty of the task Sir GARNET WOLSELEY has undertaken certainly seems to bear out these determined words.

By the end of the year Mr. BLUNT's relations with the Nationalist party were so well assured, as he tells his readers, that with Sir E. MALET's approval he drew up a first draft of the document which, after careful revision and amendment by Sheikh MOHAMMED ABDU, SULIMAN Pacha, ARABI, and other representative men was adopted as their programme and sent as such to the Times. Shortly afterwards, however, an event occurred to which subsequent troubles are largely ascribed. This was the issue of the Joint Note by France and England on Jan. 8, which was like "thunder in a clear sky." We do not remember the text of the Note, and Mr. BLUNT does not give it, but he gives the following words as the explanation which Sir E. MALET desired him to offer to the Nationalists:—"That the meaning of the Note as understood by the British Government was that the English Government would not permit any interference of the Sultan with Egypt, and would also not allow the Khedive to go back from his promises or molest the Parliament." But it is not so much the Note itself as our author's account of its origin which will surprise most of his readers. It will be remembered that there was in France at that time a great fear of an Arab rising, under the leadership of the Sultan as the head of Islam, and that M. GAMBETTA was Premier. Hence the relevancy of our author's argument, whether it be sound or not. "M. GAMBETTA thought to draw England into his anti-Islamic war, and the point where England and France touched the movement was in Egypt. He accordingly drew up the Note, and presented it to Sir CHARLES DILKE and Lord LYONS just as the negotiations for the commercial Treaty had assumed their most critical stage." In other words, the prospect of a new Commercial Treaty was made the bait to trap us into signing the Joint Note, which created so strong a feeling that "the Egyptians were for the first time united."

With regard to the fall of SHERIF Pacha, and the more immediate cause of the breach between the National party and Europe, our author says:—"The notables insisted on the control of the part of the Budget not devoted to the payment of the Debt." When it was afterwards said they had been coerced into their determined attitude they "laughed at the idea of being afraid of ARABI and the army. Even Sultan Pacha the Khedive's nominee to the presidency of the Chamber with a view to contradicting the report of ARABI's tyranny, begged our author, we are told, to call upon him, and "in the presence of the grand Mufti and five of the most respectable of the Deputies, besides a number of personal friends, he in the strongest terms denied that pressure of any kind had been put upon any of them." If we are to believe Mr. BLUNT, indeed various statements found their way into the Times which had no business there, and which merely tended to stir up strife, while important documents possessed of an opposite tendency have been purposely omitted from the Egyptian Blue-books. It is only fair to add that he gives his grounds for both suppositions, and that they are not without considerable weight. The thought is painful, so far as our diplomacy is concerned, but if true it is probably not without precedent in the official world. Nor is it antecedently improbable that Sir AUCLAND COLVIL should have said to our author that "it was useless to talk of the abstract rights and wrongs of the Egyptians; these would not be considered," that he made no secret of his views about ruining the National party, and that "he should work for intervention, and if it must be so for annexation." And though ARABI may not be a noble patriot, though Sheikh MOHAMMED ABDU may not be the Dean Stanley of Islamism, and ABDALLAH NADIM the man of genius whom all respect and trust, and though, indeed, these three revolutionary leaders may not be so much superior to SHERIF, RIAZ, and NUBAR as Mr. BLUNT would have us suppose, still it is a painful thing that an English Liberal Government should have gone to war to crush their national aspirations.

Messrs. Osgood, of Boston, U.S., announce the "Private Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson from 1834 to 1872," edited by Mr. C. E. Norton.

AFTER DEATH.—I.

WE know, that is, we believe we know, that man is immortal. We found our belief, not on dogma or mathematical proof, but on analogy, on such probabilities as BUTLER so wisely demonstrates, on moral grounds, on the oldest known truths, and the last discoveries of science. We also believe that GOD has guided us in this world with supreme love and wisdom. His love and wisdom we certainly do not always see—but none the less trust—we trust that somehow good will be the final goal of ill. And we believe that He will continue to guide us after death with equal love and wisdom, so that (to quote the same poem) we shall rise on stepping-stones of our dead selves to higher things. But when we have got so far there is little more that we may be said safely to believe. All of us believe in heaven, but we do not care to define heaven, except in hyperbolic language, and with somewhat unmeaning metaphors. Few of us now believe in the undying torments of hell fire, or in him who—

Came to Paradise incog,
And gave the infant world a jog,
'Maist ruined 'a,

even while we recognise the extreme sinfulness of sin, the absolute need of a remedy, and the inexorable justice of GOD.

If, then, we know so little on the subject of life after death speculation might seem to be vain, because it is certain that man can never attain to knowledge constituted as he is. Not as he may be, when, perchance, he will be as far removed from his present condition as he now is removed from that of a highly intelligent animal. But inasmuch as the subject is one of almost vital importance, inasmuch as it is a necessity of our nature to wish to justify the ways of GOD to man, inasmuch as we have the warrant of the examples of DANTE, VIRGIL, and MILTON, in a somewhat fantastic fashion, and of the more spiritual yearnings and aspirations of SHAKESPEARE and TENNYSON, it would seem to be impossible to clip the wings of imagination, even if it were wise to attempt to do so.

When a man dies, says Orthodox Protestantism, he goes either to heaven or hell; to heaven if he has done or felt or believed such and such things, to hell if he has not done them. But this has not been the opinion of other religions, or even of the extreme schools and outcomes of Protestantism. To the one school, arguing for the honour and justice of GOD, the endless punishment of hell has seemed abominable and incredible; to the other "religion" has ceased to interest itself in GOD or a future life in any definite manner. As to these schools, which, approaching the subject from opposite sides, agree in suggesting annihilation as an explanation, something further may be said in a future article, but, at present, we set this explanation, which explains nothing, on one side.

If we look at other religions besides Protestantism, we see that the heart and mind of mankind have been troubled with another difficulty. It is easy enough to grant that those who are well-pleasing to GOD will receive the rewards of heaven, and that those who are absolutely rejected of GOD will "go to hell." But what of the vast intermediate portion of mankind, men with mixed motives, with good resolves and feeble executions, in whom there is a desire to do good, but sin is ever present, whose head is of fine gold and feet of iron and clay? All have come short of the glory of GOD; there is none good; no man hath seen GOD. What, again, of the weak and ignorant, of those who have been too hardly tried by sorrow or strong temptation? What of idiots and poor little microcosms who have died before they have seen the sun? Is it this world only that is "a state of probation?" Is there a clear demarcating line? Scientifically and morally it has seemed a gross blunder and crime to say so or think so. Even the stern, hard-headed Puritan, JOHN MILTON, hesitated to consign abortions, unbaptised infants, and idiots, like writhing worms, to everlasting anguish. Led by his classic feeling, even more, perhaps, than by his sense of justice or fitness, he followed his master, VIRGIL, in imagining for these and other such, a dreary "limbo of vanities," thereby lapsing from the strict tenets of his school.

Infantumque animæ flentes in limine primo;
Quos dulcis vitæ exsortes, et ab ubere raptos
Abstulit atra dies, et funere mersit acerbo.

But the Romish Church has wisely taken a bold leap in authoritatively creating the conception of purgatory, more or less material, punitive, and cleansing. We say "creating," for the few slight hints than can be gathered from Scripture to support such a notion are far more than balanced by most precise statements in the New Testament. We say "wisely," because without some such conception it is impossible for man, with his modern spirit and machinery of inquiry, to recognise GOD as either wise or just. It is so abundantly apparent that the vast majority of men are fit for neither heaven nor hell. They would not be at home in heaven, they would be strangely out of place in hell. They need the curative and purifying influences of Purgatory; or as VIRGIL says:—

Quin et supremo cum lumine vita reliquit,
Non tamen omne malum miseris, nec funditus omnes
Corporeæ excedunt pestes; penitusque necesse est
Multa diu concreta modis inolescere miris.
Ergo exercentur poenis, veterumque malorum
Supplicia expendunt. Aliae panduntur inanes
Suspensæ ad ventos; aliis sub gurgite vasto
Infectum eluitur scelus, aut exuritur igni;
Quisque suos patimur Manes.

Moreover, Purgatory is a key to unlock so many riddles. We no longer need the foolish expedient of "uncovenanted mercies," and hardly need the painful expedient of annihilation. It allows the eager longing we feel to pray for and plead for the dead. It reconciles us to the loss of friends and relations who have been dear to us, but whose lives have not been spotless, and whose professions have been far from orthodox. It does not limit "probation" (hateful word!) to this world, but gives opportunities of light and higher aspirations to savage and heathen nations. It gives us room to hope for many men living nobly for their country, great and self-sacrificing in their public offices, gratefully remembered and honourably buried, whose private lives have been sensual and corrupt. It opens out a sufficient sphere wherein the justice and mercy of GOD can act, distributing to every man according to his works, and helping every man according to his needs. "It is not in man," the Psalmist says, "to direct his steps," and it has not seemed a logical sequence that therefore he should be sent to hell. "Nay, but who art thou, O man, that repliest against GOD?" Well, if hell-fire, after all, is to be our portion, we may as well have the brief barren satisfaction of an absolutely unanswerable reply to GOD. But if this life is not our only probation, we no longer desire to reply against GOD, either for ourselves or others; love, trust, and reverence return, and we can feel that the everlasting arms are beneath us. Giving play to fancy, we can utilise the myriad worlds of the myriad systems of the universe as appointed homes of probation before birth or after death, and this little earth of ours sinks to its proper insignificance in space and in time.

And, lastly, this conception of purgatory affords a most telling and salutary argument to the conscience and common-sense of men:—"You, miserable, feeble, pitiable, contemptible wretch, who have at the eleventh hour been plucked as a brand from the burning, do you falsely and foolishly believe that you will get your penny like those who have borne the burden and heat of the day! Nay, your era of responsibility and struggle and life-giving pains (as of a woman giving birth to a man-child) are but begun. Have you even worked one hour?—you, who have saved the idle chaff of this 'last hour' from the self-seeking of the present world to devote it to the not less miserable self-seeking of 'getting salvation' for yourself!" Or again:—"You, poor child of GOD, who are conscious you are not fit for Heaven, and that therefore GOD could not give you the full fruition of His presence; you, who know that you deserve punishment at the hand of GOD, and that it would do you good; understand that GOD chasteneth every son whom He receiveth, and that he will surely punish you with such punishments as will be helpful to your spiritual life. You will not, and you do not wish to escape—rather it is a satisfaction to you to know that you cannot escape the righteous judgment of GOD." Or, once more:—"You, awful sufferer from vain compunction and remorse, on whose soul the heavy burden of the ruin of the souls of others rests—whether by hate, or cruelty, or the slow reaching corruption of lust—know that even for you there is comfort. The souls whose ruin you are responsible for are not irredeemably ruined and lost, and it will be your task and painful happiness to bring them with you before the throne of GOD, to work out your own and their redemption till you hear the voice of GOD saying—'Enter ye into the joy of your Lord.'"

The writer hopes to pursue these speculations in other articles. At present, he only adds one word to define his position. This is not an attempt to prove the truth, but the reasonableness of a belief in a spiritual purgatory. It is an explanation of difficulties that require explanation. It may not be the wisest explanation, but some explanation there must be. Other hypotheses have been offered with more or less of authority, and these remain to be considered. H. C.

HUNGARIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

CHARLES LORING BRACE IN HUNGARY.

This gentleman, from New York, the celebrated author of "Hungary, 1851," and the "Founder of the Children's Aid Society," has spent recently a few days in the capital of Hungary. The distinguished author, and our warm friend, is now visiting Hungary for the third time. After the War of Independence he came in 1851 to study the institutions of the country, but being the first American in Eastern Hungary, the Austrian Government suspected him of being an agent of the exiles in America for the purpose of arousing another revolution. He was thrown into prison in the old castle of Nagy-Várád, where he was confined a month, but was released by the strong interposition of the American Ambassador in Vienna, Mr. McCurdy.

He subsequently spent some time visiting the old castles and gentry of Transylvania, especially at Véc Castle with Baron Kemény, and with Count Nemes at Rigwid. He also visited Kronstadt, his old prison, and his fellow prisoner in Nagy-Várad. It is well to be mentioned that our kind guest was arrested while enjoying the Hungarian hospitality at dinner at Mr. F. Nagy's, a lawyer. Mr. Brace was in a very deplorable condition in prison, which was in some measure relieved by the interesting conversation of the Protestant minister, the Rev. Joseph Nagy. As a result of his visit he published the very interesting work "Hungary, 1851," but on account of its liberal views it was confiscated through the order of censorship, and only one copy could be saved in the Library of the Debrecen College.

The people of Kolozsvár also had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Brace, for he spent a few days there, having interviews with the Calvinist and Unitarian bishops, and the University professors, seeking information with regard to the legal position of women in the history of Hungary with reference to an extended history which he is writing of "Humane Progress under Christianity."

Professor J. Kovács, who has formed an English Conversation Club, summoned the members to the Uj-Világ (New World), to offer a hearty welcome to Mr. Brace, whom we did not regard as a stranger, but a well-known friend of Hungary, where we spent a very pleasant evening. Mr. Charles L. Brace especially was quite charmed to be able to speak in his own language in a distant land. We had an interesting conversation on topics of all kind, and proposed a toast to the health of our distinguished guest.

PROFESSOR JOHN KOVÁCS.

HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.—All the Hungarian papers have welcomed the visit of Professor John Kovács to the United States of America, and the following extracts are taken from the Ellenzék (Radical) and the Magyar Polgar (Hungarian citizen) of Kolozsvár, the Pesti-Naph (Daily News of Pest), and the Protestant Ecclesiastical and School Paper of Budapest. On the 13th of August the Representative Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians unanimously decided to send a delegate to the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, which will take place on the 18th of September at Saratoga. The Rev. John Kovács, Principal of the Unitarian College and Professor of the English language and literature at the University of Kolozsvár, was appointed as a representative, who represented the Hungarian Unitarians in the past year, also at the anniversary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London. No doubt this friendly communication, which lately has almost become continuous between the English, American and Hungarian Unitarians, is of a great advantage and use to Hungary at large. Hungary is almost unknown even now to the greater part of foreign countries, and the English, American and Hungarian Unitarian friendship may do useful services to form a correct idea of Hungary. Alex. Farkas, from Bölön, a Unitarian, visited first the American Unitarians in 1831. In 1873 a Conference was held at Budapest by the English, American and Hungarian Unitarians, when the Channing and Priestley professorships were established. The Rev. E. E. Hale, the Rev. R. S. Morison in 1873, and in the last year Professor J. H. Allen personally visited the Hungarian Unitarians, and gave interesting reports of their visits to Hungary. Professor Kovács is now to return these kind visits, and no doubt he will be an able representative, as he speaks the English language remarkably well, and is well acquainted with the people of England and America. The Minister of Education has also given him especial instructions to study the system of education in the United States, and for this purpose he takes commendatory letters to the managers and principals of the educational institutions of the Union. We hope that Professor Kovács's visit will do much towards strengthening the cordial sympathy between American and Hungarian Unitarians, which has already formed a close bond between two great and free nations. God bless him and give him success in his labours!

M. EUGENE REVILLIOT, assistant keeper of the Egyptian Museum at the Louvre and the first demotic scholar in Europe, has received a mission from the French Government to examine the demotic papyri in the British Museum and also those at Dublin.

Occasional Notes.

A REMARKABLE sermon, entitled "A Misinterpreted Proof Text," by the Rev. J. B. Heard, a clergyman of the Church of England, appeared in a recent number of the Christian World Pulpit. Mr. Heard, in a clear and convincing style, gives exactly the same interpretation as Unitarians do of a text in the Epistle to the Ephesians which has for long ages past been used as a scriptural proof of the natural depravity of man. The phrase "children of wrath" has constantly been cited in support of "the Augustinian doctrine that men are born into the world as the children of God's wrath." Whatever may or may not be the soundness of that dark and gloomy doctrine, it seems to us that Mr. Heard conclusively shows that it is not to be found in this much-abused text, in which the reference is not to the "wrath of God," as is commonly assumed, but to the "wicked, passionate impulse" of man. The context so distinctly points to this as the true meaning of the expression that it seems surprising that it could have been interpreted in any other way, especially as the meaning suggested by the context is grammatically and idiomatically allowable. Mr. Heard justly remarks: "What a relief it is, then, to anxious souls who trust in the Father of Spirits to know that if by nature we are the children of wrath, it is the wrath or passion of our own nature, and not of the Divine Being. This passion is the very disease from which Christ has come to redeem us."

AN æsthetic lady, of Boston, U.S., describes Mr. Henry Irving as follows:—"Mr. Irving's limbs are limpid and utter, both are delicately intellectual, but his left leg is a poem." Mr. Oscar Wilde, too, the "æsthete," is very strong in legs and yellow stockings. Almost might he say with Malvolio, "She did commend my yellow stockings of late—she did praise my leg."

AN enigmatical announcement appears in the Literary World that a learned dissenting D.D. is preparing for the press a work on the character of David. His idea is that the royal psalmist is a very much overrated man. We unfortunately have no means of ascertaining what David would think of his learned dissenting critic, but probably he might retort in very much the same terms. However, we shall see; and if we receive a copy of the book we shall be prepared to vindicate the literary reputation of the royal psalmist.

GLASGOW boasts a comic journal, certainly very well got up, rejoicing in the title Quiz. We learn from it that Dr. Wallace, formerly Professor of Church History in Edinburgh University, then editor of the Scotsman, is studying for the English Bar. It tells us that since the Doctor has left the Cockburn-street sanctum he has been living in London, devoting his time and talents to literary work.

DR. WENDELL PRIME, in the columns of an American journal, describes a lecture he heard Max Müller deliver last May at Cambridge. Dr. Prime writes:—"In speaking of the numerous stories which are found in the early Oriental writings, Professor Müller said that the Hebrew story of the Judgment of Solomon had never impressed him pleasantly; on the contrary, that he instinctively shuddered at the proposal to divide the infant. He had read the story as related by the Buddhists in another form. When two women claimed the same child, the king refused to decide the quarrel, saying, 'Let them take it away.' In the violent struggle that ensued the boy was hurt, when the true mother revealed herself by saying, 'Let him go,' for she could not hear him cry. 'This,' said the professor, 'seems to me to reveal a deeper knowledge of human nature than the wisdom of Solomon.' Though applause was very frequent throughout the lecture, I observed that this tilt at Solomon was received in perfect silence. And I think it was not merely because Solomon was so popular, but because the judgment of the audience was decidedly with Solomon and not with the Professor. As the lecturer told the story, it seemed to the average person as if the Buddhist king utterly failed to appreciate the situation, and that his incapacity by a kind Providence led to the revelation of the truth. I am sure that no one in the audience thought any less of the wisdom of Solomon, whatever they may have thought of the wisdom of Professor Müller in this particular."

A MONUMENT with the following inscription has recently been erected in Brompton Cemetery: "In memory of Elizabeth Jones, who died May 18, 1881, for 14 years the faithful servant and friend of Alexandra, Princess of Wales, by whom this monument is erected:

'Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's crown well won;
Now comes rest.'

'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.'

BOSTON, MASS., U.S.A., is, as everyone knows, or ought to know, the "hub" of the Universe. An amusing story is told illustrating the absurd view taken by some Bostonians of their importance. Two young ladies, residents of that city, were one day taking a walk in the suburbs, when they came to a milestone, on which was the inscription

M. M.
FRO BOSTON.

Stopping in front of this stone, they debated why it had been placed there, and finally came to the conclusion that it had been erected to the memory of some person whose grave was close by. But the meaning of the inscription puzzled them. At last a bright thought struck one of the ladies. "Of course," she said, it means "I'm from Boston! How simple! and how sufficient!"

WE have noticed from time to time the attempts of some eccentric writers to prove the identity of "the snub-nosed" Anglo-Saxons, as Disraeli justly terms us, with the aquiline-nosed children of Israel. The Jewish Chronicle has the following "note" referring to this subject:—

"Among the innocent amusements of the week is a publication called the 'British Israel and Judah's Prophetic Messenger,' the organ of those who believe in the identification of the Lost Ten Tribes with the Anglo-Saxons. We regard the theory with compassionate tenderness. Its adherents are very zealous, and their zeal is as harmless as it is misguided. The latest direction in which their zeal is being directed is the exploration of Tara, the famous hill in Meath, Ireland, which marks the site of the place of assembly of the ancient Irish kings, princes, and bards. But our identification friends believe that in the great mound lie buried 'the title deeds of the Prophet Jeremiah,' the Ark of the Covenant, &c. Money is being actively raised to defray the expenses of the exploration of Tara. £170 16s. 9d. has already been collected. One zealous collector bids smokers give up the filthy habit because 'the Prophet Jeremiah, who hid the precious things, did not smoke, neither should those who may be engaged to find them.'"

HASTINGS.—The Rev. James Ruddle has resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian Christian Church, South-terrace, and will close his ministry here last Sunday in November.

THE POPE AND SCIENCE.—Pope Leo XIII. has decided to found a library for the use of Catholic scientific institutes, and particularly for the Pontifical Academy of the Lincei. It is to be installed in the Altemps Palace. With this purpose several collections have been acquired, among them that of Professor Feliciani, containing a rich collection of works on surgery. This was purchased at a cost of 25,000 francs.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS AND CO., HOMEOPATHIC CHEMISTS, LONDON." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, Gordon Holmes, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Records of Later Life. By Frances Anne Kemble. Three Vols. 2nd Edition. London: Richard Bentley and Son. 1882.

Readers of the previously published work by the same author, "Record of a Girlhood," which appeared some few years ago, will remember that the writer broke her record off at the date of her marriage to an American gentleman named Butler. In the three interesting volumes before us she takes up the record from that date, that is in the year 1834, and brings it down to the year 1848. The "Records of Later Life" appear almost entirely in the shape of letters addressed to her friends on this side of the Atlantic, though these are interspersed now and then with notes of explanation, many of them full of amusing anecdote. There is, however, no preface, telling us under what circumstances these letters now come before the public, or introducing us to their recipients; so that we are left to form our own conclusions about them, and in some cases to guess who are the persons written to. Most of the letters are written to a lady, whom the author calls either "My dearest H—" or "My dearest Harriet, or "My Dear Hal"; who this correspondent was we are nowhere directly told, though it is clear that she was an Irish lady, a Miss St. Leger. And the same remark applies to letters addressed to "Dear Dorothy," "Dear Emily," and "Dear T—": we are left to find out from internal evidence that these mean respectively Miss Dorothy Wilson, Miss Emily Fitz Hugh and Mr. Theodore Sedgwick. There is another thing, too, that is rather aggravating, and that is the use of initials and blanks to indicate persons whose identity is thus very thinly veiled. For instance, Mr. Butler is either indicated by "J.B." or by a simple "—"; her sister's husband, Mr. Edward Sartoris, is usually "E—"; even her sister Adelaide is sometimes "A—," and we never get beyond the initials of her own children. If this practice were invariable, there would be this excuse for it, that the author from some feeling of delicacy or other reason desired to keep the identity of the person referred to a secret; but it is not so, and the reader has generally to refresh his memory as to whom the initials refer, which is somewhat disturbing. There has, too, been some careless editing in the third volume; for instance, while the "Records" profess to end at p. 422 with the author's return to America in the summer of 1848 there are letters introduced at pp. 294-7, written at York, one of which refers to the Crimean war, which certainly was not thought of till the beginning of the next decade. At page 312 there is a letter, written evidently in 1848—just after the death of Liston, the eminent surgeon—which precedes a letter written in 1847, while the letter which should follow it comes in at p. 416. Other letters, too, are placed out of date; for instance, letters referring to the author's acting come in after those relating to her public readings, though she gave up the former when she took to the latter. It is quite clear how these mistakes have arisen. In the first two volumes she appears to have adopted, in her correspondence, the business-like and sensible plan of putting the year as well as the day of the week and month at the head of her letters, but latterly she gave up this and frequently adopted the bad practice of simply putting the day of the week, or that of the month. These are, however, minor blemishes, and do not gravely detract from the general merits of the book. We mention them not so much with the desire of finding fault as in the hope that in later editions they will be corrected.

In a note to the first letter in the book, addressed to Mrs. Jameson, and giving her an account of her life just after her marriage—Mrs. Butler tells some amusing incidents connected with her early experiences of her American life. Going to it full of English notions of her duties, she soon found that she was making great blunders, wholly apart from her strongly marked sympathy for the slaves, and abolitionist proclivities. Her American experiences are, however, now rather out of date, and to English readers the great interest of the book will turn on the stories she tells of some of the persons with whom she was intimate in this country. It will not, however, be out of place in this paper to quote one or two passages relating to persons not wholly unknown to our readers. In a note to a letter to her friend Miss St. Leger, in which she refers to an expected visit from Dr. Channing, "whom I love and revere," she states that after her first introduction to him she was never within reach of him without enjoying the honour of his intercourse, and the privilege of hearing him, and she adds:—

"I retain a charmingly comical remembrance of the last visit I paid Dr. Channing at Newport, when, wishing to take me into his garden, and unwilling to keep me waiting while he muffled himself up, according to his necessary usual precautions, he caught up Mrs. Channing's bonnet and shawl, and sheltering his eyes from the glare of the sun by pulling the bonnet well down over his nose, and folding the comfortable female wrap (it was a genuine woman's shawl, and not an ambiguous plaid of either or no sex) well over his breast, he walked round and round his garden, in full view of the high road, discoursing with the peculiar gentle solemnity and deliberate eloquence habitual to him, on subjects the gravity of which were in laughable contrast with his costume, the absurdity of which only made me smile when it recurred to my memory after I had taken leave of him and ceased hearing his wise words."

There is another reference to Dr. Channing in the third volume, where she speaks of "a charming quiet chat" she had with Lord Ashburton and Lord Dacre, "during which they discussed the merits of Channing, and awarded him the most unmitigated praise, as a good and great man." She notes that while in America his opponents constantly charged him with want of practical knowledge about the political questions on which he wrote, "these two very distinguished Englishmen spoke with unqualified admiration of his sound and luminous treatment of such subjects, and, instancing what they considered his best productions, mentioned his letter to Clay upon the annexation of Texas, even before his moral and theological essays." Of Dr. Follen, too, she speaks in most affectionate terms. "I have never," she says, "seen anyone whom I revered, loved, and admired more than I did Dr. Follen." She adds, "His countenance was the reflection of his noble nature. My intercourse with him influenced my life while it lasted, and long after his death the thought of what would have been approved or condemned by him affected my actions." While living at Philadelphia she attended the Unitarian church there, the minister being Dr. Furness. Writing in June, 1843, she says:—

"I went to church yesterday, and Mr. F— preached an Abolition sermon. This subject seems to press more and more upon his mind, and he speaks more and more boldly upon it, in spite of having seen various members of his congregation get up and leave the church in the middle of one of his sermons, in which he adverted to the forbidden theme of slavery. Some of these, who had been members of the church from its earliest establishment, and were very much attached to him, expressed their regret at the course they felt compelled to adopt, and said if he would only give them notice when he intended to preach upon that subject they would content themselves with absenting themselves on those occasions only, to which his reply not unnaturally was, 'Why, those who would leave the church on those occasions are precisely the persons who are in need of such exhortations!' and, of course, he persevered. I think it will end by his being expelled by his congregation. It will be well with him wherever he goes; but, alas, for those he leaves! I expect to be forbidden to take S— (her child) to church, as soon as the report of yesterday's sermon gets noised abroad."

The theology our author imbibed while living in America, in friendship with these fathers of our faith there, no doubt largely affected her religious views. In her correspondence with Miss St. Leger, to whom she was most unreserved, there are many indications of this; and, if space permitted, we should gladly quote some of the passages in which she gives her views on matters pertaining to religion, not as a deep thinker on such subjects, but as one who had given them a fair share of attention. The third volume contains more than one reference to some great sorrow which had overtaken her, and this gives to several of the letters an undertone of sadness; at the same time, there is over and above this a cheery outlook arising from her religious faith, which is very refreshing and wholesome.

About two years after her marriage Mrs. Butler visited England, the voyage then taking eight and twenty days, and she then became acquainted with several of the most remarkable members of London society at that time. Among these were Lady Holland, Rogers, Sydney Smith, Henry and Charles Greville, Lady Morley, Macaulay and Mrs. Grote. Of these there are many amusing anecdotes told, most of which have not previously seen the light. Of Lady Holland no flattering account is given; indeed, it is difficult to understand, if what is here said of her be true, and not tinged with the dislike which Mrs. Butler had for her, how she could have so long held the position in the fashionable world that she did. At the same time, the picture corresponds to some extent with that hinted at in the memoirs of Miss Fox, recently reviewed in these columns. Of Sydney Smith, on the other hand, our author's reminiscences are of a more genial kind. Here is one of the stories she has to tell of him:—

"A question having arisen one evening at Miss Berry's as to the welcome Lady Sale would receive in London society after her husband's heroic conduct, and her heroic participation in it, during the Afghan war, Miss Berry, who for some reason or other did not admire Lady Sale as much as everybody else did, said she should not ask her to come to her house. 'Oh, yes! pooh! pooh! you will,' exclaimed Sydney Smith; 'you'll have her, he'll have her, they'll have her, we'll have her. She'll be Sale by auction!' Later on that same evening, it being asked what Lord Dalhousie would get for his successful exploit in carrying off the gates of some Indian town, 'Why,' cried Lady Morley, 'he will be created Duke Samson Afghanistes.'"

Every one knows that Sydney Smith said that but for "flashes of silence" intercourse with Macaulay would be impossible; but there is another story apropos of this not so well known. Once when Smith was so ill that great anxiety was felt about him by his friends, one of these called to see him, and on asking what sort of night he had had, Sydney Smith replied, "Oh, horrid, horrid, my dear fellow! I dreamt I was chained to a rock, and being talked to death by Harriet Martineau and Macaulay." Of Macaulay himself, writing in 1841, Mrs. Butler says, "he is like nothing in the world but Bayle's Dictionary, continued down to the present time, and purified from all objectionable matter. Such a Niagara of information did surely never pour from the lips of mortal man!"

Rogers made a less favourable impression on her than Sydney Smith, though she does credit to his good qualities. She says:—

"Rogers's keen-edged wit seemed to cut his lips as he uttered it; Sydney Smith's was without sting or edge or venomous point of malice, and his genial humour was really the overflowing of a kindly heart. Rogers's helpful benevolence and noble generosity to poor artists, poor authors, and all distressed whom he could serve or succour, was unbounded; he certainly had the kindest heart and the unkindest tongue of any one I ever knew. His benefits remind me of a comical story my dear friend Harness once told me, of a poor woman at whose lamentations over her various hardships one of his curates was remonstrating, 'Oh, come, come now, my good woman, you must allow that Providence has been, upon the whole, very good to you.' 'So He 'ave, sir; so He 'ave mostly. I don't deny it; but I sometimes think He 'ave taken it out in corns.' I think Rogers took out his benevolence, in some directions, in the corns he inflicted, or, at any rate trod upon, in others."

Mrs. Grote was one of Mrs. Butler's friends, and several visits were paid to her home at Burnham Beeches, the beautiful scenery round which, it is said, inspired Mendelssohn with much of the music of his "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mrs. Grote's taste in dress was, we are told, "slightly eccentric."

"The first time I ever saw her she was dressed in a bright brimstone-coloured silk gown, made so short as to show her feet and ankles, having on her head a white satin hat, with a forest of white feathers; and I remember her standing with her feet wide apart and her arms akimbo in this cos tume before me, and challenging me upon some political question, by which, and her appearance, I was much astonished and a little frightened. One evening she came to my sister's house dressed entirely in black, but with scarlet shoes on, with which I suppose she was particularly pleased, for she lay on a sofa with her feet higher than her head, American fashion, the better to display or contemplate them. I remember, at a party, being seated by Sydney Smith, when Mrs. Grote entered with a rose-coloured turban on her head, at which he suddenly exclaimed, 'Now I know the meaning of the word grotesque!' The mischievous wit professed his cordial liking for both her and her husband, saying, 'I like them, I like them; I like him, he is so ladylike; and I like her, she's such a perfect gentleman;' in which, however, he had been forestalled by a person who certainly n'y entendait pas malice, Mrs. Chorley, the meekest and gentlest of human beings, who, one evening, at a party at her son's house, said to him, pointing out Mrs. Grote, who was dressed in white, 'Henry, my dear, who is the gentleman in the white muslin gown?'

As we have already stated, Mrs. Butler held strong anti-slavery views, and there are several letters bearing upon this subject, which is now happily out of date, and therefore unnecessary for us to refer to. We must, however, quote one passage from a letter written to Mrs. Butler in 1843 by Miss Sedgwick, as it shows so clearly the curse of slavery:—

"I heard a story the other day, 'a true one,' that I treasured for you as racy, as characteristic of slavery and human nature. A most notoriously atrocious, dissolute, hellish slave-owner died, and one of his slaves—an old woman—said to a lady, 'Massa prayed God so to forgive him! Oh, how he prayed! And I am afraid God heard him; they say He's so good.'

In 1845 Mrs. Butler again visited England, but this time without her husband and children, and after a visit to her sister in Italy she returned to the stage. The reasons for this are not given, and we have no desire to surmise them. But the circumstances of her later visit differed so widely from those on the previous occasion that they naturally tinge the correspondence, and we therefore feel a preference for the first two volumes. They are all, however, very pleasant and agreeable reading, which those of our readers having a taste for this kind of literature will do well to be assured of, by getting the book for themselves, and not resting content with the extracts we have made.

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

The two chief monthly Reviews show no signs of "the dead season," and when we mention that Cardinal Manning, Alfred Tennyson, M. de Laveleye, Madame Novikoff, G. A. Simcox, and the Warden of Merton are the chief contributors to the Nineteenth Century, and C. F. Gordon Cumming, the Rev. J. L. Davies, Mr. E. A. Freeman and Cardinal Manning, again, to the Contemporary, it will be seen that we are instructed, as usual, by some of the foremost writers of the time, and, as will presently be seen, on some of the great questions of the day.

The Nineteenth Century opens with Mr. Tennyson's invocation "To Virgil," written at the request of the Mantuan's for the nineteenth centenary of Virgil's death. It is not one of the poet's best efforts, and will be read with appreciation only by classical scholars. The ten stanzas comprise one long sentence, beginning:—

Roman Virgil, thou that singest
Ilion's lofty temples robed in fire,
Ilion falling, Rome arising,
Wars and filial faith, and Dido's pyre;
Landscape-lover, lord of language,
More than he that sang the Works and Days,
All the chosen corn of fancy
Flashing from out many a golden phrase;

Thou that seest Universal
Nature moved by Universal mind;
Thou majestic in thy sadness
At the doubtful doom of human kind.

And ending:—

Now the Rome of slaves hath perished
And the Rome of freemen holds her place,

I, from out the Northern Island
Sunder'd once from all the human race,
I salute thee, Mantovano,
I that loved thee since my day began,
Wielder of the stateliest measure
Ever moulded by the lips of man.

There is more theology than usual in this month's Reviews. In both, the new and somewhat perplexing book "Natural Religion," by the author of Ecce Homo is discussed; in the Nineteenth Century by Mr. G. A. Simcox, who dwells upon the limitations of the book and affirms that "there is nothing of the abounding buoyancy of conviction which made Ecce Homo rather oppressive to readers who were not carried away by it;" and in the Contemporary, by the Rev. J. L. Davies, who points out that "whatever profit may be derivable from it, there is no class of readers to whom it professes to offer comfort." There are, he adds in conclusion, three convictions to which it seems to give utterance. (1) Religion is indispensable to human life, and we are in grave danger from the want of it; (2) Supernatural religion the world seems resolved not to have. We must try, therefore, what can be done in the way of constructing a Natural Religion; (3) Natural Religion is found on inquiry to be unable to do the necessary work of Religion and Nature; the object of its worship will not feed the instincts which are man's higher life. The reviewer asks in conclusion:—

"What, then, remains? The question, a question of life or death for mankind, whether Christians can be roused and inspired to meet and recognise Science, to do justice to the cravings of art, and to cultivate the highest and most humane morality, in the faith that there is a God whose garment is nature, but whose heart has been revealed in His Son Jesus Christ. Such a religion, natural and supernatural in one, would be that of which our author has been really in search."

In the Nineteenth Century Cardinal Manning, in an article on "Parliamentary Oaths," has a rather inconclusive reply to Lord Sherbrooke's argument in the previous number for sweeping away the whole system of oaths and affirmations as useless and pernicious, and as sanctioning a superstitious invocation of the curse of God. The Cardinal contends, that unless we recognise God by Act of Parliament we are covertly excluding Him from the counsels and the common weal of England; and he further takes Lord Redesdale's precious Bill as well on the Almighty under his sacred patronage. As historical and social questions often bear closely upon religion, we may briefly mention under this heading the interesting account of "Merton College Before the Reformation," by its Warden, the Hon. G. C. Brodrick; and the "Temperance Movement in Russia," a very interesting account of a growing social movement. But we cannot but regret that the writer has weakened the force of her article by the sophistical defence of the Judenhetze, both in Russia and Germany. The remaining contributions to this Review, which we can only briefly enumerate, are "The Egyptian Revolution, a Personal Narrative," by Wilfrid S. Blunt, who proclaims himself a warm personal friend of Arabi, and is in evident sympathy with the enemy; "Parisian Newspapers," an exhaustive account of the Metropolitan Press, by M. Joseph Reinach; "Count Cavour on Ireland," in which P. H. Bagenal shows by translations and quotations how clearly the eminent Italian statesman foresaw the present social and political crisis, and advocated, among other remedies, the development of commerce and industry, and the reform of the land laws; "Exploration in Greece," a brief account of recent excavations, by A. S. Murray; "The Laws of War," the concluding part of the admirable paper by M. Emile de Laveleye; and "The Country Gentleman," a threnody in prose, by Mr. C. Milnes Gaskell, over the misfortunes brought upon that once prosperous class by the agricultural distress.

Returning to the Contemporary Cardinal Manning contributes an article more to the purpose than his paper in the Nineteenth Century on "The Salvation Army." He computes that while the Established Church and the Nonconformist bodies have an equal number of adherents, there is a residuum of millions outside of any religious body, over whom religion has no power. "To such a population a voice crying aloud in God's name is as a warning in the night." The Cardinal contends, however, that the action of the Salvation Army is deplorably below the mental conception of it, given in its own professions, and his fears for this zealous movement greatly overbalance the hopes. There are two other theological articles, "Is Judaism a Tribal Religion?" a plea for a reformed Judaism as the basis of a comprehensive and universal religion, by the highly-cultured Jewish writer, Mr. Claude Montefiore; and "Natural Selection and Natural Theology," by Dr. Eustace R. Conder, who assumes that Natural Selection, as well as Organic Evolution, are scientifically true, and commands our assent when he contends that even upon that supposition the doctrines of Natural Theology are not even in the slightest degree shaken, while he omits to recognise that its attitude towards the human intellect on the one side and towards the universe on the other has been considerably modified, and to our mind strengthened, by these scientific principles. The remaining articles, which require no particular comment, are "Wheat, Wine and Wool," by the experienced traveller C. F. Gordon Cumming, who glorifies California at the expense of the now popular Manitoba; "The Austrian War against Publicity," by Arthur J. Evans, a newspaper correspondent and literary man, who tells from his own experience a striking story of Austrian tyranny and censorship over the post; "The Origin of Government," a philosophico-political paper, by Mr. J. Dove Wilson; "Married Women in Factories," a reply by W. Cooke Taylor to the late Stanley Jevons's condemnation of that form of labour in a recent article of the same Review; "The Radical and Revolutionary Parties in Europe," a vivid sketch of the rapidly growing democracy in all the European countries, by the veteran republican Karl Blind; and, finally, "The Place of Carlisle in English History," a delightful and instructive historico-archæological paper, by Professor E. A. Freeman.

Of the two Reviews the Nineteenth Century has this month the most popular interest, while its rival has at least four articles of far more than ordinary value.

More Magazines.

Blackwood contains two admirable biographical sketches of very opposite personages—Rachel, the tragedian, and Hogg, the "Ettrick Shepherd." The story of Rachel's early performances and triumphs is told with much spirit. Her Phèdre, the critic says, stands out in solitary splendour; for the attempts of Ristori and of Sarah Bernhardt in the part are "unworthy to be named in the same breath." They only served to mark how wide is the difference between the "merely picturesque and practised actress and her in whom the intuitions of genius are disciplined and fortified by the resources of art."

The writer of the delightful sketch of Hogg regards that eccentric genius as the most remarkable of the three heroes of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." An odder compound of genius, simplicity, conceit, and candid egotism never lived, he thinks, than the peasant who became the associate, and frequently the butt, of all the men of talent who knew him. The following was Hogg's method of composition:—

"I had no method of learning to write, save by following the Italian alphabet; and though I always stripped myself of coat and vest when I began to pen a song, yet my wrist took cramp, so that I could rarely make above four or six lines at a sitting. I folded and stitched a few sheets of paper, which I carried in my pocket. I had no ink-horn; but in place of it I borrowed a small phial, which I fixed in a hole in the breast of my waistcoat; and having a cork fastened by a piece of twine, it answered the purpose fully as well. Thus equipped, whenever a leisure minute or two offered, I sat down and wrote out my thoughts as I found them."

There is a curious article on the "Mahdy," the future guide of Islam, and the deliverer predicted by the Prophet, of whom the writer says:—"We must never forget that, though his coming is but a dream, it is nevertheless a dream which in the devout East may any day become a reality, and give rise to new forces as yet dormant in the Moslem world."

The Cornhill has an attractive article on "The Literary Restoration," an able review of English literature from 1790 to 1830, a period which has lately been dealt with by Mrs. Oliphant in her "Literary History:"—

"The leading and distinctive characteristic of the period was the restoration of the imaginative element to both literature and religion. Banished by the English Revolution, she was restored to us, qua minime serio, by the French. Imagination has held her own against all the rival forces in the field. The strength of the great reaction has not yet spent itself. George Eliot, writing forty years afterwards, is the natural exponent, in fiction, of one branch of it, as Scott was of the other. Froude, Carlyle, and Tennyson have maintained the protest—the protest of Wordsworth, of Burke, and of Scott—the protest which it is the privilege of literature, and should be its chief glory, to hand down—against utilitarianism, optimism, and epicureanism."

Mr. Symonds contributes some historical memoirs of the Duchy of Urbino, and Mr. G. Allen, from the names on a visiting card as a text, gives us an interesting philological article. The writer of the article on "The Moors and Forests of the North" traces the difference which exists between life in the wild North country as it is now, and as it was two or three generations ago.

Macmillan's Magazine has the continuation of Mr. Julian Hawthorne's serial, and Mr. F. Pollock has an elaborate article on the "History of the English Land Laws." With the exception of a short poem, all the other articles are on religious subjects, a significant indication of the influence which religion is exercising in an age which is rapidly outgrowing traditional dogmas. Mr. A. Lewis describes from personal experience the operations of the Salvation Army, which, he thinks, has been undeniably a vast influence for good throughout the country. Principal Shairp describes "The Hades of Virgil;" and the author of the strangely beautiful story of the unseen world, entitled, "The Little Pilgrim," which appeared in Macmillan for May, continues her vision under the title "The Little Pilgrim goes up Higher."

The Century—a well-known American periodical published also in London—gives a striking portrait of "Mark Twain," with a paper, by Mr. Howell, on his work and place in the American literature of the day. There are copiously illustrated papers on "Thomas Bewick," "Ocean Steam Ships," "An Old Town with a History," "The Original Rebecca n' Ivanhoe," &c.

The Congregationalist gives a portrait of Mr. R. S. Hudson, a munificent supporter of Congregational enterprise. There is a carefully-balanced and judicious paper on "The Salvation Army," and there are a good many pungent and vigorous notes and comments on passing events.

Short Notices.

Heart-Faith is the very suitable title of a sermon preached in the New Meeting-house, Kidderminster, on Sunday, July 16, 1882, by Dr. Andrew P. Peabody, Professor of Christian Morals, and Preacher to Harvard University, Boston, U.S.A., and published at a local printing-office. Dr. Peabody's characteristics as a preacher and somewhat conservative thinker are well known, and we need only quote one or two passages as an interesting illustration of the general tone of this admirable sermon. Its main purpose is to recommend faith of the heart in the essential verities of Christianity, as contrasted with mere intellectual belief in mere words and in prepositions about Christianity which may have very little influence on character and life. The preacher justly says:—"These two kinds of faith make very different demands as to their objects. The cravings of the two might be represented by the terms many and much. Faith in words wants to have the words multiplied—the articles of the creed as numerous as they can be, the more the better. It is with a believer of this class as it is with some dyspeptics, who eat to excess because they crave nourishment, and their food does not nourish them. The believer in words is not fed by them, yet always imagines that if he can swallow more of them his hunger will be satisfied. Faith in the contents of words, on the other hand, while rejecting no healthful and nourishing truths, has no inducement to multiply dogmas, so infinite and exhaustless is the import of any one truth appertaining to the everlasting God and the immortal soul. Thus is verified and realised our Saviour's figure of faith as a grain of mustard seed. It may be, as to its subject matter, containable in a single word, and that word an aspiration; nothing more. Yet, if taken into the heart, it may grow into a vast and fruitful life-tree, in which the birds of the upper air, the angel-thoughts that God sends, may find perpetual lodgment."

Dr. Peabody points out that "there is no efficacy, no working power in a creed of negatives, though every one of them be the negation of a falsehood; and he goes on to show that there is an element of truth underlying ancient errors which may account for their influence in the world:—"What I have said may account for the immense sanctifying and working power which we sometimes see associated with what we cannot but regard as gross errors. It is not the errors that do the work; but if there be blended with them a mere mustard seed of divine truth, and that lie deep in the heart, there is no limit to its efficacy. There is in the theological belief of the Evangelist Moody much which not only you or I might term detestable, but which even sensible Calvinists regard as barbarous and obsolete. But no one can listen to him without perceiving that he has an intense heart-faith in the ever present God, in Christ as an all-sufficient Saviour, and in the life-everlasting; and through this faith he has awakened untold thousands to spiritual life, fruitfulness, and joy. It is the contents of true words alone that can be the members of a positive faith, and this is the only faith which can issue in what St. Paul in our text calls righteousness, or rightness—a term which includes every virtue, every spiritual grace, all of the God-like that man can be. Nor is there one of us possessing any belief in spiritual things, or so much as a transient apprehension of anything that is more than fleshly and earthly, who is not sacredly bound to furnish heart-room for that belief or apprehension, that it may make him what it means, in spirit and character, in word and deed."

We must add one more glowing passage in which Dr. Peabody shows that heart-faith is the only possible basis of union among Christians of differing names and forms:—"We, Christians of different sects, while we cannot repeat one another's creeds, are always glad to sing one another's hymns. Why is this? It is because hymns are never made out of the creeds, which, though, like the Athanasian Creed, they have sometimes been put into barbarous metre, yet utterly lack the qualities of lyric poetry; while the broad and vast truths which the creeds cramp and distort in the attempt to define them, and which are the common property of all Christians, can flow freely from the heart that feels them in sacred song, which is pre-eminently the language of the heart. Thus there is not a hymn in English speaking Christendom to which all the leading sects have not furnished contributions. The glorious old hymns in the Roman Catholic service-book may be heard in many a church which rings not unfrequently with anathemas against the mystic Babylon. The sacred songs of the Wesleys, bathed in the dew and sparkling in the sunlight of fervent devotion find favour alike in the Established Church which impoverished itself by casting their writers out of its pale, and in our own religious communion, whose belief the Wesleys would have deemed rank heresy. The Christmas hymns of Sears, Mrs. Barbauld's sweet and tender lyrics, Bowring's "In the Cross of Christ I glory," and still oftener "Nearer my God to Thee," give voice to the earnest prayer and ecstatic praise of congregations in which Unitarians, as such, are held in the meanest repute. Heart-faith in God, and Christ, and heaven, has all over Christendom the same pulse-beat of reverence, gratitude, and worship, leads the same rhythmical march of duty, inspires like works of love, and blends earnest souls in unnumbered mutual sympathies; and therefore there is a common heart-language for all who truly love and follow their Lord." We are greatly indebted to Mr. Carey Walters and his congregation for the publication of this admirable sermon.

English Proverbs. By E. B. Mawer. (London: Kerby and Endean.)—(Bucuresci: Depuse Spre Venzare, La Iste Librarile. 1882.)—The Rumanian language being so rich in proverbs and quaint sayings the author of this beautifully got-up little book has been tempted to collect a few of the former, and annex to each the corresponding one in English, French and German, with the view of exemplifying the different manner of expressing the same ideas in these different languages. The task thus self-imposed has been so excellently carried out that a book of much interest has been the result.

The Remote Antiquity of Man not Proven: Primeval Man not a Savage. By B. C. Y. (London: Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row.)—This work professes to be an argument based on scientific facts, and supported by scientific opinion. The author fears it may be thought presumptuous for one who is outside the fellowship of scientific societies to dispute conclusions arrived at by a large array of scientific celebrities; but, he says, that man is of remote antiquity is not a scientific fact. He, moreover, "cannot find one fact which will prove that a longer time is required than the Bible chronology will admit." It is difficult to see what is here meant when it is added that "Bible chronology, however, does not mean 6,000 years." While the book is free from the theological rancour which too often characterises the discussion of this and kindred subjects from the orthodox side, it is very clear that the author is bound down to early Jewish notions. For ourselves the class of facts, of which Professor Dawkins gave such an excellent résumé at the recent meeting of the British Association, are abundantly sufficient to justify the position of very nearly the whole world of scientific explorers in this direction—a position which the author of this book attacks without success.

Literary Notes.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW announce for immediate publication a new book by Lady Brassey, entitled "Tahiti." It will be illustrated with autotypes, after photographs taken specially by Colonel Stuart Wortley.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN, AND Co. announce a new monthly magazine, to be published at sixpence. The first number will appear on November 1st. Leaving the discussion of politics and religion to the established Reviews, it will be devoted mainly to pure literature, especially of a light character. The title of this new venture will be Longman's Magazine.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, AND Co. will publish almost immediately an édition de luxe of Mr. R. D. Blackmore's masterpiece, "Lorna Doone," being the twentieth edition in a period of eighteen years. It will have full-page illustrations of scenes, events, characters &c., from drawings made on the spot by Mr. W. Small, and engraved by Mr. J. D. Cooper; and also chapter headings and initial letters by Mr. W. H. J. Boot, consisting of views in Devon and Somerset.

GREAT preparations are being made at Assisi to celebrate this winter the seventh centenary of the birth of St. Francis. It is hoped that a speech will be delivered on the occasion by the veteran historian, Cesare Cantù.

MESSRS. OSGOOD AND Co., of New York, announce that they will issue in November an overlooked and hitherto absolutely unknown romance by Nathaniel Hawthorne, of about the length of "The Scarlet Letter." The MS. of it seems to have long been curiously lost from the great American writer's other papers. It is regarded by those who have glanced through it as a work of surpassing power and interest, turning upon the claim of an American to some English estates, the scene being laid on both our own and British shores. Julian Hawthorne will furnish the preface.

THE second edition of "Natural Religion" is at press. It will contain a full Preface, in which the author answers some of the objections of some of his critics.

THE Academy says that Dr. Menendez Pelayo, the eloquent professor at Madrid, has just published, as the tenth volume of the series entitled "Arte y Letras," a new translation into Spanish of the "Odes" of Horace, illustrated by several of the best-known Catalan artists.

THE new Scottish quarterly will make its appearance towards the end of November next. Promises of co-operation have been received from well-known hands in all departments.

"EL'S CHILDREN: the Chronicles of an Unhappy Family," is the title of Mr. Manville Fenn's new story now passing through the press.

THE Academy understands that James Thompson, the author of "The City of Dreadful Night"—and whose mournful death occurred a few weeks back—has left several poems and critical essays in manuscript. His prose remains include essays on Heine and Shelly. The publication of these works has not yet been definitely arranged for. It is probable, however, that the prose will be published before the poems.

MR. CECIL BENDALL, Fellow of Caius College, is likely to be appointed Assistant in the Oriental Department of Printed Books at the British Museum in succession to the late Dr. Haas.

THE city of Basel has just lost the oldest representative of one of its distinguished literary families in the person of Obersthelfer Abel Burckhardt, who died at the age of ninety-seven. He studied theology at Berlin under Schliermacher. Together with the brothers Wackernagel, of Berlin, Professor J. J. Herzog, of Erlangen, and the late Professor Bluntschli, of Heidelberg, he was one of the founders of the so-called "Nameless Society for the Cultivation of Literature."

DR. ABEL, of Berlin, will be in Oxford in October next to deliver the Ilchester lectures.

MR. W. M. RAMSAY has been fortunate enough to obtain five Kappadokian cuneiform tablets, together with a scarab and a terra-cotta whorl, closely resembling those found by Dr. Schliemann at Troy. He has also examined two curious stones discovered between Amasia and Amisos. They are covered with rude reliefs of an extraordinary description. One of them represents a king and attendants in the "Hittite" dress receiving some prisoners, whose costume Mr. Ramsay would call Phrygian. Above the scene is a cuneiform inscription of five lines, which are separated from one another like the lines of the Hittite texts.

MESSRS. LONGMAN AND Co. will issue next November the first number of the new magazine we mentioned some time ago. The title is Longman's Magazine. Each number will consist of from 100 to 128 pages, and the price will be sixpence. Among the contributors will be Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. Anstey, the author of "Vice Versâ," Mr. W. Black, Lady Brassey, Professor Bryce, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Froude, Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. W. D. Howells, Professor Huxley, Miss Ingelow, Mrs. Oliphant, Dr. Smiles, Mr. L. Stevenson, Mr. Julian Sturgis, and Professor Tyndall.

NEARLY half a century ago the well-known "Vale of Lanherne" was published with an illustration from the pencil of the wife of the author, who is still living. Messrs. Longman have just issued a cheap and elegant edition of "Restormel," by Henry Sewell Stokes, with a pretty picture of the famous castle near Lostwithiel, "the glory of its parish," executed by the author's youngest daughter. The present is a republication of the issue of 1875 (reviewed in these columns), with a supplemental note on the assassination of the Czar. Mr. Stokes endorses the just and eloquent judgment of the Pall Mall Gazette: "The din of faction and the smoke of battle have obscured his true greatness, but history will record few greater names among the crowned reformers of the world than that of the man who fell yesterday." The poetry of Mr. Stokes is eminently original, and confers lustre on the West—

"The child is genuine, you may trace Throughout, the sire's transmitted face."

HOSPITAL SATURDAY.—The ninth annual collection on behalf of the hospitals and dispensaries was made in London on Saturday, and it is understood that the total will exceed that of any previous years. There were more than a thousand volunteer collectors in the streets of the metropolis, most of them being ladies. At Hyde-park-corner a member of the Norfolk family, Lady Catherine Howard, had charge of a station, with the chair, table, and other appliances supplied from Apsley House by direction of the Duke of Wellington. Ladies of title were also to be found seated outside Marlborough and Clarence Houses, St. James's, supplied with the furniture and fittings from the Royal Household. In the City the Hon. Mrs. Clay took her seat in front of the Mansion House, whilst the wives of several City merchants, and even bankers, were not above doing duty in aid of the charitable object. As a further evidence of the interest taken in the movement by the wealthier classes, Sir Cyril Scott, one of the principals connected with the National Provincial Bank, early in the day had a luncheon provided for the ladies who had taken charge of the boxes within a considerable circuit of the City. Traders and shopkeepers not only provided tables and chairs for the ladies who had charge of the boxes, but placed them in a sheltered position.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT SOUTHAMPTON.

We are indebted to the Times for a valuable résumé of the work of the Association during its week's session at Southampton. The presidents, lecturers, and readers of papers (remarks our contemporary) evidently made strenuous efforts to show that British science had suffered no collapse after the excitement of last year, and that there is abundant evidence of continued and fresh work on the part of British workers in science, of the ceaseless multiplication of lines of research, and of the rapid strides in advance in the old directions. The President, Dr. Siemens, in his address, showed some of the vast advances which have in recent years been made in applying the results obtained in the laboratory and observatory to the ever-increasing wants of humanity. Dr. Siemens has by no means abandoned his hypothesis as to the nature of the solar activity and its interplanetary connections; on the contrary, he thinks the position confirmed by more recent researches, and especially by the spectroscopical results obtained at high altitudes on the Alps and in America by Captain Abney and Professor Langley, as, also, at the late eclipse observed in Egypt. He is of opinion that these observations seem to indicate that stellar space is no vacuity, or only filled with "ether," which is next to nothing, but is pervaded by hydrocarbon and possibly aqueous vapours, establishing a material continuity between the sun and his planets.

THE SPECTROSCOPE.

The truth or otherwise of Dr. Siemens's hypothesis would probably be ultimately tested by the spectroscope—an instrument in some respects the most potent and widely-useful weapon in all the armoury of science. In the hands of the astronomer it can tell us what is going on in the sun and the condition of the most distant stars, and in the hands of the analyst it can detect the adulteration of the commonest articles of food. At the recent eclipse calcium and hydrogen were detected in the sun's corona, and the spectrum showed lines which the astronomers cannot yet read. Dr. Schuster suggested that the changes which are noticed in the form of the corona may be partly due to the fact that it is of meteoric origin, to some extent a revival of a theory at one time popular, that the sun itself was maintained in fuel by the groups of meteors spread all over the system. One great difficulty in solar spectroscopy is to detect what really belongs to the sun and what originates either in the earth's atmosphere, or in the space which separates us from the central light. If Dr. Siemens's hypothesis is correct, it will be no easy matter to penetrate the supposed intervening matter. Captain Abney, on the Rifel (8,500 feet high), although he found the spectrum of the sun at that height the same as in London, still found a vast diminution of light, as well as of aqueous vapour, and, curiously, an increase of alcohol, which leads him to conclude that that potent spirit is of celestial origin. Although Dr. Glaisher, who has been miles higher in a balloon than Captain Abney, doubts the diminution of aqueous vapour, Professor Langley, one of the ablest spectroscopists of the United States, essentially confirms the Captain's conclusions. The long paper read by Professor Langley was one of the most valuable contributed to the meeting, giving, as it did, the results of spectroscopic work in the rare and pure atmosphere of Pike's Peak, 13,000 feet above sea level. Captain Abney has shown that there are rays (in the red) invisible to our rude eyes (though Sir John Lubbock gives reasons for believing that ants can detect them), and Professor Langley has found under his more favourable conditions that there are yet rays which even Captain Abney has not been able to detect, but which his bolometer has shown. Nearly three-fourths of the whole solar energy, he maintains, exists in the invisible portion of the spectrum. Professor Langley insists on the embarrassments introduced in the way of solar spectroscopy by our complicated atmosphere, and believes that if we could get outside of this the solar spectrum would present a very different aspect. Even the corona of the sun and the solar atmosphere itself must be pierced before we are able to say what is the real composition of the central nucleus. The spectroscope in the short period since its invention has done so much for a knowledge of the sun, and our investigators on both sides of the Atlantic are evidently so fully alive to the difficulties that beset their inquiries that we cannot but be hopeful that in the near future they will be able to overcome them.

THE CHEMICAL SECTION.

In the Chemical Section Professor Huntington reported on the use of the spectrum for chemical research, especially in reference to the detection of the exact composition and condition of metals; and here, also, we find the path of accurate and trustworthy spectroscopy beset with difficulties. Intimately associated with this department is the subject of the wavelength of the various kinds of light, and hence the importance of Dr. Marshall Watts's report of the Committee for the Preparation of Tables of Wave-lengths. It seems natural in connection with the spectroscope to refer to other solar matters, and Professor Balfour Stewart's paper on a supposed connection between the heights of rivers and the number of sun-spots in the sun is of much more than mere theoretical interest. Among other rivers he refers to the Nile, and concludes that it probably reaches its maximum height at the period of the maximum number of sun-spots; and, as this may be counted a maximum year, the conclusion is obvious. But for the comfort of our army, Professor Stewart tells us that in maximum years the Nile is longer than usual in reaching its full height, and we can only wish that this will turn out to be the case. This and the other paper read by Professor Stewart are excellent examples of the important practical bearings of even the most abstruse scientific research, for in the other paper he showed that by watching the waves of terrestrial magnetism we may be able to forecast the meteorological weather for something like a fortnight.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

Electrical matters, and especially electric lighting, occupied a prominent place at the Southampton meeting. Dr. Siemens's address was largely occupied with the subject of electricity in its application both to lighting and heating, and as a motive power. He is justly hopeful of the future of the various applications of this mysterious force, and so must anyone be who reads the various papers which were read on the subject. Lord Rayleigh, president of Section A, referred to certain theoretical aspects of the subject in his address, and showed the exceeding importance of investigators being capable of using more methods than one in their researches. The purely mathematical method is by itself as apt to mislead as the exclusive use of the method of experiment. The great moral of the President's address was that the value of scientific work should be tested by all possible methods. Dr. Gladstone and Dr. Tribe have been carrying on a long series of researches on secondary batteries, which seem destined to play so important a part in connection with electric lighting. It is only by chemical experiment and investigation such as these two eminent chemists are conducting that perfection can be looked for in this direction. Mr. Sprague's papers on electric distribution and subdivision of electric currents and on the Edison system of lighting were of much interest, while his detailed account of the doings of Mr. Edison show that that indefatigable worker is as active as ever and is really doing useful work. Altogether, the discussion of the subject of electric lighting by such men as Preece, Swan, Sir William Thompson, Silvanus Thompson, and others, shows not only that existing difficulties in the way of the universal use of the light are, there is every reason to believe, perfectly soluble; but that, if our electricians and chemists, theoretical and practical, continue to work in the future as they have been doing in the past, the solution cannot be distant.

ELECTRICITY AS A MOTIVE POWER.

As Dr. Werner Siemens, Mr. Traill (the engineer of the Giant's Causeway electric railway of seven miles), and Mr. Sprague, the spokesman for Mr. Edison, showed, the first steps in this direction have already been taken, but difficulties are greater than in the matter of electric lighting, although their solution is only a question of time. Whether, however, electrical or compressed air will gain the day as against steam, remains to be seen. As Sir F. Bramwell showed, compressed air has already been successfully used for purposes of locomotion, and both Captain Galton and Sir J. Hawkshaw were confident that it would ultimately take the place of steam on railways and horses on tramways. Its advantages in such cases as the Underground Railway are evident.

THE TELEPHONE.

The progress of one other increasingly important application of electricity, the telephone, was shown by many facts and figures by Mr. Preece. It is steadily making way in this country, though as every one who uses a telephone knows, it is provokingly apt to give no response. The practical difficulty here is the vast number of telegraph wires about everywhere, rendering it no easy matter to insulate completely any particular wire, especially as the very earth itself, Mr. Preece shows, is apt to coquet with the currents.

TIDES, HAILSTONES, AND METEORIC DUST.

Sir William Thomson, in his lecture on Tides, pointed out that on the body of the earth the attraction of the sun and moon has no very appreciable influence, but Mr. G. H. Darwin, in his paper on the Earth's Rigidity, showed that the influence is very real; and in his report on the Lunar Disturbance of Gravity Mr. Darwin proved that absolute steadiness is really not attainable on the earth, which seems to be in a constant state of tremor. This, and Mr. Darwin's paper on Tides, are fine examples of complicated scientific investigations requiring the most delicate precautions against the most minute disturbing factors. One of the sensations of the meeting was Professor Schwedoff's paper on Hailstones, which Sir William Thomson very naturally treated as an elaborate joke, though others seemed to think that the idea of their really being of meteoric origin deserved serious attention. It gave Sir William an opportunity of once more airing his theory of the meteoric origin of terrestrial life, which was unfolded at the last Edinburgh meeting. The readers of Baron Nordenskjöld's "Voyage of the Vega" will understand the importance of Dr. Schuster's report of the Committee on Meteoric Dust, for the Baron seems to be of opinion that our earth is largely built up of this fine dust, which is constantly falling in showers from interplanetary space.

CHEMICAL SECTION.

The address of Professor Liveing, as president of the Chemical Section, was scientific in spirit and moderate in tone. He pointed out the necessity of a revision of the values of the chemical elements; showed that the composition of so-called atoms, as well as molecules, has been recently proved to be not so simple as it seems; and while he could not give his adherence to the doctrine of the unity of the elements, advocated by Mr. Lockyer, some may think that he essentially admitted the premisses. The president also made an important contribution to spectrum analysis in his paper on the reversal of the spectral lines of metals, a line of research which, as he showed, has an important bearing on the interpretation to be put on the spectrum phenomena exhibited by the sun.

GEOLOGICAL SECTION.

Mr. Etheridge gave a summary, which geologists will find of the greatest service, of all that we know of one portion of the Tertiary geology of Hampshire and Sussex—the geology, indeed, of a period when England was continuous with the Continent, when our climate encouraged the growth of plants now only found in the warm south. Professor Prestwich's paper on the Drift phenomena of Hampshire, including the elephant bed at Freshwater, may be regarded as a valuable supplement to the president's address. Of papers dealing with some of the great problems of geology those by Professor Sollas on the formation of what are known as metamorphic rocks and on flints deserve mention. What are the exact conditions under which the whole series of stratified rocks have been metamorphosed to something quite unlike their original form and composition has long been a matter of discussion among geologists and the experiments made by Professor Sollas will doubtless help to a solution of the problem.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

But the attraction in this section was the discussion on the subject of the Channel Tunnel, suggested by papers by Professor Dawkins, Mr. De Rance, and Mr. Topley. In C, of course, the geological aspects of the undertaking were mainly considered, while in the Mechanical Section both the engineering and geological aspects were discussed. After all the talk and excitement, it cannot be said that we are any wiser than before. We know the geological conditions, and that for the engineers there are no difficulties whatever. Both geologists and engineers, for evident reasons, are anxious to see the bed of the Channel pierced, and the differences as to methods of boring, as to how to treat percolating water, and other points, are not those which trouble the public. Of course, the fears of the public were despised; but these will have to be effectually allayed before the geologists and engineers have their way. Meantime, doubtless, the proposed undertaking has added something to our knowledge of the science of the Channel.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL SECTION.

In the Anthropological Department Professor Boyd Dawkins gave an address on the present phase of the antiquity of man, maintaining that it was only in the latter stage of the Tertiary period that the earth was ready for man. What are really the component elements of the existing population of these islands, what features we derive from Saxon and Dane, what from so-called Celt and Silurian, and what from Professor Dawkins's primitive British Eskimo may possibly be discovered by the committee for obtaining photographs of the typical races in the British Isles, and the Anthropometric Committee for taking all sorts of measurements of typical individuals. The former especially is doing excellent work, and the problem they may help to solve is one of almost exciting interest. Mr. W. S. Duncan's paper, in Anthropology, on the probable scene of the primitive evolution of man, was perfectly rational; it seems quite reasonable and scientific to expect that if Darwinism on this point is correct, we ought to find clear traces somewhere of primitive humanity, and the south of Europe and Asia, as Mr. Duncan suggests, are quite as likely localities as elsewhere. Also connected with evolutionary theories was Dr. Harris's paper on the ebb and flow of mental endowment, in which the author attempts to give a rational explanation of the frequently-noted fact that men of extraordinary talent have often sons of extraordinary stupidity. If Mr. Pengelly's inferences from what he has found in Bovey Basin deposit in South Devon are correct, man in Britain is probably older than even Mr. Dawkins admits. The latter, in a paper in the section, showed, moreover, how the geologist, in his cave-hunts, may be able to help the researches of history. Some of the relics in Settle and other caves, he believes, were left behind by the poor Romanised Britains fleeing from their Saxon invaders, a conclusion, however, with which Dr. Evans did not seem entirely to agree.

BIOLOGICAL SECTION.

The main subject of Professor Gamgee's address as president of the Biological Section was the physiology of secretion, the tendency of which was not only to show that man is simply a complicated chemical product, but also that physiologists are getting more and more thoroughly acquainted with the functions of the various parts of the animal economy, and that, if physicians cannot heal, it is not because they must be ignorant of their subject. Mr. F. J. Faraday attempted to show, in connection with the recent discoveries of Koch as to the cause of tubercular consumption, that consumption ought to be both preventible and curable. Many of the empirical methods of cure which have been long in favour Mr. Faraday showed have really a scientific basis.

GEOGRAPHICAL SECTION.

The Geographers always manage to make a good show, and this year the work of this department will stand comparison, for quantity and quality, with that of any other department. Sir Richard Temple has done a real service, not only to geographers, but to all interested in our position in Asia, in bringing together the leading facts concerning the vast Pamir region obtained by recent exploration. The most important paper in this section was that by M. Tchihatchef on the deserts of Africa and Asia, which discusses a subject upon which there is a great variety of opinion among geologists, and contains much valuable information on the great deserts of Sahara, Gobi, and Turkestan. He rejects the idea that these deserts are ancient sea-bottoms, or that the sand which covers them has had any other origin than that arising from sub-aerial influences, and this is essentially the conclusion come to by the best geologists. Mr. Joseph Thomson, in his paper, really discussed the whole question of the geology of Central Africa, and the origin of the Great Lakes. His conclusion is that of Livingstone, that Central Asia was once a great sea, and that at no very remote period, though the Tanganyika basin itself is really the result of some subsequent convulsion. This is essentially the conclusion come to by Mr. Russell Wallace, from an investigation of the existing biology of the continent. Captain Conder's report on the Palestine survey showed that in spite of obstacles a substantial piece of work was done in the mapping of 500 miles east of the Jordan. We are glad to learn that the Association have decided to grant £500 as a contribution to the expenses of two naturalists to accompany Mr. Joseph Thomson in his expedition to North-East Africa; the results will well repay the expenditure.

One could not expect the scientists to be satisfied with the new Code, and Dr. Gladstone's report on the teaching of science in elementary schools very naturally expressed dissatisfaction with it. This view was essentially supported by Professor Silvanus Thompson in his paper on Artisan Education, and there can be little doubt that even in the newest Code science has not that place in elementary education which it ought, and is ultimately bound to have.

In the Mechanical Section the idea broached in Mr. Fowler's presidential address as to the construction of undulating railways, thus obviating the fearful tear and wear of brakes, should not be lost sight of. Mr. Baker's paper on the Forth Bridge afforded some idea of the immense magnitude of the undertaking. It is, indeed, the greatest engineering work ever attempted in the way of bridges. It is quite clear that Mr. Fowler and Mr. Baker have an adequate idea of the difficulties before them, and know how to solve them. From Sir William Armstrong's paper on the treatment of steel for the construction of ordnance it is evident that something more remains to be done before we thoroughly understand the exact condition of that metal best suited for such purposes. Numerous other paper in this section show how busily our engineers are applying the results of research in all directions, and how really dependent they are for good work on the scientific investigator, not even excluding the geologist. It is evident from these notes as to some of the leading results of the Southampton meeting that science is becoming more and more aggressive, and, moreover, that many of our best workers in science seem to find in these annual meetings convenient opportunities for bringing the results of their work before the public and under the criticism of their fellows.

MR. N. BODINGTON, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and Professor of Classics in the Mason Science College, Birmingham, has accepted the Principalship and Classical Chair of the Yorkshire College.

SCHOOL LIBRARIES are greatly on the increase in France. In 1865 the number was only 4,833, and in 1874 16,648. There are now 25,913. This does not include the teachers' libraries, which number 2,348, with an aggregate of 500,000 volumes.

THE PARKES MUSEUM.—The Council of the Parkes Museum have just acquired new premises in Margaret-street, Cavendish-square, to which the museum is to be removed from University College as soon as the alterations and additions, which are now being made under the direction of Mr. Mark H. Judge, A.R.I.B.A., are completed. The new museum will consist of a central hall (suitable for meetings and lectures), a library and corridors, and all lighted from the top, and well suited for exhibition purposes. The meetings and lectures on sanitary and other matters connected with the health of the people, which were only occasional while the museum was at University College, will form a permanent feature of the institution when it is re-opened in Margaret-street. It is expected that the museum will be opened before Christmas.

CHURCH AND DISSENT.

The Christian Union of New York writes:—

In England it is practically impossible for one to maintain eminent social standing, unless he is an Episcopalian or a Unitarian. For some good reason doubtless, but what it is I do not know and could not find out, a Unitarian Dissenter is as socially respected as a Church of England communicant; and I was informed that the Unitarians as a body are opposed to disestablishment. But with the exception of the Unitarians, and outside of Scotland, Dissenters are almost universally regarded as belonging to the second-class. I cannot but think that this is partly their own fault, if it is any one's fault, for they regard themselves as belonging to the second-class. The average American would feel keenly the purely imaginary humiliation of going to a second-class church, as he does that of travelling in a second-class carriage. Whether being content with a second-class position be a vice or a virtue, the English Dissenters possess it. The Established Church recognises no place of worship as a church that has not been consecrated by a bishop. The Dissenters accept this non-recognition with a very un-American spirit of meekness, and designate their largest churches in Liverpool, Birmingham, and even London by the title of 'chapel.' The Established Church recognises no man as a minister who has not been ordained by a bishop; the Dissenting ministers, many of them, accept this disfranchising without resistance, and some of the most eminent Dissenting preachers in England strike the title of Rev. off their names and request their friends to address them as plain Mr.

THE TEMPERANCE JUBILEE.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—

On Tuesday the teetotalers met in great force at the Crystal Palace to celebrate the jubilee of the formation of the first Total Abstinence League. For fifty years the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating drink has been preached as a religion in the highways and byways of the land. From small beginnings it has no doubt attained imposing dimensions. Teetotalism is a power in the land. Its disciples can be counted by hundreds of thousands; its apostles, amateur and professional, cry aloud at the corner of every street; and in every constituency are to be found a knot of energetic and resolute abstainers, who are prepared to subordinate all questions concerning the government of the empire to the paramount duty of shutting up their neighbours' public-house. Teetotalism has created a literature of its own. It has almost as many sects as Christianity, and it probably distributes more tracts. It has supplied a new moral bond of union among men of all creeds and none, and it has absorbed no small portion of that proselytising enthusiasm which in other days would have been confined to theological channels. No one can deny the sincerity, the consistency, and the philanthropy of many of its advocates; nor are we disposed to gainsay the eulogies pronounced upon the Seven Men of Preston who, as pioneers of the new asceticism, were extolled on Tuesday as if they had been wiser than the Seven Sages of ancient Greece, and more heroic than the Seven Champions of Christendom. The whole movement is eminently creditable to the moral instincts of the nation; and if its votaries do occasionally expose themselves to the charge of Pharisaism, this is one of the rare occasions on which the Pharisee is more tolerable than the publican. But, when all has been admitted, can it be said with any degree of historical accuracy that fifty years of strenuous propagandism have brought us materially nearer the goal which the Seven Men of Preston had in view?

The net result, after half a century's propagandism of total abstinence, seems to be that there are more public-houses, that more people get drunk, that more money is spent in drink, and that where intemperance has not increased it has remained stationary.

This discouraging view of the situation should, however, not be accepted without qualification. The temperance movement, initiated fifty years ago, has at least arrayed the clergy against intemperance. Fifty years ago a drunken cleric, especially in the country districts, was by no means rare. To-day such a scandal is almost unknown. The higher class of artisans are more sober than they were, and there are signs that Cardinal Manning, "General" Booth, and the Blue Ribbon Army are beginning to reach the masses, whose intemperance has hitherto remained untouched. On the other hand, we must not forget the dark shadow to this more cheering picture which is presented by the indisputable increase in drunkenness among women. It will be but a poor gain to the cause of temperance to gain a class, no matter how influential, and to lose a sex. On the whole, the chief claim that can be made for the Temperance movement is that it has sown much valuable seed, but the harvest has still to be garnered. No dispassionate observer can fail to be impressed by the extent and the force of the tendency which at the present day is compelling Governments to restrict the sale of drink. From Kansas to New South Wales, from Ireland to Iowa, the movement in self-governed communities towards restriction has long been known to be gaining strength. A remarkable article in the current number of the Nineteenth Century supplies a great body of evidence to show that the tendency is not less strongly felt in autocratic Russia than in the great democracies of the West. In this country, as yet, temperance reformers have achieved little. Their day is yet to come. But before the century expires it is safe to predict that the Legislature will have made much greater advances in the direction indicated by the "Seven Men of Preston" fifty years since than either the Ministerialists or the Opposition would at present care to contemplate.

THE PRIMATE.

The Nonconformist, after expressing sympathy with the Archbishop of Canterbury in his illness, writes generally of "The Primacy":—

The acts of the head of a great institution cannot be judged just as if they were the dictates of personal opinion or the outcome of personal character. Institutions, indeed, may be said to exist to equalise men by repressing merely personal tendencies. This is why they are so welcome to some minds—so repulsive to others. There is the force of individual character which some regard with hope and others with alarm, and there is the power conferred by position, and these sometimes co-operate, but perhaps oftener oppose one another. England, whose public life is more developed than that of any nation in the world, abounds in great positions, and the tendency of the governing classes is to increase them, and so by them to impress the imagination of the many and hold the spontaneous forces of society in check. The existence of high positions tells powerfully upon our higher education and training, and is always very marked at Oxford and Cambridge. Dr. Tait had the temper and instinct of public life. He was not ambitious; and would never have taken such measures for his own advancement as some men with higher religious pretensions than he has made have felt at liberty to adopt for theirs. But on the other hand, no offer of promotion, whether to Carlisle, London, York, or Canterbury, took him by surprise and found him unprepared. From his first appearance, when as a Balliol Tutor he helped to bring the Oxford Tracts to a sudden close, he appears to have had a distinct and tolerably developed conception of what was salutary and becoming in the government of the Church. Dr. Tait's character and conduct cannot be understood unless it is remembered that he was before all things, not a divine, a scholar, or a reformer, but an Institutionalist. Before now Archbishops of Canterbury have been burnt or beheaded, which is for some minds a proof that they were men of high principle and entitled to veneration, but to others only an evidence of sad mismanagement. Dr. Tait's great abilities were exerted to avert, or, at least, postpone, dangerous crises. His deep convictions on a very few points of the first order were never doubted; but his conduct in respect of matters disputed within the Church of England was regulated by large considerations of expediency. He had all the so-called practical man's dislike of theories and appeals to first principles. When "Essays and Reviews" appeared he advised the young clergy to throw themselves into parish work, and he met the demand for more reasons by a movement for building more churches. The question has been recently discussed whether he was a "Broad" Churchman. It is one hardly worth putting. By some a man is accounted Broad if he manifests indifference upon matters which others deem of the first importance. The phrase more properly characterises the man who gathers the materials for his judgment from wide and varied fields, who, instead of generating conclusions in a single line by a deductive process from assumed premises, forms his belief at that point to which indications from many centres converge.

In this latter and better sense we cannot regard Dr. Tait as truly Broad, but perhaps he was as Broad as his position permitted him to be. Like his friend, the late Dean of Westminster, he was a worshipper of historical fact. He took the Church as he found it, and no one will claim for him that he has left upon it the impress of an individual character. The late Dr. Samuel Wilberforce is known to have thought that he should have been offered the See of Canterbury, and on the basis of certain very high claims for the Church as a Divine institution which he put forward in his earlier charges, speculations have been raised as to what he would have done in this or that juncture of the last twenty years. The opportunism of that prelate would probably have held his ecclesiastical ambition in check in any circumstances. But if a man of the strong convictions and firm resolution of the late Dr. Hamilton, Bishop of Salisbury, had been raised to the seat of Thomas à Beckett, the relations of the Church and State would certainly have been severely strained.

THE NEW JUDAISM.

The Jewish Chronicle has no sympathy with the principles of the new Judaism as expounded by Mr. Claude Montefiore in his article in this month's Contemporary Review:—

The views therein expressed will probably be to most of our readers somewhat startling in their boldness, but they are merely the logical outcome of the principles laid down by the party to which Mr. Montefiore belongs by education and by family ties. These opinions reach our shores after having been subjected to strict investigation and searching criticism both in Germany and America, and they find in Mr. Montefiore a consistent and ardent adherent. We have before us, in short, Judaism with all the modern improvements, and it behoves us to examine how far these novelties satisfy the ideals and aspirations that have been hitherto inseparably connected with Judaism.

Judaism as a religion presents two aspects which satisfy two different orders of mind. To the reflective mind it presents the most exalted monotheism the world has ever seen; to the conventional mind, if we may so style it, it displays a system of ceremonial that sanctifies the daily life and makes religion operative in the home. Both aspects have their weakness as well as their strength. To the mind that can rise to the most abstract notions of the Deity, the ceremonial side appears trivial; by the ceremonialist too little thought is given to the sublime truths which are associated with Judaic rites. Yet the balance of the two sides of Judaism is of the utmost importance for its vitality. Its dogmas would remain cold metaphysics without its observances; its rites would be but clogs to the spirit unless permeated by the life of truth. There has been a tendency towards lifeless rites in the Judaism of the past; there is undoubtedly a danger of cold rationalism about the new Judaism supported by Mr. Claude Montefiore. Reason is the highest faculty of man, but there are other faculties in human nature, and Judaism has been hitherto unique in satisfying these as well as reason. The feeling of common descent, the racial or "tribal" sentiment, is one strong in man, and Judaism satisfies this to the highest degree. Mr. Montefiore recognises this, but declares it to be erroneous, and advocates the extirpation of all those parts of Judaism that answer to its needs; he wishes to "denationalise Judaism."

Frankly speaking, this denationalised Judaism appears to us Judaism with distinctive elements left out. It may be a noble creed and a universalist doctrine, but it is not Judaism. Let us sum up all the omissions from the ordinary stock of theories and practice which this bold young thinker would advocate. The verbal inspiration of the Bible must go, and all claims to any inspiration at all on the part of the Talmud. The hygienic and dietary laws of the Pentateuch are no longer to be obligatory. Only Pentateuchal festivals are to be observed. Proselytism is to be extended to the fullest possible extent. Hebrew is to be exchanged for the vernacular in our services, and, though this is not clearly indicated, circumcision must be given up. "Verily thou art translated indeed" we might say to a Judaism shorn of all these observances.

Here then we have the new Judaism a bundle of negations—no Bible, no Talmud, no Schechita, no Millah. What then is left? The doctrines of Judaism, Mr. Montefiore will reply. But even here serious curtailment is made, no Messianic hopes, no reason, therefore, for not being absorbed among the nations. As it is put by Mr. Montefiore, this appears a point of minor importance. Yet it has really been the root-idea of Judaism, that there was a special function for the Jewish race in the history of the world, and that separation must be kept up in order to effect this end. The long martyrdom of our race is a sublime testimony to the fundamental importance of the Messianic hopes in Judaism. Indeed, it is the root-idea of the few remnants of Judaism which the Reform party, as interpreted by Mr. Montefiore, would connect with the philosophic Theism which is to form their creed. But the essence of the new movement is to discard all ceremonial whatsoever, and seek to propagate certain abstract propositions which form part, and only a part, of the creed of Judaism. The new Judaism, to speak in the language of a past generation, is nothing more than Elegant Extracts from Judaism.

What are the inducements which this new faith is to offer to similar creeds that their adherents should be content to enrol themselves under the banner of Judaism? We are to seek for new allies from Unitarians, from the Brahmo-Somaj, from enlightened Mahometans. Each of these has its historic origin, traces of which it would wish to preserve just as much as Reformed Judaism would desire to retain specimen observances from the Judaism of the past. Which side is to give up its remnants of historic observance, and why? These are serious questions for Mr. Montefiore to consider. Are we to have a mélange confus of rites from Christianity, Brahminism, and the Koran, as well as the Pentateuchal observances in the new Judaism? Otherwise it seems hopeless to dream of large additions to the ranks of Judaism from the bodies above-mentioned, and yet that is the chief, if not sole reason, why the denationalisation of Judaism is to be resorted to.

"AMERICAN HYMN WRITERS."

Under the above heading Professor F. M. Bird gives, in the New York Independent, the following account of one of our well-known Unitarian divines, the late Dr. Edmund Hamilton Sears (1810-1876):—

Dr. Sears departed in several particulars from the usual routine of divines of his persuasion. He was born not in Eastern, but in Western Massachusetts, and graduated (1834) at Union, instead of Harvard, though for theology he had to go to Cambridge. He ministered not in Boston, but at small places—Wayland, 1838—1840 and 1847—1865; Lancaster, 1840—1847; and Western from 1865 till his death.

His position in the denomination was peculiar, for he held pronounced Swedenborgian opinions. "I have always been a believer in the absolute Deity of Christ," he wrote me, many years ago, therein differing from most of my brethren." I quote from memory; but he used similar language to Professor Cleveland, as may be seen in the latter's Lyra Sacra Americana. He wrote much for the Monthly Religious Magazine, and from 1859 to 1871 was its editor, with Rufus Ellis. His works have been much admired for their deeply religious spirit. They are "Regeneration," 1854; "Pictures of the Olden Time," 1857; "Athanasia; or, Foregleams of Immortality," 1858; "The Fourth Gospel the Heart of Christ," 1872; and "Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life," 1875. Mr. Cleveland made, in 1868, the positive statement that "he has never made a collection of his hymns;" but Johnson's "Encyclopædia" credits him with a volume of "Christian Lyrics" (1860), which I have not seen.

Had he done nothing else he would be long remembered by his two exquisite Christian songs. Songs they are, as he seems to have called them, and not strictly hymns; but so beautiful in substance, sentiment and expression that English-speaking Christendom has made them its own.

"Calm on the listening ear of night."

This is found everywhere, as well it may be, for the charm of sacred geography was never before or since so condensed and applied in verse. The mere names of "far fair foreign lands" have a curious attraction for ear and mind, and were skilfully utilised in Heber's great missionary hymn, which is hardly more a hymn than this before us, but, like this, is so near it that one is seldom sensible of the difference. Where these names are biblical the attraction is increased, as witness the tale of the old lady found in tears over "those blessed words—Phrygia, Pamphylia, Mesopotamia." And here we have at its height whatever appeal is made to the imagination by "wild Judea" and "her silver-mantled plains," by "the answering hills of Palestine," "the blue depths of Galilee," and Sharon's "silent" groves of "palm." Critics, as Dr. Holmes, in a Lowell Institute lecture, have fully justified the popular admiration for this poem. It first appeared in the Boston Observer, 1834. The author, remembering inaccurately, said 1838. He afterward made some alterations in the latter part. The whole forty lines, as thus amended, may be found in Putnam's "Singers and Songs," and, as they originally stood, in Cleveland's Lyra Sacra Americana. Most of the collections contain five single stanzas, being the first, second, and latter half of the third double stanza of the original. This is probably the best arrangement for singing; though some add the first half of the fourth stanza, ending—

"And bright on Bethlehem's joyous plains Breaks the first Christmas morn."

It is doubtful work, discriminating as to merit between this and his later Christmas-piece; but Sir Roundell Palmer and Dr. Schaff preferred the latter, since they included it, and not the other, in their celebrated collections. The "Angel's Song" is a lovely topic, and here most worthily celebrated:

"It came upon the midnight clear."

This, says Dr. Sears, was "written for a Christmas gathering, held at my house at Wayland, I think, 1850; and was first published in the Christian Register, soon after, probably in 1851." Here again he is probably too late, for Dr. Morison, then editor of the Register, says (as quoted by Dr. Putnam) "it was sent to me, I think, in December, 1849." It has not been so largely used as its predecessor, for it is of the same length and does not lend itself so well to abridgment; but as an exquisite Christian poem it is quite as safe to live. What can be finer or truer than this?—

"Yet with the woes of sin and strife
The world has suffered long;
Beneath the angels' strain have rolled
Two thousand years of wrong;
And man, at war with man, hears not
The love-song which they bring:
O hush the noise, ye men of strife,
And hear the angels sing!"

In the early editions of Palmer's "Book of Praise" and in sundry collections which followed it, "hovering wing" in the second stanza was, unfortunately, changed to heavenly, an adjective used in its proper place four lines above. The correction has probably been made long before now in all competently edited books.

In one of the last volumes of Sewall's Diary it is claimed that the Puritans came to this country to avoid being bothered with idolatrous mummeries and ungodly days, especially Christmas. "The whirligig of time brings about its revenges," and it is fit that a modern New England Puritan should have given to the world two of the very loveliest of Christmas hymns, including the one which, more than all others, brings out the moral meaning and spiritual results of the Day.

Nothing else by Dr. Sears has made a mark comparable to these, though "Hymns of the Spirit" (1864) includes one piece of his and Dr. Putnam prints another from the Religious Magazine, 1873:

BIRMINGHAM.—In the absence of Dr. Laird Collier the services at New Hall Hill Chapel were conducted on Sunday last by the Rev. Dr. Peabody, of Harvard University, U.S., who preached morning and evening to crowded congregations.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF AUGUSTE COMTE.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of Auguste Comte was celebrated in Paris on Tuesday. In the morning, at ten o'clock, a large gathering took place at his grave in Père-Lachaise. A discourse in honour of the founder of the Positive Belief was given by M. Lagarrigue, of Chili. Dr. Bridges, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and others represented the London Committee, and representatives were present from Spain, Brazil, Russia, and other countries. In the afternoon a meeting took place in the former residence of Comte, where M. Pierre Lafitte gave an address. In the evening a banquet was given in the Palais Royal, at which a large party of workmen and their wives and many professional and foreign gentlemen were present, including the deputations from London and the provincial cities of France.

Correspondence.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Knowing that many members of his congregation did not read our periodicals, and consequently might be unaware of Mr. Pope's untimely death, it occurred to Mr. Freckelton that if he announced the fact from his pulpit in Unity Church contributions would be made towards the fund being raised on behalf of the family. The result of the appeal for two Sundays has been nearly twenty pounds, and it is proposed to keep the list open during the present month. I would suggest the same course to other ministers, as doubtless there are in all congregations persons of limited means who are too modest to send small contributions direct to the treasurer of the fund, but who would gladly give through their ministers. I think if this is done generally a considerable sum may be raised in aid of this distressing case. JOSEPH T. PRESTON.

FINALE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I accept with much satisfaction Mr. Jeffery's disclaimer of the desire for litigation, which, to some of us, his words appeared to convey; and I am glad that my letter has given him an opportunity of removing an impression that might otherwise have lingered in many minds. As to the suggested case of conscience, that may well wait for consideration until the Unitarian congregations now assembling in chapels built for the worship of an ideal Trinity have ceased to recognise or worship any ideal of supreme excellence, whether called "Jehovah, Jove, or Lord," or more comprehensively expressed in words of Carlyle, as "the long paraphrase which we shorten in the word God."

"TEACHERS' NOTES."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will it be asking too great a favour of you to let me say through the medium of the Inquirer that a demand is frequently being made for copies of the first number of Teachers' Notes? It would be a great convenience to those who are anxious to complete the publication for binding, if any one who may happen to have a surplus copy or two of No. 1 lying by him would kindly send them to the Rooms of the Sunday School Association, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London. The full price of threepence per copy and cost of carriage will be allowed. The demand is hardly sufficient to justify the Association in reprinting the number.

I. M. WADE, SECRETARY.

THE SOUTH LONDON FREE LIBRARY.—At a public meeting held on Monday night in the rooms of the Free Library, Upper Kennington-lane, Mr. G. Hill in the chair, an animated discussion took place with regard to the action of the authorities of Lambeth parish in distraining for the non-payment of rates by that institution. Mr. Rossiter, the treasurer, as representing the library, claimed exemption under Act of Parliament, while Mr. Barker, on behalf of the parish authorities, held that, as certain fees were charged in connection with it, the library was a private venture of the treasurer's, and not a free institution according to the intentions of the Legislature. The discussion resulted in the passing of a resolution which expressed a hope that the proceedings against Mr. Rossiter would be stayed pending an appeal.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT.—Dyspepsia, Jaundice. —These complaints are the results of a disordered liver, which secretes bile in quality or quantity unsuitable for digestion, which requires a free flow of healthy bile, to insure which Holloway's Pills and Ointment have long been famous, far eclipsing all other remedies. Unsuitable food, irregularity of living, unhealthy climates, and other causes are constantly throwing the liver into disorder, but that important organ can, under all circumstances, soon be regulated and healthily adjusted by Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which acts directly upon its secreting cells. The Ointment rubbed on the skin penetrates immediately to the liver, whose tissues it rectifies. One trial is all that is needed; a cure will soon follow.

Religious Intelligence.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

We briefly recorded in our last number the annual meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association, held at Newport on Sunday and Monday week, and now subjoin a fuller report.

On Sunday the Rev. Dr. Crosskey, F.G.S., of Birmingham, delivered two remarkable discourses in the High-street Chapel, and the proceedings on Monday consisted of a luncheon in the new school-room, a business meeting in the afternoon, and a public meeting in the evening. Mr. Alderman R. PINNOCK, J.P., presided at the luncheon.

After luncheon the PRESIDENT proposed "The Queen," remarking that in the reign of no sovereign had such advances been made in the direction of civil and religious liberty as in that of Queen Victoria—(cheers).

The royal toast having been honoured, the PRESIDENT proposed a sentiment of welcome to the deputation from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and spoke in terms of gratitude of the help and encouragement which they in that district had received from the Association—(cheers).

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL on behalf of the Association expressed their entire sympathy with the smaller and struggling Societies, and they had given practical proof of that sympathy in the sums they had voted to the support of the churches at Southampton, Chichester, Poole and Bournemouth. They expected to find that the money thus laid out would be returned with interest; but even should they get no pecuniary return, they would be amply repaid and satisfied if they found all these congregations becoming strong and self-supporting—(cheers). It should always be borne in mind that small as some of these Associations were they included many persons who were leaders of Liberal thought in politics, as well as social and other matters. They had at that very meeting a number of gentlemen of this kind. In the chair was the leader of the Liberal party in the neighbourhood—(cheers)—a gentleman who had been five times Mayor of the borough of Newport, and who in all public matters connected with their ancient town held a leading position—(cheers). There was also present an ex-Mayor of Maidstone (Mr. Ellis)—a recognised leader of the Liberal party in that important borough—(cheers). Around them were other conspicuous members of the Liberal party, amongst whom they were pleased to see the accomplished and popular Professor Morley of University College. The speaker went on to point out that while some of the so-called orthodox churches, such as the Society of Friends, were dwindling away because they had done their work, the Unitarian body was still active, and they found that its views were pervading other churches to an extent which sometimes surprised the veteran leaders in their cause. Their congregations had been standing witnesses in the neighbourhoods in which they existed of the great principles of Liberalism and progress. It was Liberal Christianity that the Association which he represented was devoting its whole strength and its increasing resources to promote, and he appealed to all their churches to do their best to strengthen the parent Association in carrying out its high mission—(cheers).

The PRESIDENT pointed out, in reference to some of the last speaker's remarks, that all Unitarians were not Liberals in politics. For instance, there was present that day their friend Mr. Hughes, who was one of the best and staunchest Conservatives in the Isle of Wight.

Mr. T. CHATELAIN CLARKE, J.P., gave the next sentiment, "Welcome to the ministers of the district." He spoke in high terms of the moral courage, the steadiness of purpose, and the power of thought and expression which characterised their ministers generally, and as laymen they were glad of an opportunity like the present to cordially and gratefully recognise the services of those upon whom devolved the important duties and responsibilities of the ministerial office—(cheers).

The Revs. H. HAWKES and J. W. SMITH acknowledged the sentiment.

Following the luncheon was a business meeting, and in the evening a public meeting was held in the schoolroom under the presidency of Mr. Alderman PINNOCK, J.P. The meeting was remarkable for the uniform excellence of the speaking.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL began with a speech on "Liberal Christianity, its aims and hopes," and in the course of his remarks he referred in terms of admiration and approval to the sermon preached at Southampton on the previous day by the Bishop of Truro (Dr. Benson). That sermon breathed a spirit of broad and liberal Christianity, and exactly accorded with the views which he (the speaker) was endeavouring to press upon that meeting. As Unitarians they most gladly welcomed these expressions of larger views outside their own body by such brave, and noble, and liberal-souled men as the Bishop of Truro and Bishop Colenso—(cheers).

Professor HENRY MORLEY followed with a very fine speech on "Literature, its high mission and purpose." Literature was the utterance of the life of a people, and by its study they learned to march in time with those who had lived before and go steadily forward to the aid of the future. It was the high mission of literature, when rightly studied, to teach Englishmen their duty. This shone out of all our literature. Another of its missions was to compel people out of their narrowness into brotherhood and fellowship—(cheers). They might differ, but what of that? God made them to differ, that they should express their differences, and by so doing gradually sift error from truth, and every use that man made of that which was most divine within him raised him nearer to the infinite perfection of God Himself. If they were all of one mind they would be a lower race than they were, and instead of bewailing their differences and making them a cause of division and estrangement, let them go down on their knees and thank God that he had made men to differ, for it was by the mental processes which these differences called into operation that they reached the truth. Let there be free thought, free speech in their fullest development. There was nothing to fear. "Let truth and error grapple; whoever knew truth worsted in a free and open encounter?" It was the binding that made the danger—(cheers).

The Rev. Dr. Crosskey spoke of "Science and Religion, their true relation." Referring to some remarks made by Professor Morley, the speaker said he did not believe that the world in which all the people were Unitarian or any other one religion would be a happier world than this. Through the conflict of thought we learned alike the lesson of charity and the power of thought itself. He wished they could bring into theology the same method of dealing which obtained in science and literature. What would they say if Professor Morley's appointment to the chair of literature in University College was made dependent on his signing a declaration as to the authorship of the letters of "Junius," or the precise order in which Shakespeare wrote his plays? Well indeed would it be if in religion we could get rid of this fatal thing "subscription"—if our churches were as free as our colleges—if the teacher of religion were, as the teacher of science, only bound to follow the light that God might shed upon him. Then, indeed, we should still differ in opinion, but our differences would be in the fulness of charity as in the breadth of thought—(cheers). And then, Oh could we but get rid of that horrible dread of what was called "heresy!" He had never been able to tell the difference between "heresy" and "orthodoxy." Would that we could get into religion the same spirit as in science. Did anyone believe that if a man brought you a flower, and you put it into a wrong genus, or a piece of rock, and you assigned it a wrong place in the great system of creation, the curse of God would rest upon you? Whoever dreamt such a thing? "I no more believe," continued the rev. doctor, "that the wrath of God will rest upon me because I made a mistake—if I do make a mistake—about the nature of Christ than it would if I made a mistake about the species of a flower, or the analysis of a rock." Passing on, Dr. Crosskey said he could not but look with triumphant gladness upon the testimony borne now throughout the length and breadth of the land to the genius of Darwin. A few years back, why, to be called a disciple of Darwin was to be branded with the mark of Cain! No suspicion could be bitterer—no denunciations more fierce—than those which were heaped upon this illustrious man. But with infinite patience—a lesson to them all—he pursued his great career. Never a word of scorn, or disdain, or anger had he for those who flung at him their direct shafts, but with majestic calmness he went on his way through the great creative processes of God, and he would rank for ever with Galileo, with Bacon, with Newton—with the some half-dozen men who had widened the boundaries of human thought—(cheers). Concluding, the rev. doctor thanked them for their kind reception. When he looked in the glass he saw some grey hairs, but coming to their old town and hearing the familiar names of his youth, he felt a boy again. When he was a little boy the name of Mr. Robert Pinnock was held up to him as that of a venerable father of the faith, a pillar of the churches, whose integrity and faithfulness were an example and an inspiration to their younger selves—(cheers).

Mr. T. CHATELAIN CLARKE, J.P., came next with a forcible speech on "The need of urging the claims of Christianity on the people." He said it could not be denied that, on the part of the mass of the people, there was an indifference—he did not say hostility—to religion. The efforts made by the Salvation Army seemed for the time to be acceptable to certain classes, but he doubted whether the results of the movement would be either permanent or deep, and he questioned, too, whether the great, intelligent operative class of this country were to be reached in this way. If Christianity was to be really aggressive, it must not expend itself in mere empty excitement, or cramp itself within the limits of the narrow dogmas. It must be wide and open teaching such doctrines as the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and a strong belief in immortality, and show man that there was that in it which would meet their sorrows, their aspirations, their needs in all the changing conditions of life. Let them get away from cliques and coteries, and seek to promulgate such a Christianity as this, and he believed that amongst the masses of the people the battle would be won—(cheers).

The Rev. D. AMOS spoke on "The influences which tend to mould our National life," and the Rev. E. RATTENBURY HODGES came next with a brief and telling speech on "The development of the social life in connection with religion."

On the motion of Mr. BLESSLEY a vote of thanks was passed by acclamation to the President, who, in reply, said that he thanked God that his health had been so far restored as to enable him to be with them that day. He deemed it an honour to have presided over a meeting which had been so ably and so eloquently addressed.

THE DUKINFIELD OLD CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL.

To those of our friends who are perhaps inclined to take a gloomy and somewhat pessimist view of the work and progress of Unitarianism the history of this old established and deservedly popular Sunday-school ought to furnish grounds for encouragement.

The school was first opened in a garret in the beginning of the century, and the first building was erected in 1810, the cost of it being met by public subscription. Twelve years passed away, and it was found necessary to enlarge the school premises. And yet again, in the year 1838, another enlargement was made. During the more than forty years that have passed away since that time the school has continued to do a good work, not only in imparting religious education to large numbers of children, but in giving, when day schools were less common than now, instruction in several secular subjects. The consequence has been that the school has always stood high in the estimation of the dense working-class population amid which it is placed. In 1870 the Dukinfield Congregation, on the passing of Mr. Forster's Education Act, ventured to open a day school in their old building, and at the present time there are upwards of 600 children receiving a sound education in the schools.

For many years the friends of this school had been convinced that their old building, with its one narrow staircase and its low-ceiled, badly ventilated "large room," was altogether too cramped and antiquated to meet modern notions of comfort and educational requirements. Those of our friends who have taken part in the annual gatherings in connection with the Dukinfield chapel and school, and remember the heated and stifling atmosphere of the old "large room," will agree that the congregation in their determination to erect an entirely new building took a wise step. It was decided to appeal for funds for this purpose by holding a grand bazaar. The bazaar was opened by Mr. Edwin Lawrence in the Stalybridge Mechanics' Institution in the spring of last year, and it was most generously patronised by the Unitarians of Manchester and vicinity. Friends at a distance who could not make it convenient to come sent liberally of money and goods. Many old scholars in different parts of the world sent donations of goods or money. The bazaar proved such a success that the committee were able to begin the proposed building, and now our Dukinfield friends have the satisfaction of being possessed of a handsome and roomy building, fitted up with all the modern conveniences required for education.

The new building which is now just completed stands behind the old school, and as viewed in front from Pickford-lane is really a noble structure, and reflects no little credit on the ability of the architect and the taste of the committee. It is built of the best pressed bricks and Yorkshire stone. The main door-way has two beautiful Aberdeen granite columns with stone bases, arch and jambs. The vestibule is 11ft. 6in. by 7ft. The hall of this entrance is 11ft. 6in. wide, and the corridors leading to the class-rooms are 5ft. wide.

The new large room at the top of the building is a very fine apartment 68ft. 6in. long, 36ft. 6in. wide, and 20ft. high, and will seat 800 people. It is wainscoted to the height of 4ft. and the ceiling is coved, and has a cornice running round the base. This room is lighted by fifteen windows, each of which is 12ft. high and 5ft. wide. The circular heads of the windows are made to open so as to secure thorough ventilation. At night it will be lighted by three sun-lights, the centre one being a "Siemen's Patent Gas Regenerator." Behind the large platform are two wall brackets to be used on the occasion of concerts and other entertainments. The approach to the large room is by two staircases 5ft. 3in. wide, the walls of which are lined with white, blue, and black glazed tiles, thus giving the staircases a light and finished appearance.

Perhaps next to the earnestness and enthusiasm of the teachers nothing has contributed so much to the success of the Dukinfield school as the adoption by its founders of the class-room system, and the Committee on entering on the work of enlargement wisely determined to extend as far as possible the same system. In addition to a new infant room, measuring 36ft. by 22ft., there are four large and airy class-rooms in the new building. In all there are now fourteen large and convenient class-rooms in the school, besides a committee room, library, ante-room, kitchen, storeroom, three lavatories, and ample closet accommodation. The cost, including site, has been £3,300.

The whole work has been designed and superintended by Mr. Moses Wilde, who has been connected nearly all his life with the school as scholar, teacher and director.

The Parents' Party, fixed for the 16th inst., will be the first annual meeting held in the building since its completion, and we have no doubt that the fathers and mothers, who always muster in large numbers on such an occasion, will find the new premises a great improvement on the old building.

FREE THOUGHT IN AMERICA.

The Rev. E. Paxton Hood, an eminent Congregationalist minister of London, who has recently returned from a prolonged visit to the United States, in a letter to the Christian World of this week has the following interesting remarks on various phases of Free Thought in that country.

COLONEL INGERSOLL.

I very much regret that I had not the opportunity of hearing another great American apostle, Robert Ingersoll, the apostle of unbelief; I had promised to preach at the Park Church on the only occasion on which he spoke in my neighbourhood, or I certainly would have broken the Sabbath by listening to him. On my way out, an accomplished barrister—a man of large and, it seemed, in a sense, of universal culture—had said to me he believed he had listened to every great orator of our day—to Gladstone and Bright and Spurgeon and Ward Beecher—and he regarded this Ingersoll as beyond them all. It appeared to me that it must have been an immensely hyperbolic estimate, but his influence is very great, and he has power to attract and to hold spell-bound, beneath the witchery of laughter and tears, vast audiences. I procured and read his lectures, of which many are published, and I found them to be flippant, ignorant, and coarse, relieved occasionally by a spray of natural eloquence. It has been said that "writers like Tom Paine would be to-day turned out of the synagogue of sceptics." Ingersoll's deliverances are exactly on the level of Tom Paine; he is the most popular exponent of the Agnostic doctrine living; he is a jolly joker of jokes, to whom any reverent sense of the awful mystery of nature, or man, or society, or history of the world, present or to come, is impossible. A dear friend, the Rev. Dr. Stevenson, of Montreal, questioned him privately, at the close of one of his lectures, and inquired of him how far he thought such a lecture was calculated to help and minister to suffering souls beneath the pressure of the ills and cares of life, and he answered he knew nothing about suffering souls; nature had always treated him very well, and he expected she would continue to do so. Robert Ingersoll appears to be a kind of American Charles Bradlaugh, but with many of the affections of a man, with a regard for family ties, and the manners of a gentleman, who, however, wins at once the laughter and the sympathy of his audience by a determined misrepresentation of Christ, Christianity, and Christians; but he is the greatest power in the States on the side of unbelief. Emerson has said, but he said it many years since, "the Americans have many virtues, but they have not Faith and Hope; I know no two words whose meaning is more lost sight of. We use those words as if they were as obsolete as Selah or Amen. The Americans have little faith, they rely on the power of a dollar. They are deaf to a sentiment." I should not like to say this; but, assuredly, if they have not faith they have works. Of course, as is the case everywhere, all the great acts and institutions of charity, philanthropy and education emanate from the religious heart of the country; there is, however, one great exception in Stephen Girard's College, near Philadelphia; the trust deeds of that college clearly and expressly prohibit all clergy-men from ever entering within its doors.

CONGREGATIONALISTS AND UNITARIANS.

My impression of the religious life is that it is, perhaps, from many aspects, the most simple and beautiful I have ever seen; of course, my intercourse was chiefly with Congregationalists, and it is certainly very noteworthy that, although in general Congregational churches and ministers adhere much more closely and narrowly to the lines of the old theology, there is not the same great gulf of separation between them, and even Unitarian churches as with us; indeed, it seemed to me there was an entire absence of sectarian bitterness, the denominations seem to respect each other even where they most widely differ. When Newman Hall was in Boston he preached in the Unitarian Church of the distinguished preacher and writer, Everett Hale; and upon the occasion of my last sermon in the distinguished Eliot Church in Newton, the pastor, Dr. Calkins, who, alike with his church, are among the most faithful to all the lines of the old creed, announced to his congregation the suspension during the following week of the ordinary service, in consequence of the dedication service of the new Unitarian church, to which he and his deacons had received tickets of invitation. Such intercourse may, perhaps, arise partly from the fact that generally the Unitarians have not receded so far as in England from the old faith; but there are no doubt more amiable relations between the various denominations. At the great annual meeting of the Congregational Club, in the world-renowned Faneuil Hall, to which I was invited a few days before I left, an Episcopalian (Phillips Brooks) and a Unitarian (Governor Jong), the Governor of the State of Massachusetts, and a Methodist Episcopal clergyman in the place of Bishop Foster, and Baptists and Congregationalists spoke at the meeting. We have no minister in England exactly answering to the character and place of Phillips Brooks, of Boston; as I have said, he is an Episcopalian clergyman, his church is one of the most magnificent modern ecclesiastical edifices, it is a noble combination of the Byzantine and the Norman in architecture; I suppose it will certainly hold two thousand persons, and it is usually crowded, and it was erected recently at a cost of about 700,000 dols. The style of the preacher is chaste, but elevated, thoroughly cultured, but very effective, and he has a voice and manner of winning, persuasive, and most unaffected sweetness. A short time since the pastor of the new Old South Congregational Church, which is nearly opposite to that of Phillips Brooks, failed in health, and, as the hour of the services differed, and the disappointment was unexpected, and therefore unprovided for, Mr. Brooks was requested by the deacons to take the service at the close of his own. He instantly complied with the request, and, when he had finished his task in his own church, went across the road to take the service for his unshepherded Congregational brethren. This large-hearted man has preached in many Congregational churches, and rendered help to many of his Congregational brethren in this way, and, among others, to Mr. Reuben Thomas, of Brookline, who has recently received the invitation to our Tollington Park Congregational Church. It is impossible not to feel that the absence of any legal ecclesiastical status, or superiority, promotes a feeling of healthful and amiable loving kindness from each to all and from all to each.

THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE ON TEETOTALISM.

The newly established Bedford Chapel Debating Society recently had a discussion on "Teetotalism Regarded as a Theory, a Practice, and a Remedy." The subject was opened by Mr. Frank Wright, of Kensington, who laid down the following propositions, which he stated to be a fair representation of the views held by the great mass of abstainers in this country and America:—1st. That all intoxicating drinks contain alcohol in varying proportions. This alcohol is identical in its nature from whatever source it may be derived: and the danger and the injury accruing from their use is due to the presence of this universal and constant constituent. 2nd. That the process of fermentation by which intoxicating drinks are produced deprives them, either wholly or in great part, of the nutriment contained in the materials from which they are produced, and thereby renders them unfitted for human food. 3rd. That as regards the power of alcohol to sustain the heat of the body by its combustion within it, it is at least doubtful if any such combustion takes place; and, on the other hand, a wide experience and innumerable experiments have shown that if it is a vital fuel, it is very inferior to most articles of ordinary diet, and should never be resorted to when these can be procured. 4th. That the action of alcohol upon the healthy system in all doses in which its effects can be traced is the action of a poison, and that the degree of its effect is to be measured by the quantity taken, modified in some cases by the presence of other constituents, which either retard its action, or by inducing its rapid elimination minimises the amount of injury produced. 5th. That a long and wide experience has proved teetotalism to be both practicable and safe, and that it is compatible with perfect health under the most arduous exertion of every kind. 6th. That as the passion for drink is the result of the action of alcohol upon a sensitive organism, the proper cure as well as the true preventive of drunkenness is total abstinence from that which produces it—that is, from alcohol. 7. That as the action of alcohol upon the organism in inducing this passion is first to disturb its functions and afterwards to change its structure, the injury it produces is not confined to the person or the generation in which it arises, but is transmitted to its successors, increasing their susceptibility to its influence, and diminishing their chances of a vigorous and healthy life. 8th. Therefore, as alcoholic liquors render no important service to the body, while their use is always fraught with danger and oftentimes with disaster, personal abstinence from it is physically expedient and morally obligatory. 9th. As intemperate drinking is largely induced by the temptations provided by our social customs, and by those which are offered by the licensed traffic in intoxicating drinks, it behoves us as individuals to discountenance their use in private life, and as citizens to promote a speedy and complete prohibition of their public manufacture and sale. In sustaining these propositions, Mr. Wright made good use of the usual facts and arguments with which our readers are familiar, and was well supported in this by several members of the society. The opposition was not vigorous, but sufficiently so to bring out the stock arguments by which the cause of "temperance" as distinct from teetotalism is habitually supported.

The discussion was chiefly notable as an opportunity for the President, the Rev. Stopford Brooke, M.A., to again express himself upon this great and growing question, and we are glad to be able to give the concluding remarks of this eloquent and popular preacher in full. Mr. Brooke said: "The scientific aspect of the question has been so admirably laid before you by Mr. Wright that I need not speak of it; but there is one point raised in the debate which I may meet with my own experience. It has been said that moderate doses of alcohol stimulate work into greater activity, and make life happier and brighter. My experience, since I became a total abstainer, has been the opposite. I have found myself able to work better. I have a greater command over any powers I possess. I can make use of them when I please. When I call upon them, they answer; and I need not wait for them to be in the humour. It is all the difference between a machine well oiled and one which has something among the wheels which catches and retards the movement at unexpected times. As to the pleasure of life, it has been also increased. I enjoy Nature, books, and men more than I did—and my previous enjoyment of them was not small. Those attacks of depression which come to every man at times who lives too sedentary a life rarely visit me now, and when depression does come from any trouble, I can overcome it far more quickly than before. The fact is, alcohol, even in the small quantities I took it, while it did not seem to injure health, injures the fineness of that physical balance which means a state of health in which all the world is pleasant. That is my experience after four months of water-drinking, and it is all the more striking to me, because for the last four or five years I have been a very moderate drinker. However, the experience of one man is not that of another, and mine only goes for what it is worth to those to whom as much alcohol as is contained in one glass of sherry or port alters away from the standard of health. I have discovered, since abstinence, that that is true of me. And I am sure, from inquiries I have made, that it is true for a great many other people who do not at all suspect it. Therefore, I appeal to the men here, young and old, to try abstinence for the very reasons they now use alcohol—in order to increase their power of work and their enjoyment of life. Let the young make the experiment of working on water only. Alcohol slowly corrupts and certainly retards the activity of the brain of the greater number of men. They will be able to do all they have to do more swiftly. And this swiftness will leave them leisure—the blessing we want most in this over-worked world. And the leisure, not being led away by alcohol into idleness, into depression which craves unnatural excitement, into noisy or slothful company, will be more nobly used and with greater joy in the usage. And the older men who find it so difficult to find leisure, and who when they find it cannot enjoy it because they have a number of slight ailments which do not allow them perfect health, or which keep them in over-excitement or over-depression, let them try—though it will need a struggle—whether the total abandonment of alcohol will not lessen all their ailments, and by restoring a better temper to the body—for the body with alcohol in it is like a house with an irritable man in it—enable them not only to work better, but to enjoy their leisure. It is not too much to say that the work of the world would be one-third better done, and more swiftly done, and the enjoyment of life increased by one-half, if no one took a drop of alcohol. These considerations belong to us only as persons. There is a wider view, containing in it a larger and more powerful motive—not scientific, not personal—which has not been touched on to-night, but which of itself alone ought to urge us into abstinence, if we cared enough for mankind. I knit it on to one of the arguments used to-night. It has been said that in all ages of the world men have taken narcotic poisons, and derived enjoyment from them. And that is true, and the universal argument is a powerful one. But among these narcotic poisons alcohol stands alone in this—that while it excites pleasantly for a time, its use demands increase of the dose, and the increased dose brings about in a very large number of persons not only personal ill effects as opium does, but a state of body and mind in which crimes are done, in which cruelty, savagery, loss of intellect, of moral feeling, and madness are prevalent, in which the greatest misery is brought on all who are connected with the drunkard. Whatever men may have said in the past about the joys of drinking and of its harmlessness, there is no possibility any longer of doubt that they were wrong. It has been proved step by step that this element received into the human system is the direct cause of far more than half of the crime, the disease and the insanity of mankind, and the indirect cause, through heredity, of unnumbered other evils. It stands alone in abominable pre-eminence as the Power of Evil who degrades and then murders the human race. Nor is this statement one whit exaggerated. It is plain prose. Therefore I say it does not matter what personal enjoyment you get out of it by using it moderately; it is your duty the moment you see the truth—and it is a sad thing to see it only as I have seen it when the half of life is over—to throw yourself heart and soul into the war against this evil for the sake of the human race. Let love of man banish alcohol from you. If you are not able altogether to save yourself from the ranks of those who belong to this evil, save the young who are not yet infected. Take care that none belonging to you touch it. You will do more good by joining in warfare against this wrong power than you will do by any other kind of charitable or active work, and you will be certain that everything you do will bear fruit, will save and redeem men. There are few things of the good results of which we may be certain, still fewer in which the good fruits of our work are allowed to see. This is one of those things. And the work is purely human. It is not necessarily bound up with any political or theological party. It can bind men who differ in anything else together into a brotherhood all the members of which agree in the end to be reached and in the means fitting to attain that end. The sooner we join that brotherhood the better. It is not enough to think only of ourselves, to become total abstainers because our health will be better or our enjoyment of life greater. We are then only wise and selfish. We have not done enough until we enrol ourselves among those who form the army of attack on this great evil, and feel in our hearts the impulse, sympathy, power, and ardour which union for a great human cause creates, supports, and develops towards victory. It is that which taking the pledge means, and, let men laugh as they will, no better and no more ideal action can be done.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.—The forty-third autumnal meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales will be held at Bristol in the second week of October, under the presidency of the Rev. J. A. Macfadyen, M.A., D.D. On the first day, Monday, the 9th, there will be as usual a devotional meeting. On Tuesday the first public session will be held, at which the chairman will deliver his address, and a resolution will be proposed relative to a scheme for the instruction of youth and examinations in Scriptural knowledge and knowledge of Church principles and history. The report of the special committee on middle-class education will also be presented, and in the evening there will be a public meeting, probably at Colston Hall. The programme for Wednesday is a heavy one, and could not be undertaken but for sectional meetings, which allow of several simultaneous sittings. First, there is the reception of representatives from other bodies, which, it is to be hoped, may not be unduly protracted. Then the report of the Jubilee Fund will be presented, and a resolution on the subject be submitted. It is expected the secretary will be able to announce that the fund has reached an aggregate of £200,000. The other features of Wednesday's programme are as follows:—(1) A paper on the obligations which lie on the churches and their pastors in the matter; (2) Two papers on recent developments of evangelistic agency. Sectional meetings at half-past three, when the following subjects will be under consideration:—(1) On the perils arising out of the removal of the distinctions in life and conduct as between the Church and the world; (2) On how best to supply with appropriate lay agency the pulpits of churches unable to sustain a ministry; (3) On the diaconal system as at present maintained in the churches. In the evening a public temperance meeting is to be held in Colston Hall, and there are to be sermons in Highbury, Zion, Russell-town, Hope, and Kingswood chapels. There will also be public meetings or sermons in the following places in the neighbourhood of Bristol:—Bath, Weston-super-Mare, Portishead, Clevedon, Bridgewater, Gloucester, Chippenham, and Frome. The following is the programme for the third day's session, Thursday, October 12:—Address on the social and political dangers with which the present age is threatened owing to the absence of religious faith among large numbers of the people. A paper on intemperance, with resolutions calling attention to the recommendations contained in the committee's report on intemperance, 1877. Business recommended by Reference Committee. Afternoon.—Children's services (three) in Stapleton-road, Pembroke, and Bishopston Chapels. Evening.—A people's meeting in Colston Hall. On Friday morning the proceedings of the Union will close with a Communion Service in Redland Chapel at the early hour of 8.30.

THE NEW CHAPEL AT PECKHAM.—We are glad to learn that the chapel in Avondale-road, Peckham, rapidly approaches completion, and is expected to be ready for the purpose of Divine worship in the autumn of this year. A description of the chapel has been sent to us, from which we learn that it will be in the late perpendicular style of Gothic architecture, the main entrance facade being faced with red bricks, while the other elevations will be of white gault bricks, relieved by stone and red quoins, &c. The building is to be lighted at the entrance end of the nave, at the back of the congregation, by a large, richly traceried window, with a smaller window on each side in the aisles. There will be two large windows in the transepts, and seven other windows, all divided with mullions and transoms, the heads of the upper compartments being traceried. The main entrance is to be by a battlemented porch, 9 feet by 10 feet 6 inches, having an external door at each side, the road front containing a window filled with richly-coloured glass, visible from the interior of the chapel, from which the porch will be separated by a wooden screen filled with plate glass. Internally, the building will consist of a nave and aisles, separated by an arcade of four arches on each side, and, at the east end there is to be a semi-octagonal apse, designed to contain the organ, which will be presented by Henry Tate, Esq. The arch opening to the apse will have on each side a blue pennant stone shaft with capital and base, while the arch itself is of white and blue stone. The walls of the building, which will be of white bricks, are further to be relieved by bands of stone. Over the apse arch there will be a traceried window filled with rich coloured glass; all the other windows having pale-tinted glass, in various shades, in lead quarries, with ruby borders. In front of the organ, on a raised platform, will stand the pulpit or reading desk, of American walnut, richly carved, with panels of crimson cloth, and on either side the choir stalls. The sitting accommodation is for 300. All the seats and other woodwork in the body of the building are to be stained walnut and varnished.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

London, August 22, 1882.

The death of the late William Annette Pope by fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends, they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London Mr. Pope had been for twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the free churches generally.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL, LONDON.

SCHOOL BUILDING AND CHAPEL ALTERATION FUND.

To meet the wants of a densely crowded district, a Large School-room, capable of holding 500 children, is being built. The Chapel is also being altered and improved, so as to make it a better centre of usefulness in the neighbourhood. The congregation is almost entirely made up of people with small incomes, and they cannot well raise more than £200. They can only rely, therefore, on the generosity of those who are interested in the moral and religious elevation of the people to help them to carry through the work.

Now that the tenders have all been handed in, it is found that the cost of building the School-room, of re-roofing, repairing, and improving the interior of the Chapel, and supplying new heating, lighting, and ventilating, apparatus to both, will be between £1,800 and £1,900. Many liberal friends have already promised to assist, but nearly £700 is still wanted.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER, 151, Brixton-road, S.W., will be glad to receive further subscriptions. The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWEN, 4, Wincock-street, Kennington-road, S.E., will furnish any information required.

Amount already advertised (including sums raised by the congregation), £1,087 1s.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

WE have received a neat pamphlet of 145 pages containing the authorised "Report of the National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or kindred congregations, held at Liverpool, April, 1882;" and it affords suitable occasion for adding some further comments to those we penned at the time of the Conference. We wrote then in some degree under the influence of the enthusiasm naturally created by a succession of meetings of unprecedented interest and uninterrupted harmony from beginning to end. The lapse of five months and the cooler reflection which time has brought have only served to deeper and confirm the impressions then formed.

There is an important omission in this official report which we regret to notice. There is no list of the deputations and members of the Congress. There is little or nothing in the pamphlet itself, beyond the names of those who actually took part in the proceedings, to show how important and numerous and thoroughly representative this Conference really was. The lists of deputations published before the meeting in successive numbers of the Inquirer and other papers formed a very striking document, which ought to have been a prominent part of a permanent document like this. It would not have been difficult to have made it absolutely complete, and it would have conclusively shown not only that every section of thought amongst us was represented, but all our important institutions, both of a doctrinal and a practical character, as well as old and endowed corporations like Manchester New College, the Presbyterian Board, Dr. Williams's Library and other institutions which are of a non-sectarian character, and have always very properly kept aloof from purely denominational movements. The omission can easily be rectified in future reissues, and it will be found practical we hope to issue an appendix which may be bound up with the copies already published.

We have preferred to call this Conference by the name at the head of this article than to use the somewhat pretentious designation "National." It will be known in our denominational history as the "Liverpool Conference, to distinguish it from, as we hope, a long succession of similar conferences of ever-growing interest and usefulness, which may hereafter be known as the London Conference, the Birmingham Conference, and the Manchester Conference. It is "national" only in the sense that all the Unitarian Free Christian and kindred Churches and institutions in the nation—a very small number compared with the great hosts of Orthodoxy—were invited to send representatives, and that all, with scarcely a single notable exception, responded to the invitation.

We remarked at the time on the thorough harmony of the proceedings, and the unity of spirit and purpose by which they are characterised from the beginning to the end. This is not a little noteworthy when it is called to mind that considerable varieties of opinion exist among ourselves as in larger Churches; that we are apt to assign even an exaggerated importance to our individual opinions, and the duty of asserting them both in season and sometimes quite out of season, and that we have seldom met in large numbers without opening subjects of disunion which have almost obscured the more numerous points of agreement. This unity we firmly believe was not superficial and purely external, but indicated the perception that is growing amongst us of late years that on all really fundamental articles of faith and practice we are more really united than are any of the Churches and sects founded upon the basis of Credo or Confessional agreement. The thorough harmony of the proceedings was not a little due also to the broad basis on which the Conference was organised, and the practical wisdom and impartiality of the Executive Committee in carrying out the whole order of proceedings. The inclusive character of the Conference was from the first indicated by the breadth of its programme, which left no one out in the cold shade who could reasonably be supposed to sympathise with any of the varieties of free religious thought. If there were any who wished for a narrower basis, who were for distinctly defining our "theological position," in order to keep out all who could not accept their own definitions, their voices were not heard at the Conference itself—nor has their influence since been distinctly perceptible. And so we escaped the rocks on which the American National Conference almost went to pieces at its first meeting, and set an example, as our transatlantic friends themselves tell us, of the practical English way of reconciling our differences not in the way of superficial compromise, but by simply recognising and firmly grasping our manifold points of agreement. Once more have we exemplified the lesson that it is our kindred religious affirmatives, not our negations that unite us.

Mr. CHARLES BEARD's sermon, which is now printed in full for the first time, deepens and confirms the strong impression made upon those who were fortunate enough to hear it. No one knows better than the preacher himself that it was not one of his greatest efforts, not by any means so great as the productions we yet expect from his accomplished pen. But it struck exactly the right note for the occasion. Taking for its appropriate subject "The Life of the Children of God," it was pervaded throughout by the broad universalism which is the characteristic tendency of the highest religious thought of the age. By a wise intuition the preacher gave the right tone to the whole subsequent proceedings of the Conference by making his theme religious and not theological, profoundly spiritual and edifying in the deeper sense of the word, and not speculative or merely intellectual.

It would be almost superfluous to add any lengthy comments upon the papers read during the three subsequent days, and the discussions which followed, already published in full in this and other journals. Whatever remarks we have to make must be reserved for another occasion.

All of them admirable in style and thought they excited but languid discussion, for the very reason that they struck no notes of discord. Mr. HERBERT NEW's paper, with its remarks on liturgies, the "ritualistic cultus," and "other dissenting churches," was one with which, on the whole, we least agreed; and we say this fully recognising the many admirable qualities of an essay which was profoundly religious in its whole spirit, and all the more interesting because it stimulated thought, and led to diversity of opinion.

Mr. HARRY RAWSON's paper on "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds" was universally felt—by ministers and laymen alike—to be the most important feature of the Conference, and its value in connection with this pressing question is considerably increased by the almost exhaustive account of existing funds and beneficial institutions amongst us now published for the first time in the form of an Appendix to the Official Report. The whole subject is so important, and required on many sides such careful consideration, that it would have been better if a whole day instead of the fragment of a single morning session had been allotted to it. The resolution declaring the desirableness of establishing a sustentation fund in addition to the funds that now exist for the augmentation of the stipends of ministers was adopted hurriedly, after a very inadequate discussion, and necessarily before all the remarkable statistics in Mr. RAWSON's Appendix had been placed before the assembly. Still we have reason to feel all possible confidence in the Committee, to whom the whole question was referred, and we defer all further remarks upon the subject of Mr. RAWSON's paper until their scheme has been laid before the public. One or two suggestions on the general question of a new Ministers' Stipend Augmentation may be offered without impropriety, and may possibly prove helpful. We formulate our remarks under the three following heads:—

(1.) That one of the main objects should be to encourage men of the highest education and natural aptitudes to devote themselves to the ministry of our Free Churches.

(2.) That grants in aid should be proportioned to real efficiency of service.

(3.) That no more money or personal effort should be wasted in propping up confessedly hopeless "causes," or subsidising ministers of decaying and dying congregations which only cumber the ground.

Further, if that inevitable proportion of good men which exists in every Church—less we hope, in our own than in any other—who have mistaken their vocation and entered a profession for which they have no adequate qualification, could be induced to retire upon a small pension, or devote themselves to some other honest calling, we should, we confess, have even greater hope for the future success of the Liberal cause than we entertain at this present moment.

The Liverpool Conference of 1882 has done much to confirm the prediction of ALBERT REVILLE, whose glowing words we will not weaken by any translation, when he said, in his response to an invitation to be present, "L'Unitairisme anglais et les tendances parallèles du continent ont reçu la mission de préparer la religion du XXe siècle, une religion de progrès social, d'amour de Dieu et de fraternité humaine, qui répondra à la fois à nos plus impérieux besoins sur la terre et rouverira à nos âmes, ayant soif d'infini, les perspectives sublimes et fortifiantes de la vie éternelle dans le sein de l'Esprit universel. Voila la prophétie qu'au nom de l'histoire religieuse je me crois au droit d'ensurer comme la conséquence de tout ce que nous savons et voyons."

PATRIOTISM.

MAN'S affections cluster round the place of his birth; his own land is dear to him, just because it is his own. There is a magic power in the name of it, which sums up all the most endeared, the most sacred influences of his life. The memories of the past, the joys of the present, the hopes of the future, are bound up in the idea of his fatherland. It is there his eyes first opened to the light of heaven, there he has had to fight the battle of life, or if removed by circumstance from its sacred soil, it is there he longs to spend the calm evening hours of his career, and there he hopes to slumber in peace by the side of his fathers. The suns of that stretch of earth he calls his country may not be of the brightest, its air may not be of the balmiest, nor its flowers of the richest hues; yet it is sacred to him, and towards it he turns his eyes from whatever land he may be in as an exile or a wanderer, as DANIEL turned his face towards Jerusalem when he prayed, and as some of our Orthodox brethren turn theirs to the East at the repetition of the different creeds. This land of his birth, hopes, affections and aspirations is a consecrated land, and its people seem to him a favoured people, even as ISRAEL thought itself the favoured and the beloved of the Lord in ancient days. Not that he now forms any superstitious conceptions as to a special divine guardianship in this land of his fathers; the day is past for such a belief, universal ideas have gained too firm a hold upon the human mind. But he quietly assumes that his country is better than any other, that its manners and customs are more moral, its laws more just, its institutions more perfect, and the life it has to offer the most desirable the world can give. He does not stop to compare the political, social, artistic or religious progress of his own land with that to be found elsewhere. It is enough for him that France, Italy, or England form his home. They have one or other of them given him birth, and for the sacred soil of this land of his birth he lives, and strange to say, though not an inch of it may be his, for this land he is ready to die, as LEONIDAS and his brave band did at Thermopylae in the iron days of Spartan life and valour.

Now it requires but a moment's consideration to see that this spirit of patriotism has a double root-life. It first of all strikes down into the mere physical surroundings of a man's life, and then it afterwards assumes moral characteristics and clusters round the social and political institutions which prevail in the fatherland. It is thus a mere attachment to place in one of its manifestations; it is a strong and exclusive prejudice in favour of la patrie in the other. The former feeling will always exist as long as the human heart is susceptible of sacred associations; the latter is doomed to pass away, let us hope, in the far future of human progress. As a matter of fact, the feelings in question are nearly always blended in every manifestation of patriotism. Of all modern nations France is perhaps the most patriotic; she is most self-sufficing and furthest removed from the cosmopolitan spirit, though her people are too refined and polite to be other than courteous to foreigners. It has often been reproachfully said of the French that there is no home-feeling among them. This is to some extent just, for home-feeling is certainly much weaker in the breast of a son of France than it is with us. But then he lives the larger life of his country more than an Englishman does. France is his home, and for the dazzling renown of the great household to which he belongs he is willing to sacrifice himself at Marengo, Austerlitz, or Waterloo. His own individual existence is but a mote in the sunbeam of glory which he longs to see shed upon his native land. Hence from no other country could the Altruism of COMTE so fittingly have sprung as from France, for it is in that land towards which Scotland's ill-fated Queen looked back so longingly and so lovingly that men live a more corporate life than has probably ever been realised since the days when LYCURGUS created his celebrated but unnatural patriotic system. Still an Englishman loves his native land, and is proud of its position among the nations. And when he is far away in some one of the numerous colonies to which the adventurous spirit, if not the genius of the mother country has given birth, the thought of old England, whether as a source of inspiration or as a terrible heimweh, attests the power the home feeling exercises over him. And to our seamen and soldiers now ready to sacrifice their lives in the East over a quarrel in which they as individuals have not the remotest interest, there is a magic in the name of England, and the thought of the land for which they are fighting, that will charm away a thousand evils and make a bloodstained couch in the desert not only endurable but welcome, because it is, as they think, associated with their country's glory. Such magic attached in ancient days to the name of Rome. It was a name for which the soldier would die, in which the civilian rejoiced. Even the great Apostle of the Gentiles was proud to call himself a citizen of Rome, though he knew nothing of the sunny land where the city of the seven hills had risen into surpassing grandeur. In other words, the patriotism of ancient Rome was almost entirely of the worst kind. Hence the cruel injustice it wrought among the nations. It did not spring from the tender pathos which links the life of man to the green hills or soft silvery streams of his early years; no, it was love born of admiration for the strong but cruel hand of a great, conquering, though happily civilising people.

Now it cannot be denied that patriotic feeling is often very beautiful, and that it has worked wonders of heroism in the history of the nations. And yet, alas! it has wrought sad havoc in every age and land. It has covered the car of civilisation with blood and scotched its wheels with the fiercest passions, though a wise Providence has even here not seldom brought good out of evil. Still it is sad to think of the waste in blood and treasure patriotic wars have caused in the past, painful to reflect upon the enormous waste the standing armies of Europe occasion to-day. It was patriotic feeling and patriotic ambition which led to the great war between France and Germany a dozen years ago, and it was ambition of a similar kind which prompted Russia to enter upon her crusade on behalf of Bulgaria at a more recent period. And what is it but a similar ambition to add some new element of power to the name of England or to extend our special political influence over a particular stretch of country, which has just carried our arms to the East? What are the people of England going to gain by the war? What does it matter, again, to the peaceful inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine whether the French or the German flag flies above their public buildings? And yet France and Germany are keeping up enormous armies to hold or win back these provinces of the Rhine. It really is of no consequence to the people of any nation how large or how small a territory is subject to the Government to which they belong. But it concerns their rulers, and thus the ambition of the few preys upon the patriotism of the many. If a man can cultivate his plot of ground and manage his shop in peace, why should it trouble him whether he is a dweller in one of the smallest of the Swiss cantons or a citizen of the proudest empire the world has ever known? If his taxes are but light and his life is protected by equitable laws, what difference can it make to him whether he lives under the sway of GAMBETTA or BISMARCK? What could he lose indeed if the artificial barriers of nationality were all knocked down, if states and kingdoms with their mutually destructive interests and pretensions disappeared, and there was but one community, that of the whole human race? He might lose the heroic ardour which political patriotism generates; but how vastly he would gain if the fleets and armies of separate States could be swept from the face of the earth!

Happily the extension of steam and telegraphic intercommunication among the various peoples bids fair to invert the Tower of Babel or to reverse the process which is said to have been the result of its daring erection. The old mythical story is not a little curious because it substitutes cause for effect and traces the dispersion of the nations to their incapacity to understand each other instead of making the "confusion of tongues" the result of their dispersion. But this is beside the mark. No reflective man can reasonably doubt that sooner or later mankind will all speak one language. The change may require a dozen centuries or a score to bring it about, but come it must in the lapse of ages. The chances are indeed that a common type of speech will prevail in Europe within a far shorter period, which would, in an important sense, make Europe only one nation. Anyhow the spread of a common type of language among the different peoples will strengthen the cosmopolitan as opposed to the patriotic feeling, and at some remote time the evils of separate national existence must cease. As soon as the nations really know one another they will demand the disbanding of the great armies their rulers now keep up on the plea of national protection. Then the State will disappear in favour of humanity, the glory of sections of the one great family of mankind will be found in the peaceful rivalry of science, art, commerce, or industry, whereas in the old Greek games the laurel-crown of victory will not be stained with blood. Swords may then be beaten into plough-shares and spears into pruning-hooks, when the earth is but one land and the whole human race only a single people. Then there could be no wars, and all armed force would be used merely to repress injustice, as a police force is used in a nation. There would still be room for a semi-independence like that of the separate states of the American Union, but no place for the animosities of conflicting national interests and ambitions. The patriotism of the Englishman, the Frenchman, or the German would cease, and people would love the land of their birth as they now love their native town or the woods and hills which encircle it. They would be men first and members of a community afterwards.

AFTER DEATH.—II.

In our last article we pointed out that the conception of purgatory, stripped of its materialistic accidents, was not unreasonable; and that it was admirably adapted to explain many difficulties that are ever pressing for explanation. Of course, it could only be regarded as a hypothesis (perhaps not the most satisfactory), not being founded on data of experience and observation. In the present article we proceed to discuss another conception of life after death—the doctrine of metempsychosis, or of the transmigration of souls.

This doctrine has never found favour in the Jewish or Christian Churches. It is the belief of Hinduism and Buddhism, and has not spread further. Not many long years ago it would have been accounted sinful to have believed in the transmigration of souls, on the same grounds as those urged by the vehement deacon who refused his pastor gas in the chapel, because the word was not mentioned in the Bible. Even now for a Christian to say he believed in it would probably make the hearer look askance on him, and couple him by association of ideas with Hanwell or Earlswood. And yet the conception, as a working hypothesis, is eminently reasonable. A man lives his life and does his deeds, good and evil. According to his deeds he is judged. "Substitution," or "vicarious sacrifice," is not only immoral, it is absurd and impossible. Every man must suffer the exact penalty and enjoy the due rewards of his doings. It is manifest he does not get his deserts of good and evil in this world. After death he will enter into a new existence, which will be determined by his deserts. His renewed soul will be the outcome of the life he has lived.

Now it is clear there is very much to be said for the reasonableness of this belief. It is absolutely just. With a wise and loving GOD to direct the conditions of life, it enables a man to learn from the past, or, perhaps we should say, seeing that a man is generally unconscious of his earlier existence, it enables him to make stepping stones of the past, and so to rise to higher things, and, in the end, work out his own salvation. And not his own salvation only. For holiness and truthfulness and enthusiasm are as salt, preserving and purifying all souls with which they are brought into contact. Hence the conditions of all humanity may be meliorated, and not the individual only, but the race may gain in wisdom and strength.

It would be deemed fanciful to urge as an argument that many men (the writer among them) experience sensations as if they were aware (in a misty sort of fashion) that what they are now doing has been done by them before under similar circumstances. A physiological explanation has been given of this, though it is open to argument that the form and substance of the brain are due to hereditary influences—that is, to previous existences of others, if not of oneself. The Pagans asserted this previous existence, though perhaps in conscious fable, and SOCRATES (surely not in playful mockery) identified himself with a dead hero. Such arguments, however, are only thought of afterwards by those who are already persuaded of the truth of that which they wish to justify.

But far stronger ground than this can be taken. The lessons of Geology and the Darwinian theory of evolution point to the fact that great results are attained by the working of ceaseless small causes, acting through enormous spaces of time. If a lily of the field is the product of countless ages, so much more will the greatness and goodness of a perfect man be the product of countless ages. To think of a man attaining heaven or hell by the probation of this little "shadow of a shade" of life is preposterous, and runs counter to all that Geology and kindred Sciences teach. The secular theory of metempsychosis allows time for the "mills of God" to grind.

But again. The common notion of immortality is that the soul once created does not and cannot die. But if it cannot die, can it rightly be said to have been created? That which has no end, can it ever have had a beginning? Setting aside in this article the idea of man being a breath of GOD finally re-absorbed into the Divine essence, it is not unreasonable to urge that if man in the future is to have an endless individual existence, so he must have had in the past. A man reaps what he has sown. Does he not also (says the Buddhist) sow what he reaps? The scientific man argues less poetically. The "Conservation of Matter" proves the indestructibility of matter; the "Conservation of Force" the indestructibility of force; so the "Conservation of Life" proves the indestructibility of soul. The soul of a babe is not born. It has merely taken up a new existence, just as it is quite orthodox to believe that when we die our souls take up a new existence. So WORDSWORTH believed and taught. So must they believe who use the expression "The Eternal Son of GOD."

Again. Of all the dreary griefs in this world, second as it seems to the writer only to one, that of the death of an unborn child is surely one of the saddest. It seems a miscarriage of GOD. A purpose broken short off. The little limbs so perfect! The brain so carefully prepared to do its work! The heart all ready for action! But no work or action ready for it. What shall be done for these little ones? They have never proved their manhood. They are immature and vain. It is life and thought and emotion that GOD demands from his children, and these have had no time for them. So felt TENNYSON'S "Grandmother," who "wept like a child for the child that was dead before it was born," after having "fought for his life."

"His dear little face," was troubled, as if with anger or pain;
I looked at the still little body—his trouble had all been in vain."

Well, but if his life was still to come, then there is less room for weeping or regret.

Once more. The writer of "The Decay of Faith" in a late number of the Westminster Review, "assuming the success of Mr. DARWIN in establishing the evolutionary theory," asks some questions which he believes to be puzzling. He asks:—"Where is the line to be drawn at which the mere animal verges into man?" The evolutionist, if he would be logical, must answer, "Nowhere; there is no demarcating line." Animal and vegetable physiology teach us that animal verges insensibly into vegetable and organic or zoic into inorganic or azoic. The distinction between men and monkeys is evident enough, and it seems to have been proved that no existing monkey was the progenitor of man, but a progenitor of man there must have been (according to the Darwinian theory), who was neither monkey nor man.

The writer of the Westminster Review article asks again:—"At what time did man come to have an immortal soul? Why should man have that privilege any more than other animal forms?" I cannot see that the evolutionist who believes in immortality can either answer these questions or, on the other hand, regard them as irrelevant. But to the Buddhist with his notion of metempsychosis they present not the slightest difficulty. He would argue that animals have souls, and therefore immortality, as well as men. He would argue that as men can become better and better from existence to existence, so can animals. And the evolutionist need only take one step further. The type does not remain, but improves till it grows to some higher type. It has long been a question whether instinct is a blind, immature reason or something different from reason. Those who have mixed much with animals and sympathised with them and loved them, and found them responsible to love and kindness, have thought that instinct was a lesser reason, arguing not only from the sense of the ape and the ant, but from the higher qualities of courage, sagacity, generosity, affection, fidelity of the dog, even to a hard master. If a brutal savage and a besotted Nero have an immortal soul, shall not much more a noble-hearted dog have a soul? Do his bright beaming eyes, and the quiver passing through the whole body, and the tongue that licks the hand of the master, and all the mute substitutes for speech mean nothing? If some men mould their lives by the instincts of the brute, some brutes rise to the nobler emotions of man; and this is to be put down, forsooth, to a lively memory of past benefits and fear for past punishments! Nay, it is reserved to the supreme selfishness of men to hand over this life to the devil's work, and then to attempt to spare a last fragment of it to obtain permission from a devil's hell, to call this "religion," and to prove thereby how much baser they may be than a dog!

No attempt is here made to prove metempsychosis. That would be absurd. It is only contended that the doctrine is not unreasonable, and will explain difficulties that require explanation. A plea is made that the subject should be examined without prejudice, and the judgment held in suspense, unless argument decides against it. To reject without examination and without reason is unscientific. It is trite enough, and therefore the better worth remembering, that "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy."

NEW SCHOOL CONGREGATIONALISM.

We are glad to see that the Rev. John Hunter, of York, whose Liberal utterances we commented on a short time since under the title "Dissolving Views of Orthodoxy," is about to be succeeded by a theologian of the same liberal stamp. The Rev. J. Vickery, who is to be his successor, preached his farewell sermons recently in Blackfriars Congregational Church, Aberdeen. A lengthy report appears in the Aberdeen Free Press, and from that we are enabled to judge of what sort is Mr. Vickery's Orthodoxy. The test is all the more fair because here he sums up what his teaching has been during his eleven years' ministry in Aberdeen.

First, on the subject of creeds his view is discriminating and just. "I fully recognise and concede the necessity," he says, "for an intellectual expression as systematic and as full as is possible to us of our best religious ideas. But I have maintained, and I maintain to-day with increased conviction, that the attempt to rule the religious thought of to-day by the formularised conceptions of past ages is hurtful to the best interests of theology, and is seriously injurious to the moral and spiritual life of Christendom. Our creeds can be, at their best, but distant approximations towards that infinite truth whose partial revelations they strive to arrange and express. God is greater than our thoughts of Him. His ways are larger than our highest wisdom can measure, and it is a deep hurt and injury to the religious interests and progress of humanity when the religious thought of great bodies of men is fettered, and their aspirations chained down by the dominance and the rigour of old theorisings of the Divine laws and methods, which are and can be no longer true to the fuller knowledge and the riper culture and the enlarged experience of these later days."

With regard to Christ Mr. Vickery says:—"I have endeavoured to make more vivid to you the sense of the supremacy and perfection of that gracious life, and to lead you to find in him the inspiration of our best life, and the authority for our largest hopes. I have endeavoured to make my religious teaching to centre in the person of Christ. What he was and what he is, has ever seemed to me the best truth that I could utter, the best theology that I could set forth. The conviction has never left me, that my office was not merely to preach to you a theology, but a theology which should be vitally and spiritually Christian." That is to say, he has aimed to imbue his teaching with the spirit of the life of Christ: and this, of course, is the one thing needful to make any pulpit teaching distinctively Christian.

We gather from Mr. Vickery's address that he is one of the large number among the liberal orthodox who have given up the doctrine of Endless Punishment, but he has not yet seen his way to accept that of Universal Restoration. He distinctly declares his inability any longer to preach the traditional view of the pains and penalties of the future life. "But while I have repudiated the older dogma, I have refused to replace it with a newer one. I have simply kept before you the larger hope; but I have never concealed from myself that it was a hope and not an assured conclusion. I have tried to lead your thoughts to the Fatherhood of God, to the infinite pity of Christ and to the complex conditions of life out of which in their totality arise the sins and sorrows of mortality."

On the subject of Human Nature Mr. Vickery takes the same broad and liberal view. "It has also been my desire and aim to emphasise the inherent worth and dignity of humanity; and to insist that only as we study man can we gain our largest and fullest knowledge of the revelation of God. Consequent upon this view of humanity I have refused to accept the theories of man's total depravity as in effect libellous and irreligious. I have loved rather to think of a soul of goodness in things evil." Equally outspoken is our author on the doctrine of the Atonement. He frankly confesses, "I have never been satisfied with any formula of atonement. I have held that the blood of Jesus, which cleanseth us from sin, is but the metaphor of the New Testament for that perfect love which awakens our penitence and reconciles us to fact and law, to duty and God. That Jesus atoneth the world to God I do believe. But the theory of substitution, the death of Jesus as a satisfaction to a law of justice I have never taught because I have never felt its truth, and never have been able to harmonise it with the Father whom Jesus revealed to men, and whose nature is reflected in the moral instincts of his children." Mr. Vickery is quite aware that the doctrine which he has been unable to accept an older school of divinity emphasised as the cardinal truth and fact of Christian preaching. But it has not commended itself to his mind as true, and therefore he has not taught it.

Again, in regard to the doctrine of the Trinity Mr. Vickery has been careful not to dogmatise. "I have not once attempted," he says, "to explain or assert the metaphysical conception of the Trinity. I have spoken to you of the nature of God as revealed in the Fatherhood, in the Divine Son, and in the Holy Spirit. But into the mystery of that divine unity I have confessed my inability to penetrate, nor do I think that theologians can tell us much more of what God is than is given to the most imbibed disciple of Jesus, who in humble piety and faithful duty has gained a vision of heaven and found the secret of a restful contented life. It has seemed to me a thing to shrink from, to appear wiser than we really are." This is well said, and it contrasts strikingly with the pretension which assumes to know what cannot be known, and pretends to describe the Godhead, according to the elaborate description of the Athanasian Creed. On these points then—Eternal Punishment, Total Human Depravity, the Atonement and the Trinity—Mr. Vickery's teaching has been, from an orthodox point of view, simply negative, or what many would call Unitarian. But if on these high matters of doctrine his teaching has been negative or silent, he has at the same time striven to express his hearty and earnest convictions on the great truths of Revelation which he esteems the most truly vital. Let us see if the affirmative side of his theology has been as Unitarian as the negative.

"I have striven," he says, "as the very cardinal fact of my religious belief, to make you to feel that we have a Father in heaven, that God is no pitiless unhumanised force, but one with us in essential nature, and who, from the beginning of the world has been fighting with us and for us in the great conflict with evil. I have striven now and again to make clearer to you the processes of Revelation. I have insisted that to invest the word with its rightful meaning we must extend it beyond the limitations of the written word, and that there is a revelation of the divine nature which in its degree is no less real in the facts of nature and the experiences of human life. But I have regarded all three—Scripture, Nature, and Human History—not as separate forms of revelation, but as separate media of revelation. Scripture is not the Word of God, as we sometimes loosely term it, but the history of the revealing of the Word of God; and as the history of a revelation it bears upon its surface the traces of its development. And that revelation has reached its highest word, its culminating point, in Christ. To understand Jesus Christ we must understand the Old Testament Scriptures. Throughout the whole story of these records there is visible and traceable the evolution of a divine purpose, the gradual swelling and expanding of a grand idea. Jesus stands in relation to these ancient histories as their fullest interpreter, the fulfilment of the law and the prophets."

Mr. Vickery has also set forth the idea of the Church as a society founded by Christ, governed by his spirit and held in practical unity by the cohesive power of spiritual sympathies, and whose supreme mission was to be a witness on earth to the fact of the divine brotherhood of humanity. He has also protested against the sectarian tendencies of the day, because they have ever seemed to him to involve a practical denial of this brotherhood. Besides, he has protested against the sacerdotal and sacramental theories of the Church and against the miserable notion that any Church or any system of outward order can ever exhaust the Divine grace or ever monopolise the Christian name. He has also striven for a broader recognition and interpretation of the relations of Christianity to the multiform life of society. He has protested against evangelical exclusiveness, rejoices that the evangelical party is declining, and that a much wider interpretation of the Christian spirit and of Christian ideas is becoming diffused and accepted. He has striven to enforce the truth that the law of Christ is a law of duty not only in individual life, but in relation to the larger life of society; and that in the sphere of politics Christian duty identifies us with every movement for the establishment of justice, for the spread of freedom, and for the development of the best life and aspirations of the people. It has been complained that he preached politics and not the Gospel. In reply he says, "As I understand the Gospel, it is a great practical force to bring about the establishment of the kingdom of heaven upon earth. Is the preacher of the Gospel, then, to say nothing as to those forces which are working for and against that kingdom?" And he sums up his teaching by saying, "I have regarded a true scheme of religious teaching, however far below my ideal I have fallen, as including everything which tends to purify the tone of our life, to enlarge our knowledge, to refine and to strengthen our emotions, to widen our ideas, and, in short, to make us more truly human, and therein more truly divine."

Such is the substance of a sermon by a Congregational minister on bidding farewell to his congregation. There is nothing new in the ideas and views here set forth; but the whole is deserving of notice as another indication of the present movement of liberal thought in the Congregational body. Still this is not the teaching of probably the majority of its ministers. It is therefore quite clear that there are two distinct schools of thought among the Independents, as much as there are two schools among the Unitarians, and the probability is that this movement of liberal thought will gather strength, that the new school will gain upon the old, and almost entirely change in time the theology of Congregationalism.

CANON FARRAR ON COMMENTARIES.

Who has not groaned under the weight of commentaries, whether he be a Biblical scholar searching for some grains of fact and reality amongst the bushel of chaff, or a plain unlettered layman anxious in his so-called "popular commentary" to solve some of the real difficulties which a few words of real sensible explanation would so often clear up? The publication of the Revised Version has convinced a great many people that a good translation supercedes a host of commentaries of the expository order, while leaving criticism and exegesis still to exercise their high functions. A formidable champion has come to the aid of those who have suffered so long and generally with so much patience. In the current number of the Expositor Canon Farrar, one of the most learned contributors to that admirable storehouse of Biblical exposition, has an article under the significant title "The Clearing of Commentaries," in which he puts to rout a host of our old enemies, and goes far to relieve us from one of the despotisms under the weight of which we have so long groaned. The Age, as the Canon points out, whatever may be its other drawbacks and shortcomings, has certainly been signalised by marked progress in the science of exegesis. A list of conclusions may be drawn up which must now be regarded as finally established. Without himself pretending to furnish an exhaustive list of ascertained results the Canon refers as follows to a few general points:—

"We may surely set down among the certainties of modern criticism of the Old Testament that the Pentateuch in its present form could not have come exclusively from the hands of Moses; that many of the achievements and periods of the Judges were synchronous, not consecutive; that in places where there is an apparent discrepancy between the Books of Kings and Chronicles the latter books, written with an obvious purpose, are of later origin and inferior authority; that the Book of Ecclesiastes was not written by Solomon; that there are few of the Psalms and Prophecies which had not a primary as well as an ultimate significance; that there must be grave hesitations about the authorship and date of the Book of Daniel; that the headings of King James's translators are in multitudes of instances founded upon the most untenable assumptions; that the conceptions of morality among the Jews show an increasing enlightenment as time goes on; that God revealed Himself 'fragmentarily' as well as 'multifariously' in the 'times of ignorance'; that the Bible was not intended to anticipate, and that it does not in any single instance anticipate, the discoveries of modern science; that large allowance must be made for the characteristic metaphors of an Eastern style, and in general for the laws which govern Semitic idiom; that every act recorded in the earlier stages of Jewish history must be considered with immediate reference to the state of feeling and the degree of civilisation prevalent in those ages, and not be made to square with the Christian ideal by the invention of unrecorded miracles. Broad as are these principles, and commonplace as they will seem to many readers, they yet admit of almost numberless applications. And if, among positive results, anyone should also set down such facts as that the Book of Revelation is one of the earliest instead of being one of the latest Books of the New Testament; that the Wild Beast from the abyss is a symbol of the Roman Emperor and the Roman Empire; that the number of the Beast is an enigma which is solved by the name Neron Kesar in Hebrew; that Mark xvi. 9-20, John vii. 53—viii. 11 and 1 John v. 7, formed no part of the original apostolic autographs; that St. Paul was not in the remotest degree thinking of the future Popes of Rome when he spoke of the Man of Sin; that he was not the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews; that the genuineness of the Second Epistle of St. Peter is highly uncertain; that the general understanding of the New Testament would be greatly improved by printing the books of which it is composed at least in an approximate order; that a very vast number of the 'stock' texts quoted in proof of party dogmas are entirely distorted from their original meaning; that our best chance of advancing in the real comprehension of the Scriptures lies in studying the books as books, and the Bible as a whole, and not in splitting it up into texts to be largely used as polemical missiles;—he, I say, who should enumerate these points, among many others, as being beyond the reach of serious dispute, might have books and articles written to denounce him, but would be expressing the views which are regarded as indisputable by the vast majority of such recent critics as have established any claim to serious attention."

Shall we be charged with sectarian vanity if we say that every one of these "ascertained results" has been stated over and over again by our Biblical scholars from the days of Kenrick and Wellbeloved, and have long been the familiar subjects of academical instruction and pulpit exposition? It is simply an unquestioned fact that in criticism as well as in theology the world is rapidly coming round, if not exactly to us, yet at least to the same conclusions as those which our scholars advocated at a time when it required not a little courage to advance "dangerous novelties" and "rationalistic heresies."

As the number of Commentaries, still framed upon the old model, is rapidly increasing, Canon Farrar proceeds with some suggestions for the purpose of helping to clear their pages of unnecessary incumbrances; and it is not a little instructive to follow him here, because old York and Manchester New College students will be reminded of the lessons they long ago learned from Wellbeloved and Wallace, whose traditions of sound and accurate Biblical scholarship are so worthily maintained by Professors Carpenter, Drummond, and J. E. Odgers at the present day.

(1.) From all critical and exegetical commentaries Dr. Farrar would at once exclude all that is of a purely homiletic character, and all long disquisitions about questions of inferential theology. "The object of a commentator should be to establish, to elucidate, and within reasonable limits to illustrate, the real and the primary meaning of the sacred writers so far as it can be ascertained; he ought resolutely to eschew the temptation of reading his own meaning into the text." Moral platitudes and theological crotchets interfere directly with the "dry light" which is indispensable for attaining the intended meaning.

"Sermon-writing upon isolated texts, and the boundless license of drawing ever-widening inferences from narrow premisses, have been more fatal than any other causes to the right understanding of the Holy Scriptures. But if a man does sincerely desire to enter the inmost sanctuary, he must leave behind him all his idols, and above all, the shadowy idola of the tribe, the cavern, and the market-place—those false notions and false phrases and false traditions to which so many of us are tempted to offer our incense even while we stand before the shrine of the Most High. No incense is more acceptable to Him than absolute sincerity and unbiassed love of truth; and it is to be feared that no incense is so rarely offered.

(2.) Dr. Farrar would further expel all allegorising of plain passages of Scripture, in accordance with a sound principle of exposition on which heretical scholars have always acted. Take the Book of Judges as an illustration. The true function of a commentator of that Book is to explain its literal and grammatical meaning; often as far as is possible some solution of its chronological difficulties; illustrate the thoughts and actions of man in the wild period of which it affords us a few glimpses; and show the bearing of the book and its separate narratives upon the history and development of the chosen people. Some of our readers will remember the admirable skill and true historical insight with which all this is done by the late Dean Stanley in his charming "History of the Jewish Church," and the light and human interest thereby given to some of the darkest and most confused periods of that tangled narrative. Treated in such a spirit the early legendary books of the Old Testament are full of instruction and rich in examples of heroic patriotism. Treated by the ordinary dry-as-dust commentator, they are made the excuse of grave perversion of the eternal moral law and become the jest and opprobrium of the more shallow class of unbelievers. Here is a specimen from Commentaries of the class quoted in the article before us:—

"The breaking of Gideon's pitchers is a flashing forth of the Gospel from the broken earthen vessels of martyred saints. Abimelech foreshadows the Pope. Samson becomes a strange type of Christ—'One who out of the prostrate body of sin, Satan, and the grave, gathered for us the honey of spiritual sweetness and holy joy; One who was meek and lowly as Samson was in his modest beginning, but continued meek to the end; One who overthrew his thousands and tens of thousands by the foolishness of preaching as Samson slew the Philistines by a despised instrument, the jawbone of an ass; One who awoke at midnight from sleep—even from the sleep of death—in the strong city of a spiritual Gaza, even in the fortress of Satan, and broke asunder its iron bars and brazen bolts, and carried them away on his shoulders towards the top of a heavenly Hebron:—'and so on, at great length."

We must all feel that this "spiritualising" and allegorising method is in reality very unspiritual; that it effectually deprives us of the real human lessons of the narrative, and is a method of tampering with the letter which is entirely unwarranted by Scripture itself, and often "wrests it to the destruction of the unlearned."

(3.) Along with such allegorisings Canon Farrar would ruthlessly expel all invented miracles, and all attempts to put a gloss on deeds morally wrong. We need hardly remind our readers how much the Old Testament especially has suffered from glosses of this kind. Not so very long ago it was considered a sign of rationalistic heresy to deny that the characters of the Patriarchs were immaculate, or to pronounce the same moral condemnation on the foul deeds of a bloodthirsty age that we pronounce upon similar deeds in classical or modern History. A howl of clerical execration was raised against the late Dean Milman a generation ago because he called Abraham "an Arab Sheikh," and compared David to a Bedouin freebooter. Now, without any great danger Canon Farrar is able to say that "the deed of Jael, judged by every utterance of the moral law from Genesis to Revelation, was a cold-blooded murder aggravated by falsehood and treachery." The characters of a legendary Biblical age are not, of course, to be judged from our own standpoint, and many deeds we now condemn were considered justifiable and even heroic in that age of barbarism and bloodshed. But as the Canon indignantly asks, what are we to think of a quite modern commentary in which we read as follows?—

i. The act of Jael was clearly miraculous (!). The nail went down and sank into the ground as by a Divine impulse and impact, for Sisera has fallen down astounded; . . . he sunk as it were paralysed and prostrate by the visitation of God, who armed and enabled a woman to subdue and destroy the enemy of the Lord and of his people."

ii. "Almighty God incited and enabled Jael to do that by which she fulfilled what God had purposed and foretold should be done."

iii. "And what is the instrument by which the Christian Jael, the Gentile Church, fixes her tent into the earth? What is it by which that tent, when extended, is firmly fastened to the ground? It is the Cross of Christ. . . . 'Palo illum interfecit, id est ligni Crucis acuminem' (Origen)."

iv. "There may well be a parallel between Jael and the Virgin Mary. Deborah sings the Magnificat of Jael."

v. "And is it irrelevant to remark that Jael is called the wife of Heber, but nothing is said of Heber himself? Now the tent is called 'the tent of Jael the wife of Heber'! Is this altogether without a mystery? (!) The tent in which the Lord of all took our nature and tabernacled in us (John i. 14) was the Blessed Virgin; and she was the wife of Joseph, and yet Joseph has no part in the work by which the world was saved, and our enemy was destroyed."

In conclusion, Canon Farrar states that his main object is to recommend a style of exegesis less tedious, less infructuous, less intolerably repellant, and, above all, less absolutely second-hand, than that which has been too long in vogue. It is a real misfortune, he justly adds, especially to the young, that the characteristic of so many professed commentaries is their interminable verbosity and their terrible dullness. It is a still greater misfortune to the old that their progress should be blocked up by accumulations of the obsolete, and by whole trains of reflection and comment not founded upon the real meaning of the author, but upon the erroneous fancies thrust into his words by bias and tradition.

"Nothing is more unprofitable than commentaries stuffed with known, half-known, and unknown German names; with masses of traditional, unverified, and often misleading references; with trite or ponderous moral reflections; with lengthy discussions of theological minutiae with many of which the sacred writer was absolutely unconcerned; with illimitable inferences; with reckless emendations; with masses of collateral or barely collateral 'information'; with superfluous geography, history, and archaeology, nine-tenths of which can have little or no bearing on the subject, and which would have been quite as new to the inspired writers as to the reader; with theories elaborately baseless; with the fantastic allegorising of simple historic narratives; with attempts to get rid of all views which do not accord with our own preconceived dogmas; with the rival egotisms of divergent exegeses; with party innuendoes; with impossible lexical and grammatical suggestions; with defences of the morally indefensible; with attempts to be exhaustive; with long discussions of slightly varying opinions; with efforts to make impossibly nice distinctions in the variation of words, tenses, and particles; with the predetermined struggles to maintain, at all costs, the patristic or the traditional interpretations. If we clear away all that may be fairly classed under these heads, we shall indeed have made havoc with many pages of thick exegetical volumes, but we shall have far ampler scope for the discovery of what the sacred writers really tell us. And if our commentaries sink into more attenuated proportions out of their present enormous and unwieldy bulk, they will gain indefinitely in interest, in sincerity, in profitability, and above all in adaptation to the one end at which they all should aim—namely, the spread of the true knowledge of Holy Writ."

THE EDUCATION REPORT FOR 1881.—I.

It was in the first decade of the present century that the British and Foreign School Society commenced its labours, having for its motto "Schools for all!" Two years later the Church of England, finding that its old time objection to the education of the poor was no longer in accord with the feeling of the nation, started the National Society, but on the narrow and exclusive basis of "church" supervision. But it was not until the year 1832 that the Government recognised either of these societies, and then, upon the suggestion of Lord Brougham, a vote was obtained by the Government granting £10,000 to each of them. At this modest sum the annual grant in aid of education remained until the year 1839, when an additional sum of £10,000 was, by a majority of two only, and after much debate and opposition, voted by the House of Commons. Practically, therefore, the recognition of the duty of the State in connection with education began here just fifty years ago. Between that date and the present time much has been done in connection with this subject, far more than the most sanguine friend of education could then have anticipated. There is a large difference between the £20,000 voted in 1832 and the grant of £2,247,507 made by Government last year. It is not, however, the difference between these figures which is important for consideration, but all that is implied in the difference. The first Committee of Council on Education was formed in 1839, the grants previously having been disbursed by the Treasury. Since its formation down to last year, when the last of the grants in aid of the erection of elementary schools in England and Wales was paid, provision for 1,233,050 scholars has been made in 6,335 new or improved schools, towards which the State contributed just one and three-quarter millions, as against four and three-quarter millions raised by voluntary effort.

One of the most interesting of the papers, which are, from time to time, "presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty," is the annual Report of the Committee of Council on Education. That for the year 1881, which was presented not long before Parliament adjourned, is no less interesting than its predecessors, and to its pages we now propose to refer. From these we gather that the results of the visits and examinations made by the Inspectors, show an improvement upon the returns quoted in the last report. Of the total number on the school registers rather more than three fourths were present on the day of the visit made by the Inspectors to the respective schools, while rather less than that number had been, on an average, in daily attendance throughout the year. Out of those present (3,372,990) nine-elevenths were qualified for examination, and of these 2,615,911 were actually examined. Not quite half passed the prescribed test without failure in any one of the three subjects. It may here be parenthetically stated, that the proportion of passes in voluntary and board schools is in favour of the latter in each subject. The report also shows that there has been an increase in the accommodation, the scholars on the register, the average attendance, and the number of children individually examined. This improvement is not wholly due to the action of the Education Department, as support continues to be derived from voluntary contributions, and there has also been an advance in contributions from the rates, and a rise in school-pence. As somewhat of a set-off against these encouraging facts, it is noted that the number of scholars in night schools has of late years been gradually diminishing. This is not to be wondered at, and is, indeed, only the natural result of the extension of day-school instruction. At the same time there are many children whose circumstances compel them to leave school at a very early age, at any rate as soon as they legally are in a position to do so, and the Committee express a hope that these children will avail themselves of the advantages which, under the new code, can now be obtained in these schools, where the instruction will no longer be confined to reading, writing, and arithmetic.

It appears from a comparison made between the years 1869 and 1881 that the school accommodation in the former year was only sufficient for 8.34 per cent. of the population, while in 1881 it met the requirements of 16.85 per cent. This increased accommodation has been largely met by voluntary effort, and the report before us bears testimony to the "bonâ fide" character of the great efforts which have been made under the voluntary system to meet educational deficiencies, and of the strong hold which that system has had upon the country," seeing that out of 7,237 schools established with Government aid during the last fifty years not more than 153 have ceased to exist; while only 558 Church, Wesleyan, and Undenominational schools have been transferred to the management of school boards. Having regard to the estimated population of this country, it is assumed that, in the year 1881, there were just over six millions of children of school age; from this figure has to be deducted one-seventh, "as being the children of a class above that commonly found in public elementary schools," leaving just 5½ millions for whom elementary education falls to be provided. Assuming that each child goes to school for only seven out of the ten years of its proper school life, there ought to be 3,687,662 children under daily instruction in the public schools. As the average attendance was only 2,863,535, an increase, by the way, of more than double upon the numbers in 1870, there is wanted a further increase of about 800,000 to make up the proper number in attendance. For these, taking the whole kingdom into consideration, there is enough school accommodation, but of course there are some districts where the demand is in excess of the supply, and this will have to be met. There still seems to be a need of more separate accommodation for infants, as the report states that out of 821,667 in average attendance nearly three-eighths were being taught in mixed schools.

While all that has been said points on the whole to an improved state of things, it is not quite so satisfactory to learn that out of the whole number of scholars examined (1,995,698), as many as 1,011,208 being over ten years of age ought to have been presented in Standards IV. to VI., and yet only 527,436 were presented; while 47.84 per cent. were presented in standards suited for children of seven, eight, and nine years of age. Still this is an improvement on the state of affairs in 1863-4, when the Revised Code was introduced, as many as 86 per cent. of children over ten being then examined in too low standards.

We have already stated that at present the accommodation is rather in excess of the average attendance. The report points out, that the figures showing this go to prove, that much remains to be done in enforcing the by-laws, which now extend all over the country. The Inspectors, too, report that many of the local authorities fail, or are hindered by the indifference of magistrates, in carrying out their primary duty of securing the early and regular attendance of the children in their respective districts. Upon this subject a circular was issued, in December last, to all local authorities, asking for information as to the working of the bye-laws in their districts, and as to the causes (if any existed), which were hindering the efficient working of the laws as to school attendance. While it is satisfactory to know that in a majority of instances the replies to the former inquiry show "a decided improvement," it is not so pleasant to learn, that "most unsatisfactory statements" have been received as to the latter. Extracts are given from the replies of the London School Board, the Northwich Union, the Kingston-on-Hull School Board, and others, all tending to prove the indifference or unwillingness on the part of the magistrates to convict, and the heavy expense caused to the ratepayers by the cost of prosecution. The Committee, on "reviewing the whole question of school attendance," believe the time has come (1) for an adoption of one uniform set of by-laws for the whole of England and Wales; (2) for an amendment of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, in so far, at any rate, as it relates to the administration of the Education Acts; and (3) for some modification of these and the Industrial Schools

Acts so as to secure short periods of enforced attendance in cases of truancy or parental neglect, at a public elementary school; or, if needs be, at a school of detention, with an exaction from the parents towards the cost of these proceedings. The Committee say:—"We believe that it would be for the interest of the children themselves, of their parents, and of the country generally, to apply kindly, but more firmly, than has hitherto been done, the provision made by recent legislation for securing to the rising generation the benefit of sound practical instruction, the opportunity for which is now afforded by the existence of an adequate supply of efficient schools and of competent teachers. If the habit of early and regular school attendance were once secured for a few short years, its further enforcement, by resort to the penalties of the law would cease to be generally necessary." In this expression of belief we heartily concur. It is said that there is much hardship in the poor being compelled to send their children to school, when they are wanted to earn something for the support of themselves and those at home. Doubtless individual cases of hardship do occur, but it is altogether a mistake to argue from these against the proper carrying out of the provisions, that the country has made on behalf of the children of the poor. In their interest, above all, it is essential that nothing should be done, or omitted, that will prevent them from securing "the benefit of sound practical instruction."

We reserve to another article the consideration of some other points that a perusal of the report gives rise to.

ANOTHER EXPOSURE OF SPIRITUALISM.—The Peterborough Express publishes an account of a strange scene which took place on Monday evening at a house in that city, where some ladies and gentlemen had been invited to witness a display of spiritualism, through the medium of a Miss Wood, of Newcastle. After an hour and a half of general conversation, Miss Wood recited some poetry, which she said had been composed by "Poche," a little Indian girl about thirteen years of age, who was represented as the "controlling influence." At her request the lamp was turned down, and the company obliged her with singing several pieces. These pieces were several times repeated, all eyes meanwhile being especially directed to the curtained apartment for the appearance of the promised "unearthly manifestations." Presently the patience of those assembled was rewarded by the sight of a small form in white, which emerged from behind the curtains, made a slight "squeaking" noise, and approached a lady in the company, shook hands with her, and then retired. Knocks came for more singing, and a second time the "little stranger" presented herself, and the supposed Indian girl "Poche" began to speak. Little "Poche" was presented with some sweets by the gentleman of the house, and good-naturedly proffered a portion to one lady in the room, to whom she also made known her desire for her to kneel down for a kiss, which was accordingly given by the lady. After various manifestations a Mr. Cade made a spring for the "tiny one," and clasped tightly hold of her. In the confusion which ensued the lamp went out, but Mr. Cade retained a firm hold of the "spirit," who struggled desperately to get free. On a light being obtained Mr. Cade was found holding securely the "lady medium," who had released herself of her bandages, divested herself of her upper garment—a black dress—and by the aid of a quantity of white muslin, on the top of white under garments, and with stooping considerably, had presented herself as the little Indian girl "Poche." The séance broke up abruptly.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk—sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Cocoa Essence for afternoon use.

Occasional Notes.

MR. EUSTACE NEVILLE ROLFE, in a letter to the Times from Naples, writes:—"An important painting has been found at Pompeii, and was yesterday placed in the Naples Museum among the Pompeian frescoes. It represents the judgment of Solomon, and is the first picture on a sacred subject, the first fragment either of Judaism or Christianity that has been discovered in the buried cities. The picture is 5ft. 6in. long, and 19in. in height, and is surrounded by a black line about one inch in width. The scene is laid upon a terrace in front of a house adorned with creeping plants, and shaded with a white awning. On a dais (represented as being about four feet high) sits the king, holding the sceptre, and robed in white. On each side of him sits a councillor, and behind them six soldiers under arms. The king is represented as leaning over the front of the dais towards a woman in a green robe, who kneels before him with dishevelled hair and outstretched hands. In the centre of the court is a three-legged table, like a butcher's block, upon which lies an infant, who is held in a recumbent position, in spite of his struggles, by a woman wearing a turban. A soldier in armour, and wearing a helmet with a long red plume, holds the legs of the infant and is about to cleave it in two with his falchion. A group of spectators completes the picture, which contains in all nineteen figures. The drawing is poor, but the colours are particularly bright, and the preservation is excellent. As a work of art it is below the average Pompeian standard, but it is full of spirit, and drawn with great freedom. The bodies of the figures are dwarfed, and their heads (out of all proportion) large, which gives colour to the assertion that it was intended for a caricature directed against the Jews and their religion. This may be so, but my own impression is that the artist was anxious to develop the facial expression, and, to do this, exaggerated the heads. There is nothing of caricature about it in other respects."

MR. BAXTER, M.P., speaking at Forfar on Monday, at a meeting of the Independent Congregation, said that an undue reverence for creeds of man's devising and the power of Church Courts to override the wishes of congregations are passing away. The latter now practically manage their own affairs, and everywhere men are looking more to the words of the founder of Christianity and less to dogmas of catechisms, which it is hard to find in His teaching. The law and testimony as expounded by Him encourage no harsh interpretations, but proclaim a freedom of thought and action which sects have been slow to recognise. Let us hope, he added, that the tendency to religious rancour which Scotland evinced so long is disappearing fast; the laity are tired of shibboleths, and liberal-minded clergymen of all communions are in many ways showing their dislike to heresy-hunting and wordy strife. The Christian world begins to appreciate the folly of fighting about names and forms and abstruse doctrines when real work is to be done, requiring undivided energy and union. The age of what Butler in "Hudibras" calls "old perverse antipathies" is over, and no sect can look forward to a successful future which does not fully realise the significance of the change. Of course there must always be agitation and discussion more or less warm as long as national endowments subsist; but when true equality in that respect shall have been established, and the voluntary principle left to develop itself and show its power without let or hindrance, we may look forward to a time of peace founded on broad views of freedom of conscience, and to a great manifestation of that charity which is the first of the Christian graces.

THE American Freethinkers' Convention, at which 500 delegates were present, has been held at Watkin's Glen, New York. A proposition for the establishment of a Free Thought college has been discussed, and a committee, of which Colonel Ingersoll is chairman, appointed to consider the best means of carrying out the project. On the third day an account was given of a town in Missouri called "Liberal." "It is not yet two years old. It was founded upon the idea of building up a secular community, with secular schools, where men and women would be respected for their moral and personal worth, and not for their faith or what they believed. There was no preacher there and no saloon, no God and no devil, no church, no drunkenness or brawling. Every Sunday evening there was an instruction school. The inhabitants already numbered about three hundred, and families were constantly coming in. A 'liberal' orphans' home had been established, where children are to be instructed in such branches of industry as will enable them to make a living, where no sectarian or supernatural religion is to be taught, and where no teacher of such religion at all is given employment."

THE deaths are announced this week of Sir George Grey, the veteran statesman, aged eighty-four; John Crawford, one of the last of the Trafalgar heroes, aged ninety-five; Henry Kendall, the Australian poet; and Mr. Alderman Gradwell, the Mayor of Barrow; and Lady Baxter, widow of Sir David Baxter, who was knighted for presenting a park to Dundee, aged eighty-one.

THE City of London is to be congratulated on the appointment of Mr. Benham (formerly vicar of Margate) to the vacant living of St. Edmund the King, Lombard-street. Mr. Benham is one of the six preachers of Canterbury Cathedral, but he is better known as an author, and especially as the editor of the beautiful Memorial Volume on Catherine and Crauford Tait, the wife and only son of the archbishop whose illness is now exciting universal sympathy.

THE medical officer of the State Board of Health of San Francisco, in a recent report of the sanitary condition of that city, speaks in the following terms of praise of the hygienic habits of the much reviled Chinese:—"They eat to live, and do not live to eat. They are clean in their habits, and they drink no whisky. I have never seen a drunken Chinaman in my life. They consequently obtain a better resisting power to the attack of disease. They constantly wash themselves, and keep themselves and their clothes clean. The death rate is greater among the whites than among the Chinese, greater with adult white people than with adult Chinamen. There have been no epidemics among them; and there has been less small-pox among them than among the whites, the ratio of population being allowed."

SIR JAMES PICTON, chairman of the Liverpool Free Libraries Committee, was elected at the meeting of the Library Association as chairman for the ensuing year. Mr. E. B. Nicholson, Bodley's Librarian, Oxford, moved a resolution in favour of the general principle of opening public libraries, museums, and art galleries for some part, at least, of every Sunday. He declined to discuss either the religious or social question. One great objection to the proposal was the hardship inflicted upon the officers of such institutions. Let the only association in the kingdom entitled to speak on their behalf express its opinion. The previous question was carried by acclamation.

IN an admirable introduction to an address to medical students, the Lancet insists that "the conjunction of a sound mind with a sound body is an indispensable condition of the successful study and practice of medicine." While urging the importance of care for the physical health and development and of the liberal cultivation of the understanding, the writer does not advocate the doctrine that a university training is, as a rule, desirable for medical students. He thinks, rather, that the youth who takes his degree in Arts before applying himself to the technical training required by the medical practitioner is likely to have passed the time when he can readily acquire the rudiments of technical training, or to have acquired "an intellectual starchiness" which makes him disdain the necessary drudgery. The writer dwells, also, upon the important distinction between the acquisition of knowledge and the acquisition of wisdom, and remarks that "however large the amount of instruction imparted in the medical curriculum may be, the medical student and practitioner who shall be worthy of their calling must be, in a large measure, self-taught."

It is not often that we have an opportunity of getting our cardinal principles fairly stated in what is sometimes called the "secular press." We are really indebted to Punch, whose religion is always genial, and free from the slightest suspicion of cant, for the following paragraphs, under the heading "A Serious Muddle":—

"A 'Serious Young Man' is greatly exercised by the subjoined passages in a speech delivered, according to the Hampshire Independent, at the late Annual Meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association, held at Newport, I.W.—Subject, 'The need of urging the claims of Christianity on the people.' In the course of his remarks, as reported, the speaker, questioning the tactics of the Salvation Army, said:—

'If Christianity was to be really aggressive, it must not spend itself in mere excitement, or cramp itself within the limits of narrow dogmas. It must be wide and open, teaching such doctrines as the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and a strong belief in immortality.' (Sic.)

"The 'Serious Young Man' had always understood that the Unitarians, however sadly in error as to their peculiar principles, were, in point of moral doctrine, at any rate, a respectable body. He had ever supposed them altogether the reverse of Antinomians; or, as he has heard an old lady say, Antimonials, and never dreamt that not only did they profess Antinomianism, or Antimonialism, but pushed it to the extent of actually inculcating immorality. He had lately had an idea of joining the Salvation Army; an inclination which was very much strengthened by finding the method of that soldiery represented by an Unitarian as opposed to a belief in immortality."

Of course, the Serious Young Man is dumb-founded simply by immortality without a T. (No paradise for a Teetotaler.) He fails to perceive that misprints will occur in the best edited newspapers."

THE most imposing of the numerous festivals figuring in the Jewish Calendar, that of the New Year, commenced at sunset on Wednesday evening. The year thus entered upon will be the 5,643 of the Jewish era. With the exception of the sacrifices, which cannot be offered in consequence of the destruction of the temple, and a few modifications which have been introduced through the shifting circumstances of the nation, the Jewish ritual for the New Year continues to the present day to be essentially the same as it was in the days of our Saviour.

THE Times has furnished some interesting information relative to the subject of oath-taking in France. Until recently the French judicial oath was very simple. A witness was merely required to lift his hand and say, in answer to a religious invocation, "Je le jure;" and the foreman of a jury in delivering a verdict laid his hand upon his heart and said, "On my honour and conscience before God and men," &c. As the result of what is described as a non-juring epidemic, the French Government brought in, and passed a Bill which substitutes for the old oath the simple formula, "On my honour and conscience I swear." Even this, however, is too much for our logical friends across the Channel, who object to the words "honour" and "conscience" as superfluous. "Honour and conscience," they say, "are abstract ideas, the meaning of which varies according to the character of the individual who uses them. How can a notorious rogue, whose testimony may be necessary to the ends of justice, talk of his honour and conscience? Sometimes a convict has to appear in the witness-box; will it not be a mockery to hear such a one give his word of honour?" So, it is added, that "the new oath, which was to have respected everybody's scruples, has offended the religious, while failing to content those who want an oath which shall embody nothing disputable." It is also stated that the Act was passed in entire disregard of the opinions of the judicial body.

Reviews.

Some Helps for School Life. By the Rev. J. Percival, M.A., LL.D. London: Rivingtons. 1882.

Boys are seldom in love with sermons; but there is in most boys, even the worst of them, an unfeigned respect for true manliness and simplicity, and no one who reads Dr. Percival's "Helps for School Life" can doubt the unspoken power which he must have exercised among them. The word "unspoken," though it sounds paradoxical in relation to the volume before us, is used advisedly. For it is, indeed, likely enough that many of the boys who were present at the preaching of these sermons knew of them only by the hearing of the ear, and hardly that. But the power of the preacher's personality would be felt among them daily. From those sins which boys account unpardonable he is singularly free. In healthy and energetic boyhood there is a natural sense of humour, broad, uncompromising and vivid rather than delicate, and which is hawklike in its perception of moral weakness, unreality, hysterical enthusiasm. A man may be ardent, gentle-hearted, God fearing; but if there be in him also a touch of religious cant, this, in the judgment of boys, is likely to weigh down the losing scale against all his virtues. From cant, unreality, hysterical enthusiasm, these sermons are absolutely free. It is impossible to read them and not to feel that he who wrote them must have exercised a deep and lasting influence on the boys by whom he was surrounded.

There are some who speak and write as though personal faith, if it is to have any value, must fall ready made from heaven upon a child's waiting heart, undimmed by any human medium; or must at best be the growth of the individual soul for itself and by itself, unaided and unprofaned by any human fellowship. Dr. Percival is untouched by any such unchristian heresy. Accepting the revelation which consecrates the human body as well as the human soul, and virtually forbids all separatism as futile and even blasphemous, he preaches clearly enough the incalculable strength and the profound responsibility involved in all corporate life. Under this title of "Corporate Life," in the first sermon of the series he strikes the keynote of them all:—

"Next to a pure and blameless life the greatest virtue which any among you can exercise, situated as you are in this place, is that which you know by this name of public spirit. If you cultivate the sense of brotherhood, which lies at the bottom of this quality; if you follow its dictates, and denounce everything that is mean or selfish, or in any way base (for these are the things that stand opposed to it), then you cannot fail to sow the seeds of a good and true life, which will grow by your efforts, as time goes on, into a life that can never die. It may seem, perhaps, as if this were scarcely religious teaching; but let me ask you not to be misled by any conventional words. The root and centre of our religious life lies in these common things. For what, if we consider it, is true religion? It is the purifying and ennobling portion of our daily life and actions. It is to know Christ, and to grow like Him; and we have to remember that he draws us to Him by the cords of our common life, and by every good element in it.

"What is the end for which you come here? First of all, no doubt, that you may increase in knowledge and cultivate your understanding; you come as you would say, to acquire useful learning. But this is not all; it is not even the greatest part; your education in this school is intended to make your life a 'nobler, cleaner, fairer thing' than it was before, or could have been without your schooling here. Whatever helps to this great end is the working of the Spirit of God; whatever hinders that work is the devil's own doing."

And the closing words of the chapter call up a vivid realisation of the power that must have dwelt with the preacher to inspire those eager young lives in whom he recognised such awful possibilities; to inspire them, not so much through his spoken words as by his unwritten deeds. "Heaven and earth," he says, "may pass away, but the effects of our lives upon other immortal souls will remain for ever and ever!"

In the epic of which Sir Galahad is the hero

Tennyson tells us of the maiden who had herself seen the Holy Grail that "She laid her mind on him, and he believed in her belief." And the power which was given to the pure-hearted nun has been entrusted in yet fuller and deeper measure to strong uncloistered men. Do we not read of Sir Galahad in the same poem that as he looked on his fellow knights his comrades grew, "One with him to believe as he believed?" King Arthur himself was the symbol and the antetype of that passionate force of irradiating conviction and enterprise which throughout all ages has led the souls of men in knightly enterprise and self-sacrificing achievement, a human life burning with the divine fire which shall set every other noble heart aflame and go forth to conquer the world.

Such a power dwells with every true teacher and leader, whether among boys or men. There is many another son of Arnold besides the poet who wrote "Rugby Chapel," who would say of him:—

"And through thee I believe
In the noble and great who are gone.

Ye fill up the gaps in our files,
Strengthen the wavering line,
Stablish, continue our march,
On to the bound of the waste,
On to the city of God."

And Dr. Percival is preaching to masters as well as to boys. "No man," he says, "should underrate his own influence. And here especially we should all remember how soon influence makes its mark, how short indeed is the period from seed time to harvest! School generations come and go so quickly that a stamp is very soon impressed and a spirit soon sown. And the thing which has once been sown and rooted, who shall eradicate?"

A sense of the stupendous meaning which lies hid in the common-place routine of daily life seems to be ever vividly present with him. "We are weaving," he says, "the future out of our present life, and let us not deceive ourselves by thinking otherwise." Throughout his preaching he warns his scholars, not against any vague and universal depravity of human nature, but against the mean and common shortcomings which they know by name and can recognise at a glance. Levity, selfishness, moral cowardice; these are not merely enumerated and declaimed against; clearly, straightforwardly, in language simple enough to be used by boys themselves, these things are analysed, described, made despicable. And every note the preacher touches deepens the assurance that he understands boys and loves them, and will therefore be heard by them. For to what does he appeal? To pietism? To saintliness? To transcendental ambition? To none of these, for not to these would the sound, high-bounding life of a healthy boyhood respond. He appeals to the one virtue which the weakest and the most stupid respect in common with the most vigorous and the most brilliant; he appeals to manliness.

The sermon on the "Putting away of childish things" must have gone to the very root of many an evil. The fine discrimination between what is childish and what is childlike, between wholesome merriment and cruel levity, and the outspoken accusation of moral cowardice in those who may nevertheless be physically brave, must have gone straight to the mark. It is difficult to separate any part of this chapter from the context, for there is no redundant word or thought, and yet on the other hand no epigrammatic summary of warning or of precept.

To take a few sentences at random:—"Many-a-one," he says, "who fears no risk, and thinks little of pain, can be surprised into a falsehood or an equivocation at almost any moment. He would resent it as a lie if he were called a coward, and yet he is guilty of weaknesses far more contemptible than any form of physical cowardice.

"Many a one whose nerves are firm enough in the face of danger is weak as a child if exposed to mockery or ridicule, is a slave to what the world may think of him, and has no courage to stand alone. Yet who could be further than such as he from our idea of Christian manliness?"

An adverse critic would accuse this and others among the sermons of tameness. Doubtless there is throughout a lack of fire, of passion, it might almost be said—of poetry. It is easy to read them with a steady pulse and untroubled eyes. They create neither rhapsodies nor visions. But there is the calm, sane force of truth in every line. There is the moral strength which will claim the respect alike of boys and men, as well as the gentleness which will make them great.

And very fine is the warning against that spirit of narrow prejudice which may blind us to the very truth we are seeking, that spirit which, we are reminded, made it impossible for the Jews to recognise the Messiah for whom they were yet looking "with an expectation so intense that it became the centre of all their thought;" and well may we be assured that "this is a lesson which we might learn much nearer home."

Nor is it possible to read without a thrill of awe the preacher's recognition of the continuity of all spiritual life. "The laws above," he says, "are sisters to the laws below." . . . "Atom is drawn to atom in the moral world."

It has been said that the writer of these sermons to boys avoids therein anything like mysticism, yet it is clear enough that he has himself drunk far too deeply of the spirit of Christianity to be unaware of its mystic element. It may be true that he speaks little of the sacramental union of the church with her One Lord and of many other divine mysteries, but such sentences as the following strike the key note of his silence, and fill us also with reverent and silent awe:—"Let us catch something, some faint reflection of that spirit in which men once approached Him of the incommunicable name, and whom we out of reverence have styled Lord."

The whole book breathes a true and deep liberality,* both political and religious, as different as light from darkness from that which he himself designates that "spurious young man's liberalism, which is the child of indifference, nay, which is begotten by shallow criticism of cynicism as its mother, and nursed by luxury and want of faith." And perhaps after all it is the simplest of the teaching which is, as the writer intended it to be, of the greatest and most lasting value. "Surely," he says, "this talk about being up to the average, this aiming at being just what your neighbours are and nothing better, sounds very strange when we think of it as coming from a disciple of Christ. It would seem as if those who use it had just reversed these fundamental precepts of the New Testament, and had understood St. Paul to say:—"Take care that you be conformed, not transformed; be like the time; do not be worse than your neighbours; but, being about as good as they, be content; to push forward is no particular call of yours."

There is a fine note of scorn here which is just as truly Christlike as the deep and tender pleading which throbs through so many of the other chapters.

There is in this book—to close with a quotation from Dr. Arnold which we find there,—the "moral thoughtfulness, which is at once strengthening, and softening, and elevating; which makes a man love Christ instead of being a fanatic, and love truth without being cold or hard."

Remarkable Women as Examples for Girls.
By Ann Swaine. London: Sunday School Association. 1882.

We have previously referred to most of these sketches of remarkable women as they appeared in successive numbers of Teachers' Notes. In their collected form they make a charming little book, elegantly printed and bound, and which would be a most appropriate prize for both Sunday and day-schools, as well as a gift book for Christmas and any other season. Miss Swaine has made admirable use of her materials, and tells the stories of these familiar lives in a style of graceful simplicity, which is very winning to older readers, as it is sure also to be to younger ones. We cannot give a better idea of the book and its contents than by quoting in full the "general summary" with which it concludes, which will serve also to show who are the "remarkable women" whose character and work are so well delineated:—

"The women whose lives have been here sketched varied greatly, as must have been seen, in ability, in tastes, in position in life, and in the direction in which their powers were turned. Some had rank and wealth; others were in struggling, or even humble circumstances. Some devoted themselves to works of benevolence; others to science and literature. Some occupied prominent places in society; others were known only to a few. But all were alike in this, namely, that their lives were earnest and pure; and therefore they are worthy the attention of girls growing up to womanhood, girls who do not know what may be in store for themselves, what opportunities of usefulness, perhaps of eminence, may be their portion, and who, in any case, will be called upon to do their duty in some sphere.

"In all ages there have been good women, but these examples are all taken from modern times, and some of those described have only recently passed away. No doubt they all had their faults and failings, but as they are here presented as examples, not as warnings, the blemishes are passed over and the excellences only are dwelt upon. A few points respecting them may again be reverted to.

"Caroline Herschel and Mary Somerville were chiefly celebrated for their scientific attainments, the former as a discoverer, the latter as a writer; but what should be noted as particularly worthy of imitation is the self-forgetfulness with which Caroline Herschel considered her brother's interests and happiness before her own, and the patient industry and cheerfulness of spirit which Mrs. Somerville displayed to the last.

"Ann Taylor, Harriet Martineau and Charlotte Brontë were literary women; they had natural talents, but they would never have become what they were if they had not been painstaking and persevering in no ordinary degree. Miss Taylor also, it must not be forgotten, worked as an engraver, and almost led the way in those employments and means of livelihood now open to women, but from which in her early days they were usually shut out.

"Two things are very observable about Harriet Martineau. The first is, that, as soon as she was aware that she must not expect to live in that opulence in which she had been brought up, she did not sit down in despondency, but with decision set to work to gain her own living, and with such success that she attained in the course of years to moderate affluence. The second is that she employed her talents not so much to gain fame as to spread information on topics useful to every one, but little understood, such as strikes, trades' unions, prices, wages, and other matters of the same kind, and that she raised her voice against slavery when many dared not do it.

"Charlotte Brontë's time was not wholly taken up with study and work for the press, though these were her favourite occupations, and she never neglected for what she preferred the hard and sometimes irksome household duties of the dreary parsonage at Haworth. She had, as we have seen, great early disadvantages, and, as she grew older, trials that would have weighed down weaker spirits. With some bright intervals, hers was to a considerable extent a sorrowful life, certainly one of dulness so far as outer things were concerned; but she achieved much, and she left works which have been, and will continue to be, a pleasure and a profit to all who read them. The same may be said in a less degree of her sisters Emily and Anne, in their yet briefer lives.

"The Princess Alice was in a different station from any of our other heroines. Her goodness was really of a simple, domestic kind, and it only shone out conspicuously on account of her high rank. It is pleasant to see how considerate she was for those around her, how sympathising to the suffering, and how determined to look upon her great position as affording an additional reason why she should labour with all possible zeal for the general good.

"Unlike her, Nurse Maguire was in humble life, a poor Irish servant, and nothing more; but she was rich in love and faithfulness, and in all that helps to make up a noble character, so that she is as much to be esteemed as the highest, and her life shows how much can be done by one who has had only a slender education and possesses but very small means.

"Mary Carpenter's life teaches a lesson of the value of strict attention to business, for which she had no doubt uncommon capacity. She began life for herself very young, and soon entered upon a business which was small at first, but under her skilful management soon grew large and profitable. She gave her whole mind to it, and tried to make everything perfect in its way, whether it related to the quality of the goods, the arrangements for the shop, or the comfort of those employed, continuing to give her assistance when she was of a great age.

"Catherine Tait was one who could adapt herself to any circumstances, and her life on that account alone would deserve study, as the power to do this is not easily acquired, and yet it may be required from anyone. Alike in her girlhood in her father's house, and as wife of a man who became in turn head master of a great public school, dean, bishop, and lastly Archbishop of Canterbury, she conducted herself admirably, and seemed always prepared to do the right thing at the right time and in the right place. But she especially shines as the mother of a family. Upon her children she not only bestowed her warmest affections, but was just beginning to educate them with peculiar care when the bitterest disappointment fell upon her in the early deaths of most of them, a disappointment, however, which she bore meekly and submissively, and which never prevented her from attending to what was required from her in other ways.

"Honora Nagle, Marie Augustine, Amalie von Lasaulx and Sister Dora, were alike in devoting their lives exclusively to benevolent work. Several of the other women to whom attention has been drawn did quite as much good, but these four thought only of one thing—serving the poor and suffering.

"Honora Nagle must have had great perseverance and very much hopefulness to begin anything so new, and so ridiculed at the time, as gathering the most ignorant girls of an Irish town into schools more than a hundred years ago; but her quiet way of working on amidst great discouragements and her reward at last are instructive to all. The same may be said of Marie Augustine and her companions, who began by helping one old blind woman, and ended by founding institutions which have now hundreds or thousands within their walls.

"Sister Dora and Amalie von Lasaulx were nurses by profession, both educated ladies, but willing to give up home comforts, and the society and pleasures they might have enjoyed, for the sake of attending to those who sorely needed help and sympathy. The former nursed in hospitals in England, the latter on the battlefields of Germany. Very few are really fitted for such work, and only those who are should think of undertaking it; but it is possible that a few of those who here read of these two good women may have the nerve and the ability to do as they did. At any rate they can do their best if illness or accident comes within their own homes.

"The lives of many more women might have been recorded, some equal to these, some perhaps superior, but these may be regarded as types of a large number; and they are sufficient to inspire many young girls, whose characters are still unformed, and who have yet much to learn, with the desire to mould their lives according to a noble plan, to cultivate such talents as they possess to the utmost, and not to pass through the world altogether in vain, either for themselves or for the circle, large or small as it may be, in which they move."

Literary Notes.

MESSRS. HURST AND BLACKETT will publish during September a new work by the Rev. A. G. L'Estrange, entitled "The Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford, as recorded in letters from her Literary Correspondents," in two volumes.

THE editing of the correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson has been entrusted to Professor Norton, of Harvard University, United States. The interchange of letters began in 1834, and some specimens of Emerson's letters appeared a little time ago in that journal. Carlyle before his death gave his sanction to the appearance of his portion of the correspondence.

THE BISHOP OF NATAL having completed one volume of his analysis of documents connected with the Zulu war has made considerable progress with a second volume, which contains much information concerning the recent troubles in Zululand. The Bishop's work is being set up at his private printing press at Bishopstowe.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH AND FARRAN will publish shortly a new edition of Bogatsky's "Golden Treasury for the Children of God," and "The Churchman's Manual," compiled from the writings of English divines, with graces and devotions for the seasons, litanies, and an entirely new selection of hymns.

MR. G. W. RUSDEN, for many years Clerk of the Parliament in Victoria, has in the press a "History of New Zealand," which deals with the manners and laws of the Maoris.

M. ALPHONSE L. PINART proposes to publish in Paris the results of an expedition he has recently made through Central America and Mexico.

Polybiblion states that M. Laroche, of the Société de Géographie de Paris, is engaged upon a systematic bibliography of all geographical works relating to England.

A BIOGRAPHY of the late Professor Cairnes, the distinguished political economist, is in preparation.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN AND Co. announce a new edition of the works of Emerson, to be published uniformly with the "Kingsley Edition" of Charles Kingsley's novels. It will be in six volumes, with an introductory essay by Mr. John Morley.

THE death is announced at Rome of Signor Paolo Giacometti, an Italian dramatist, who is chiefly known in England for his historical plays of Elizabeth, Queen of England, and Marie Antoinette.

A TYPE foundry of the Burmese character is about to be established at Rangoon, to meet the demand arising from the increased amount of printing in the vernacular.

ACCORDING to the information furnished by recent numbers of the Farhan, the journal of Ispahan, civilisation is making considerable progress in Persia. A large college, which was completed last year with Government aid, has now commenced its work in earnest amongst the upper classes of Persian youths.

MISS CONCORDIA LÖFYING, late Inspector of Gymnastics to the London School Board, has published, with Messrs. Sonnenschein, a little work entitled "Physical Education and its Place in a National System of Education," dedicated by permission to the Princess Louise. It advocates the more general introduction of gymnastics into the school course.

PROFESSOR SEELY'S "Life and Times of Stein" is being translated into French, slightly shortened. The German translation is nearly printed, and will soon be out.

It is with great pleasure we hear that the Three Cousins' "Short Sermons for Children" are to be translated for publication in Holland.

As a sequel to the story of "The Little Pilgrim" appears in this month's number of Macmillan's Magazine under the title of "The Little Pilgrim goes up Higher," it may interest some people to know that the writer is Mrs. Oliphant.

THE new volume in the "English Men of Letters" series is "Swift," by Mr. Leslie Stephen. This will be shortly followed by "Macaulay," by Mr. J. Cotter Morison; "Sterne," by Mr. H. D. Traill; and "Sheridan," by Mrs. Oliphant.

MESSRS. TRUBNER are the publishers in this country of a sketch of the life of Sir Louis Cavagnari, written by a native of India, Kally Prosono Dey.

A DISCOVERY of the highest interest is reported from Holland. Two old MS. lists have been found, each affixing the prices of several masterpieces of Dutch painting. The one is a catalogue of a State lottery held at the Hague in 1649; the other is an inventory of the pictures bought by some unknown person about the middle of the eighteenth century, with the prices that he paid. For the lottery in 1649, Teniers' "Alchemist" was valued at 25 florins; a group of peasants by the same painter, also 25 florins; "A Great Battle," by Cuyp, at 52 florins; five other works by Cuyp, from 45 to 52 florins; a Jan van Goyen, 25 florins. In the middle of the eighteenth century the following prices were actually given:—A sea piece by Van de Velder, 400 florins; a battle piece by Wouverman, 44 florins; "A Lady at her Glass," by Gabriel Metz (measuring 8 in. by 7½ in.), 105 florins; a group of peasants by Van Ostade, 70 florins; "Peasants at Home," by Teniers, 70 florins.

ACCORDING to the Courrier de l'Art, Mr. Ruskin's little Meissonnier, which recently sold for £6,000, has become the property of Defero Bey, whose house on the Boulevard Haussmann already contains a very valuable gallery of modern pictures.

COLOUR PREJUDICE.—The Rev. W. A. T. Smith, a coloured clergyman, was refused accommodation at an hotel in Providence, U.S.A. He will begin an action against the proprietor under the Civil Rights Law.

Our Contemporaries.

THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT.

The Spectator writes of Lord Selborne's Act:—

To the poor, the immense majority, the new law will, we believe, be an unmixed blessing. It only repeats in essentials the provisions of the Act of 1870, but the broad principles laid down will make that Act more workable. In decent and quiet households the only effect of the Act will be that the wife, if she earns wages, will have a more perfect control over their expenditure, and as she is sure to spend them on the children that is no evil; but in other households a great wrong will be prevented. In thousands of households, especially in London, the decent working woman now maintains the children while the husband spends his wages on drink, and periodically pillages his wife's hoard. She can now prevent this. It is said that she cannot, that the husband will "either kiss her or kick her" out of the money, and will, in fact, be more inclined to violence than he is now. Those, however, who argue thus misunderstand the character of our people. The law to them stands in place of all other standards of right and wrong. The husband at present is under the conviction that his wife's wages are his own, and that in refusing to hand them to him, or in stinting his drink-money, she is depriving him unjustly of his own. Once let him be convinced that the law is altered, as he must be convinced, slow as he has been to take in anything so new, and the sense of wrong will disappear; and though he may still be angry, the anger will be that of a vexed man, rather than that of a man plundered. The certainty, too, that if the wife leaves him she will take her earnings with her will have its effect, nothing restraining violence like the certainty that it will result in a heavy fine. One contemporary, we observe, believes that the change will diminish the willingness to marry, but there is no proof of that. The woman is not deterred from marrying by fear of losing her wages, nor will the husband be by the idea that at some future time it may not be quite so easy to plunder his wife of silver. At all events, whatever the result, justice will have been done, and women will, for the future, be treated as beings capable of owning property in their own names.

ARCHBISHOP TAIT.

The Spectator says that Dr. Tait will be remembered as the most conspicuous occupant of Augustine's throne since Lilloston:—

The faults of his policy are, first, that it has failed; and next, that it could not do otherwise than fail. That it has failed, there can, we take it, be no doubt. The Church of England is not more, but less, what the Archbishop wishes to see it, than it was on the day he was enthroned. There is more Ritualism than there was then, and the temper of the Ritualist party is far more defiant and far more reckless of consequences. The Public Worship Regulation Act has become a by-word, and the only solid result that can be traced to it is the imprisonment of a clergyman whose only offences are that he cannot satisfy himself about the nature of Lord Penzance's jurisdiction, and that he will not undertake to discontinue a ceremonial which he and his congregation both like. This failure may, no doubt, be merely temporary and accidental, but we think that it can be shown that it was really predestined by circumstances. The policy of making the Church of England what the average, sensible, well-intentioned Englishman would like it to be, is open to two fatal objections. It enlists against itself a very dangerous enemy, and it relies on the support of a very untrustworthy ally. The sort of Church which pleases the ordinary Englishman is a Church in which religious enthusiasm is ignored. But religious enthusiasm is not extinguished by being ignored. It is only stimulated to assert itself more fiercely. The ordinary Englishman disliked Methodism, and in order to please him the Bishops ignored the Methodists. But they were not suppressed because they were ignored; on the contrary, they went out from the Church of England, and so deprived her of what might have been a most valuable instrument for reaching the lower strata of the English people, and so popularising the Established Church. The ordinary Englishman now dislikes Ritualism, and the Archbishop of Canterbury has sought to ignore the Ritualists. But the Ritualists will not be extinguished by being ignored any more than the Methodists were. What they will become in the future, if they are turned out of the Church of England, we shall not attempt to predict; but we are sure that whether they become Roman Catholics or set up a Church of their own their disappearance will not strengthen the Established Church.

THE BISHOP OF COLOMBO AND THE WESLEYAN.

The Daily News writes:—

The Bishop of Colombo, if that be still a legal designation, has been distinguishing himself as a picturesque, if not a polite letter writer. It seems that the teacher of an English school in Colombo, who is presumably himself a member of the Church of England, so far as that body is not geographical, has succumbed to the charms of a lady of the Wesleyan persuasion, and we further gather the awful intelligence that the marriage is about to take place in a Wesleyan chapel. This has "deeply grieved" the discreet and learned person who, by the grace of God and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, presides over the Anglican communion in the island of Ceylon. In an epistle particularly addressed to the too susceptible teacher, Bishop Copleston deplores the want of "loyalty" and "courage," which would have saved him from a "wretched fall." Englishmen are sometimes disposed to think hardly and speak contemptuously of Bishops at home. But we have certainly no episcopal absurdity to set against this performance of a colonial prelate. Some excitement has been caused in Ceylon, where the ecclesiastical grants have been withdrawn, and it was fondly thought the Church had been disestablished by the discovery that a Bishop's letters are still exempt from postage. The precious production from which we have quoted went free because it bore the rather misleading words "On Her Majesty's Service," and the grotesque signature "R. S. Colombo." As the privilege of franking is not enjoyed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, it is odd that it should remain with the Bishop of a semi-established Church in a distant colony. At Oxford Mr. Copleston was reputed to be a scholar and a man of sense, and it is painful to contemplate his "wretched fall."

THE MORAVIAN JUBILEE.

M. de Pressensé, in a letter to the Nonconformist, gives an interesting account of the third jubilee of Moravian Missions at Montmirail, near Neuchâtel, in the Institute founded by Count Zinzendorf:—

The jubilee was kept also at Hernhut, the cradle of the Moravian community, as well as in all their other stations in Germany, England, and Holland. I was present at the celebration at Montmirail, and rejoiced in its manifestation of brotherly love. All the French-speaking Protestant churches were represented, and paid this tribute of sympathy to this noble church, which rekindled in the last century the flame of religious life and of missionary zeal, at a time when barrenness and decline were almost universal in the churches. England herself profited largely by the great movement, initiated by Count Zinzendorf, for there can be no doubt that he had a powerful influence upon Wesley, and thus contributed to one of the mightiest awakenings recorded in the history of the Church. This movement appears specially worthy of admiration, if we remember that it took place in the early part of the eighteenth century, when the sap seemed to have almost ceased to flow in the great tree of the Reformation. In England, just after the victory gained by the Protestants over the retrograde Catholic policy of the Stuarts, the withering wind of deism began to blow. In France the revocation of the Edict of Nantes was bearing bitter fruit. Adherents of the Reformed faith were wandering in desert places, exiled or proscribed, while Catholicism, dishonoured by its victory, provoked a terrible reaction of infidelity, which found its most formidable exponent in the profane irony of Voltaire. In Germany and Holland the doctrines of the Reformation became more and more transformed into arid scholasticism, which made orthodoxy a whitened sepulchre from which the living Christ was fled. The Scribes and Pharisees of the new synagogue had succeeded in glossing over with their formulas the words of eternal life and infinite love. It was then that, gathering around him the relics of the Churches of Bohemia and Moravia, a young nobleman of Northern Germany gave a living exhibition of the truth of Christianity—the truth which loves and worships and saves. It was as though another Moses had struck the rock and there flowed forth into the desert a stream of living water. It was, indeed, the same living spring which was revealed to the woman of Samaria—the fountain which Christ opens in the hearts of all who are truly His. The most striking features of the religious movement among the Moravians was the central place given to Christ in their theology, worship, and religious life. They brought back the Christian soul from the cold and foggy region of subtle metaphysics, to the highest realities, even to Him who said "I am the Truth," and who reveals and restores to us the love of the Father. At the same time, the Moravians gave a powerful impulse to apostolic zeal, and inaugurated the missionary movement, which has, since then, been taken up by all the Churches. It was just because they exalted the everlasting gospel above all human preliminaries that they were the initiators of the Evangelical Alliance. Their aim always was to unite, instead of dividing, the Churches, and they steadily set their faces against the theological controversies then being waged with so much bitterness. Lastly, these Christians, who sought above all things to foster the simplicity of a living faith, did much to aid the revival of Evangelical teaching. Seeing, practically as they did, that Christianity is a fact—a historical reality—the supreme manifestation of the love of God in the person of Jesus Christ, they prepared the minds of men to use the Bible, not as a collection of verbally inspired sybilic oracles, but as the testimony of God, a revelation communicated through human lips, and human lives, which, as we have it in the Bible, is something more than a mere book; it is a divine work wrought by the God-man. It is well known that Schleiermacher belonged to a Moravian family. To this influence he owed all that was true and useful in his theology (mixed as it was with so much that was misleading), all that he has transmitted to his followers, who on many points have corrected their master. To his Moravian education I trace the pre-eminent place which even he assigned to the person of Christ in his system of Christianity.

CONGREGATIONALIST MISSIONS.

The Times, in an article on Mr. Baxter's speech, to which we have referred elsewhere, writes:—

Mr. Baxter congratulated an assemblage of Scotch Independents on Monday upon the progress of religious liberty in the United Kingdom. A remarkable change has passed in this respect over the spirit of Christianity. No courage is now required to profess tolerance towards differing creeds and doctrines. Rather the praise of singularity has to be earned by open adhesion to a rigidity and positiveness of belief which was the common mark formerly of all but a sectarian minority. Everybody has caught the fashion of declaiming against the dogmas of catechisms. Sometimes a suspicion will intrude that all these assertions of philanthropic equality may not be very deeply rooted. Exclusiveness and harshness of judgment, where there is not mere indifference, have often only shifted their quarters. Least of all have dissenters been invariably conspicuous, even in recent times, for charity to brethren who have fallen away, or to the Establishments from which they parted. Yet, on the whole, the present generation of Christians may fairly take to itself the credit which Mr. Baxter at Forfar awarded it, of beginning to manifest the first of the Christian graces by repudiating the "old perverse antipathies." Nonconformists, with all their defects, are entitled to a principal part of the merit of the change, and have gained their full proportion of the improvement in Christian temper. Although not rarely themselves dogmatists, they first set the encouraging example of claiming to decide whether particular doctrines could arrogate the infallibility of articles of faith. They rebelled in the name of freedom of private judgment, and they have since learnt to apply their own principle with a completeness which would have astonished some of their founders. Whatever glory belongs to Dissent in general for the maintenance of a great truth, a large share, Mr. Baxter is undoubtedly correct in assuming, belongs to Congregationalism in particular. Perhaps there are Christian eclectics and latitudinarians who would perfer the even pressure of an Ecumenical Church to the minute unison exacted in return for the privileges of membership in a single chapel. But, as historically a stage in the relaxation of the doctrinal strictness of Establishments, the separatism of the Independents deserves respect and gratitude from Christians who could never accept their rule. It was among the earliest protests on behalf of the right and duty of individual Christians to sift the essential from the conventional, and to choose their own place in the Christian society.

Congregationalism has apparently deviated more or less in these islands from the absolute liberty its various sections originally asserted. It has its declaration of faith, order, and discipline, as the Church of England has its Thirty-nine Articles. It has its Union, which deliberates in periodical conferences, as Presbyterianism holds its Assemblies. A sense of the need of regularity and co-operation has gradually cemented the several chapels into a confederation scarcely less solid and compact than other ecclesiastical fraternities founded on a common basis of discipline. For some purposes, however, its primitive basis gives it an advantage still in action which other churches do not enjoy. Much of Mr. Baxter's discourse of Monday was concerned with one of those points in which Congregationalism has won signal successes. Different opinions may be held on the actual amount of the advances made by Christian missions. No Christian feels any doubt of the civilising influence of his religion, or of the obligation to impart its benefits to savages and heathens. Nowhere and through no agency have missionaries gained all the victories their enthusiasm anticipated. There are degrees, however, in failure, and the London Missionary Society will be conceded even by its rivals not to have failed most. As Mr. Baxter explained at Forfar, the Independents have acquired a commanding position in the conduct of the London Missionary Society. For the good the society has done the Independents ought to be assigned the honour. Evidently a denomination in which every congregation is considered a distinct church has peculiar facilities for distant missionary work. The theory in England becomes positive practice abroad. Congregationalism is like a plant endowed with the faculty of developing a root wherever a cutting touches the earth. An Independent minister plants his congregation, large or small, and it becomes forthwith a self governing state. From the fellow-feeling of his brethren in Great Britain, the representative of the London Society, whether his home be in Samoa or at Benares, draws supplies and friendly solicitude. In his ministrations he is free to regard simply the circumstances of himself and his followers. Within wide limits he may narrow or expand his teaching in accordance with the spiritual exigencies of his native flock. Equally unauthorised and uncompelled to adapt his system to a foreign model, he can naturalise Christianity among Hindoos or among South Sea Islanders with a freshness and vigour hardly permissible to rival denominationalists. Independents themselves at the head of missions lament, as Mr. Baxter admits, the inadequacy of the results. That may partly be because they with all their devotion are unable to forget their base of operations in English and Scotch chapels. If Congregationalism were altogether true to the liberty it claims, it might show greater trophies than its amiable colonies in the Pacific and its handfuls of catechumens among the millions of Hindostan. So long, however, as its conversions are real, and its converts testify to the purity of their faith by better and nobler lives, it would be ungrateful to apportion praise by reference to quantity. The excellence of the quality Congregationalism has ground for attributing in some measure to the power its delegates derive from its constitution of treating each his own Church as a mother church, bound by its own laws, and owing allegiance only to itself.

REVERENCE FOR THE PRESENT.

The Christian World has the following important article on a reactionary preacher, who proclaims to a metropolitan congregation that "the times are out of joint," and that we are removing all the ancient landmarks:—

For the last two Sundays the Rev. Arthur Mursell has rendered service as one of the preachers at the City Temple, in the absence of the Rev. Dr. Parker. The immense congregation which has assembled on each occasion testifies to the power which Mr. Mursell possesses to charm the popular ear. On Sunday evening, although the metropolitan holiday time is not yet over, and congregations generally muster in scantier numbers than usual, the City Temple was densely crowded, the aisles and other available spaces, as well as the pews, being closely packed with people. Mr. Mursell preached with all his customary glow of feeling, play of fancy, and sparkling felicity of phrase, and was listened to with rapt attention from first to last. Candour, however, compels us to add the expression of our regret at the lack of discrimination and at the halting logic which marked the discourse. The subject chosen was the warning, "Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set." After an interesting introduction, setting forth some of the moral bearings of the precept referred to, Mr. Mursell took occasion to make a fierce onslaught upon "modern thought," the "progress of the age," and "Biblical criticism." He complained that these had removed many ancient landmarks of doctrine and of faith, and noticed particularly the landmarks of prayer, of the Divine authority of the Bible, and of the substitutionary character of the death of Christ, and he passionately appealed to his hearers to recall the experiences of their pious parents and to stand by the doctrines upon which they rested their faith. It is true that Mr. Mursell put in a saving clause or two, from which it appeared that he would allow Biblical criticism so far as to accept the Revised Version, and that he was mainly anxious to utter a warning against "coquetry with doubt," the merely flippant and supercilious scepticism which has no connection with sound knowledge and serious inquiry. The general strain of his remarks, however, was very much more sweeping than this limitation, if it had been observed, would have allowed, and was calculated to convey the impression that Biblical criticism, scientific investigation, and modern thought were the inveterate and sacrilegious foes of Christianity, deserving only to be regarded with dread or scorn. We do not hesitate to say that such an impression appears to us to be the very reverse of the truth, and that it is much to be regretted that preachers should ever adopt a tone which directly or indirectly tends to produce it. Mr. Mursell ridiculed the idea that the world was governed by fixed natural laws, and laughed at the suggestion that it was as unreasonable to pray for fine weather for the harvest as it would be to pray for the obliteration of a comet or for the creation of an additional star. But he halted without coming to a statement of the limits which reverence and intelligence alike suggest should be observed in offering prayers for material benefits, or gifts through natural agencies, and he urged his hearers, somewhat inconsequently, as we thought, to persevere in prayer for spiritual gifts and consolations. He made merry over the criticism which has abolished the Pentateuch, has treated the Garden of Eden as a myth, and has raised questions as to the authorship and authority of certain portions of the Scriptures; and he was very severe upon scientists who declined to accept the stories of the miraculous which the Bible contains. We can scarcely suppose that Mr. Mursell would contend in cool blood for the literal interpretation and verbal inspiration of everything contained between the first chapter of Genesis and the last chapter of Revelation, and yet it is difficult to reconcile the strain of his invective against Biblical criticism with any other theory. We cannot but ask, however, do we not owe more, in our true understanding and estimate of the Bible, to the criticism which has dared to examine it as "a common book," than to the credulity and superstition which would regard it as a fetish and insist upon a slavish appeal to the letter? Mr. Mursell denounces the "neology" which treats the doctrine of the sacrificial character of the death of Christ as "an immortal doctrine," inconsistent with true ideas of the justice and mercy of God; but has not even "neology" taught us that there is a moral aspect of the death of Christ which demands much fuller recognition than was usually given by those who in former days stood by the Calvinistic theology? We have no sympathy with the mere spirit of iconoclasm, of supercilious contempt for the past, or with the mere cant and jargon of a superficial infidelity; but we hold that it is a grave error to disparage, under the idea of rendering Christianity service, the characteristic intellectual movements of the age in which we live. These, we believe, are not against the truth, but for the truth. There is a divine spirit working and moving now as there was in the days of our fathers; and preachers seem sometimes to need reminding that there is a reverence due to the present, which they decry with so much bitter zest, as well as to the past, which they laud so highly.

The first draft of the programme for the Decennial Missionary Conference in India has been completed. General Sir Henry Ramsay has consented to act as chairman of the forthcoming Conference.

THE EGYPTIAN QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Allow me to express a hope that few of your readers will endorse, or abstain from strongly condemning, the tone of the article last week on "Mr. Blunt and the Egyptian Question." To accuse Mr. Gladstone and his fellow Ministers of going to war for the sake of the bondholders, and to crush the national aspirations of the Egyptian people, is to propagate a slander from which the great Liberal, and eminently conscientious, Minister ought to be secure in a newspaper professing enlightened opinions. That the class it is most important to protect in Egypt, the Fellaheen, numbering about five millions, should have a "national aspiration" for the overthrow of the Khedive's just and honest Government by a military conspiracy is most improbable, though no doubt their religious feelings have been worked upon to wish for the defeat of the "infidel," and they are too ignorant to be on their guard against misrepresentations of our intentions towards them. The real nature of Arabi's conspiracy is pretty clearly shown in the Parliamentary papers, and it is remarkable that Mr. Felkin, writing before its explosion, said, "The size of the army is unnecessary for legitimate purposes, and a reduction of its numbers would be beneficial to the country. Instead of being an addition to the power of the Khedive, the army is in fact a source of weakness, threatening his supremacy and making the existence of a settled Government precarious, and apparently dependent upon the goodwill of irresponsible and unscrupulous men." The successive stages in Arabi's conduct, as shown in the published despatches, exactly correspond to this prophetic utterance. Such acts as forcing the Khedive to consent to the promotion of a batch of his fellow conspirators, contrary to Egyptian law; the secret trial and condemnation of the officers opposed to his schemes; the threats of death—as stated by them—made to the heads of religion to compel their support; and similar threats to the notables, on account of which their president endorsed their going home to be out of his power—these, and a host of other facts to be culled from the correspondence, show the character of the movement. Mr. Baxter's recent speech deals fairly with the real grievance of the upper classes, arising from the employment of a monstrous number of Europeans at high salaries; and at the same time he exposes the blunders of supposing a military conspiracy and despotism good for the peasantry, whose children it drags into the army, and whose earnings it renders insecure.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Mr. Preston has properly called attention to the course pursued by his minister, Mr. Freckleton, in regard to the fund being raised in this case. Mr. Preston is quite right in his suggestion, that in all congregations "there are persons of limited means who are too modest to send small contributions direct to the treasurer," but who would in another way willingly help to the extent of their means. Let me mention that our secretary made it his business to bring the matter directly before our congregation; and although we are but a small body, the result was most satisfactory.

Few events have more shocked our little household of faith than the distressing death of Mr. Pope, and I am sure it is the wish of all of us that the noble efforts being made on behalf of his family may be crowned with success.

THE GOSPEL TEMPERANCE MISSION which for ten days has been carried on at the Metropolitan Tabernacle was closed on Tuesday night with a farewell meeting to Mr. R. T. Booth, one of the leaders of the Blue Ribbon Army, who had been labouring in the mission. About 6,000 people were present, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon presiding. An address and various gifts were presented to Mr. Booth and his wife, and speeches were made by the former, by Mr. Spurgeon, and other gentlemen.

RUGBY SETTLEMENT, TENNESSEE.

The Rev. Dr. Wilson, head master of Clifton College, in a letter to the Daily News, describes a visit he has lately paid to Mr. Hughes's settlement at Rugby, Tennessee. We subjoin the principal portions of the letter:—

"On the new railway from Cincinnati to the South, one of the most important of the new lines in the States, there is a small station, Sedgemoor, at an altitude of about 1,350 feet above the sea. We stopped there on the morning of Saturday, August 19, and took places in the mail waggon or 'hack' for Rugby, distance seven miles. The drive was entirely through woodland, of which very few acres are cleared. The trees are of moderate size; several kinds of oak, chestnut, pine, hickory, &c., forming the mass of it, and the brush is very low. The natives, or whites, who have migrated thither chiefly from Virginia, and have squatted in these woods, burn the brush every two or three years, so as to clear the ground for pasturage for cows. Hence it is possible to walk, ride, and even drive almost everywhere through the wood. The road is well graded and well kept, better than any I have fallen in with in passing through Virginia and North Carolina. After an hour's drive Rugby is reached. It reminded me more of Bournemouth than of any other place: a sandy, wide road, trees standing promiscuously about, and frame houses, with neat gardens enclosed with palisades, dotted here and there among the trees. We pass the Hughes Public Library, a building erected by well-wishers to Mr. Hughes in Boston, Cincinnati, New York, and elsewhere, and to which American publishers have sent about 5,000 volumes, and which Chicago offers to make 'symmetrical' by supplying some thousands more. Rugby is fortunate in having the services of an excellent librarian, Dr. Bertz, of Tübingen. The next building that catches the eye is the church. It is a two-storied building; the lower story is a school, of course free, now inspected and partly supported by the State, under the charge of Miss Brown, a highly-accomplished New England teacher, whose father is one of the early settlers. The upper story is used for religious services—in the morning for the Anglo-American Episcopalian Church, in the evening for a Congregational service. Both services are usually conducted by Mr. Blacklock, a layman, formerly an English schoolmaster, who has established himself at Rugby with his seven sons in a large and successful farm, and undertakes this Church work as a labour of love with characteristic energy. When I mention that in the school the average attendance is fifty, and that the attendance at church on Sunday morning was between fifty and sixty, and that about twenty or twenty-five remained to the Holy Communion, it will be evident enough that the settlement is not non-existent.

"The next public buildings are the office of the Rugbeian, a well-conducted small weekly paper; the stores, locally known as 'the Commissary'; and the hotels. One of them, 'the Tabard,' is an hotel of some size and pretensions, but we preferred the smaller house, known as 'the Brown House,' where we were well entertained and lodged by Mr. Milrow for 5½ dollars a week. About 2,000 acres have been sold as farm land to various colonists, chiefly from England and the Northern States, and a considerable number of town lots. On some of the town lots are exquisite little cottages. One belonging to Mrs. Hughes, Mr. Hughes's mother, a vigorous lady of eighty-six, is a perfect gem, though I think others quite equal it. Flowers and vegetables and fruit trees grow here excellently, and I shall never forget the evenings spent under her hospitable verandah, watching the humming-birds flit among the flowers, till the sun set, and the katy-dids began their chorus, and the fire-flies began to dart about, and the stars shone out with a brilliancy that I have never seen equalled in England. The farms here are clearings from the primæval forest. Here are growing corn, millet, potatoes, tomatoes, cabbages, onions, tobacco, apples, peaches, and all sorts of melons. For all these, except the first, the soil is very well suited. It will never compete with rich low lands in corn. The farm houses are log houses, built of course by the settlers themselves, and are not bad quarters.

The creeks or rivers run in narrow valleys, almost of the nature of canons, about 300 feet below the plateau. These are extraordinarily picturesque. About a mile from the town is the junction of 'White Oak' and 'Clear Fork,' and no river scenery that I know surpasses it. Strata richer than the top sandstones crop out on the slopes of these canons, and then, when no fires have spread downwards to damage the trees, and with richer soil, other species of trees mix with those of the plateau and attain extraordinary size and beauty. The hemlock, spruce, white pine, yellow pine, and Spanish chestnut are magnificent, and among their stems are magnolias, kalmias, dogwood, sassafras, and rhododendrons of great size.

"Such is the first impression of the place. A charming and invigorating climate, not too hot even in mid-August (for from eleven to twelve and from two to four on one of the hottest of the days I fell in with the fashions of the place, and cut down trees and grubbed roots, under orders from Mr. Hughes, with conspicuous want of skill), great natural beauty; a place cheerful and well-cared for, and a society which happily combines refinement with simplicity.

"But this is couleur-de-rose. Now for the other side. There is no doubt that the settlement has been passing through a crisis, and is not yet financially secure. At first many of the settlers were young Englishmen, totally unfit for the work they had to do. They were not even 'Will Wimbles,' dexterous of hand and helpful, but were lazy and inefficient. This is the plain truth. These have now nearly all left, and carried their inefficiency and their grumbling elsewhere. There are still two or three loafers, 'music-hall gents,' on a sufficient allowance to live without working, and doing nothing, or worse. All the rest mean business. Some of the original settlers are doing fairly well there, others have moved off chiefly westward. The fever did carry off some seven or eight young Englishmen. It was no doubt partly caused by carelessness at the hotel, partly by their own indiscretion, but was in no way due to the situation. There has been no return of fever, and the health of the place is perfect.

"But is the colony answering? Whether it is answering to the shareholders is no business of mine. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the settlement, and therefore do not know; but it seems to me unlikely that at present they can be recouped for their outlay on roads, public buildings, and the necessary legal expenses. Whether it is answering to the settlers was the question which interested me more, because so many of our young English public school-boys want to emigrate and farm, and this settlement appeared to offer some special advantages. I fear that to the present settlers it is not as yet answering. The prices asked by the Board—at any rate for town lots, and given by the men at first—were too high. For future purchasers the prices will be reduced, but the original purchasers have sunk capital which they will scarcely see again. Further, the soil is not specially rich, and the toil of clearing it and farming it is heavy, and labour is very expensive, so that there is considerable outlay before the farm can begin to be remunerative. There is at present no staple product the sale of which produces money enough to pay for groceries and clothes. A farmer there can produce enough corn and vegetables and meat to live on, but not as yet enough to send to the great towns in sufficient quantities to pay for the commodities that he has to buy from the towns.

"Should young men emigrate, then? They must judge for themselves as to buying land. But I should doubt whether a young fellow of sixteen or eighteen who means to emigrate could do better than leave his capital at home locked up for two or three years, and go there to learn farming. He would see much more variety of farming there than elsewhere. He would have to pay a premium for his first year of perhaps £50, and if he is of the right sort his labour would at the end of that period do more than keep him. He could support himself anywhere in the States, and could go round and see where to settle. But it is not the slightest use to send out there a 'ne'er-do-weel.' He must be ready to work at whatever turns up; and the best farmers, such as Mr. Blacklock, will not now take anyone unless guaranteed to be of the right sort. If I was sending anyone out I should put him for one or two months at home in a carpenter's shop, and for the same time with a blacksmith, where he could learn to shoe a horse, and see something of the work of waggon mending; and then he would always be worth his keep; and to set him to this work would find out in the only possible way whether the youngster is likely to get on in this sort of life. I should then ship him off, and not allow him a dollar till he was twenty-one and knew how to lay out his money to the best advantage. I am sure that there are scores and hundreds of young fellows for whom there is a far more promising entry into life, far more healthier and wholesomer for body and mind, than clerkships at home, or hopeless cramming for army examinations. But a man must make up his mind for hard work, and not sit down and cry when told to grub up stumps, as one of the early settlers did, and say that it hurt his hands."

THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

BY R. BENJAMIN ANDREWS.

On Thursday, August 3, this distinguished institution celebrated the seventy-second anniversary of its birth. The chief event of the day was the oration, which the retiring rector, Professor Ernst Curtius, delivered in the "Aula," crowded to its fullest capacity with interested listeners. A main aim of the address was to awaken thankful memories of King Frederick William III, on whose gifts and authority the University rose. It was hoped that the great benefactor's more eminent son, Emperor William, might be present; but the old gentleman, eighty-six the 22nd of next March, would not venture, on account of the heat, to return to Berlin so early. Some (I know not what) engagement kept also the Crown Prince away; but both were represented by the Under Secretary of State, Lucanus, Lieut.-Gen. Von Berken, and several other high officials. The faculty of the University were, of course, present en masse, appearing in full academical costume. Professor Curtius has won his fame as a master in Grecian history, archaeology, and art; but he is no stranger in modern history, just as his renowned colleague, Droysen, while chiefly learned in modern, is a critic and a high authority in Grecian history also. That Curtius is well enough acquainted with modern times his address fully evinced by its lucid presentation of the origin and fortunes of Prussian educational institutions. "In Prussia," he said, "princes have been among the foremost helpers of culture. When, toward the end of the Middle Age, the University, to which, previously, a more or less cosmopolitan character had attached, came to represent each some particular locality, there fell to individual rulers the opportunity to render to education the most signal service. Of all the European potentates, those of the Hohenzollern House have been the truest to this trust. No others have equalled them in eager effort to combine intellectual culture with energy and efficiency in affairs. They have known how to impart an heroic character even to the works of peace. Not only have they, after each bloody victory, made it their first care to bind the conquered land to Prussia with strong intellectual and moral ties; twice through such acts they have wrought the very regeneration of their own land. Margrave Albert did that when he founded the Albertina—i. e., the University of Königsberg—in 1544. Frederick II. did the same, making up, by enlarging the intellectual life of his people, for the temporary limitation of his military power. In like manner the founding of our own university followed close upon the awful year of Jena (1806), when Prussia's fortunes were in the dust."

The speaker went on to canvass at length the difficulties which higher education has had to encounter in the Prussian kingdom, worse, he believed, than in almost any other country. Of these vicissitudes, he added, the Berlin University itself has had her full share. Among them the speaker mentioned this: that, occupying the heart of a great city, the din of traffic and the shouts of political parties heard on every hand, she has often found it hard to replenish her teaching force with the ablest men. The chief lights of science keep themselves aglow more easily and pleasantly in relatively retired localities. Professor Curtius was of opinion that the University could never have mounted to its present position except by incessant royal aid, however he deplored too great dependence upon such subsidy. Rulers have their responsibilities in so vital a matter, he said, and should discharge them; but they can nowise do everything. It rests, after all, mainly with the instructors, the students, the alumni to make the University great.

One of the University's infelicities referred to by Professor Curtius is illustrated by the present interregnum in philosophical instruction. Professor Harnes has been dead now several years. In the summer of 1880 Lotze, yielding to a repeated call, reluctantly consented to remove hither from Göttingen; but almost before beginning labour in the new sphere he followed Harnes to the grave. Nearly two years more had elapsed, during which calls to Von Goltz, Sigwart and (I believe) Kuno Fischer having been extended in vain, philosophy proper has scarcely been handled in the University. Psychology and the history of philosophy are in strong hands. Zeller is here and a little army of others in each of these departments. Young "Docent" Ebbinghaus, with his lectures upon psychology and psychophysik already has an enviable fame. Eminent authorities compare him favourably in this last-named field with Wundt, of Leipzig. Still a course of philosophical lectures like Lotze's, like Uricio's, or even like Wundt's one seeks here now in vain. Professor Zeller tells me that the lack is to be supplied, so far as a single man can effect this at the opening of next Semester, by Professor Dilthey, of Breslau, who has been offered, and has accepted, the position left vacant, by Lotze's death. Dilthey is forty-eight years of age, and said to be a scholar and thinker of first-rate ability. Thus far he has published nothing of consequence, except his "Life of Schleiermacher"; but he has nearly ready a work on some phase of ethical philosophy which Zeller has read and regards very able.

This leads me to remark that Germany is just now experiencing a revival of interest, if not in ethical conduct, at least in ethical study. Professor Gass's "History of Christian Ethics" hails from last year; but already since 1882 began have appeared, besides a host of review articles, Schuppe's "Outlines of Ethics and of the Philosophy of Right," Beck's "Lectures on Christian Ethics," Jodl's "History of Ethics in Modern Philosophy" (Vol. I.), Schmidt's "Ethics of the Greeks" (Vol. II.), Bestmann's "History of Christian Morality," Ziegler's "History of Ethics" (I. Division), Lotze's "Practical Philosophy," Winter's "Studies toward a History of Christian Ethics" (Vol. I.) (on Clement of Alexandria), Kirchner's "Ethics," Heymann's two articles on "The Method of Ethics," Rolph's "Attempt at a Rational System of Ethics," and Susemihl's treatise on Aristotle's Ethics, not to mention any of a dozen other works on teleology, optimism, the will, &c., all more or less closely touching the ethical domain. Leslie Stephen's "Principles of Ethics" and Carran's "La Morale Utilitaire" have also been subjected in Germany to extended criticisms.

Were my letter not already long I should say a word about Carl Weissäcker's revised German translation of the New Testament and Weiss's "Life of Christ"; but I must close.

CROYDON.—We record with pleasure that Mr. Henry Tate, of Streatham, who is giving to the friends at Peckham an organ for their new chapel, has promised to do the same for the Croydon friends. This latter organ is to cost £500.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, [September 10, the Rev. A. B. Camm delivered a discourse at St. Vincent-street Chapel, previous to leaving the country to take charge of the church at Sydney. The discourse was an admirable and very able exposition of the doctrine of Evolution in relation to the past and future of humanity.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—For the cure of debility, bile, liver, and stomach complaints this inappreciable medicine is so well known in every part of the world, and the cures performed by its use are so wonderful, that it now stands pre-eminent above all other remedies, more particularly for the cure of bilious and liver complaints, disorders of the stomach, dropsy, and debilitated constitutions. A course of these digestive Pills painlessly but surely regulates the organs of digestion and acts most beneficially on the secretory and excretory organs generally. They expel from the secretory organs and the circulation those effete and morbid matters which produce inflammation, pain, fever, debility, and physical decay—thus annihilating, by their purifying properties, the virulence of the most sinful and devastating diseases.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE CHURCH IN MODERN SOCIETY.

BY F. H. HEDGE, D.D.

The question is a very practical one: Has the Church a legitimate place and function in modern society? Is it wanted, or is it not, in the social economy of to-day? I believe that it is wanted, that it constitutes an indispensable element of civilisation, much so now as when the first altar was reared in the infancy of nations; as much so as when the earliest founders of States called in the aid of religion to compact and concentrate social life, to give it the cohesion and community of interest which distinguishes States from savage tribes.

Religion is the oldest, widest, closest bond which beyond the domestic hearth binds man to man. And you cannot to-day strike out the sanctuary and its stated worship from the institutions of society without weakening the bonds and endangering the stability of social life.

On the other hand, the action of society is needed, the Church is needed, not only to feed and maintain the religious sentiment, but to call it into being. Whatever we know of God and sacred things, whatever of religious faith and feeling has inspired our purposes, actuated our conduct, and helped to keep us in the way we should go, we owe directly or indirectly to the Church. Whether it has come to us individually, through tradition, through oral instruction at home or at school, through printed books and the action of our own minds fructified thereby, it has come to us through the Church. The Church, as the organised spirit of God, has been the providential educator, which, acting through these instrumentalities, has kept and yet keeps religion alive, and makes it a power for good in human life. For whatever reason religion is needful and profitable for man, for the same reason the Church is needful and profitable also. That the spirit of God may and does sometimes act directly on the soul, without intervention of Church or any secondary agent, is a fundamental principle of Christian doctrine, never to be surrendered. Every fresh dispensation of religion has originated in that way. But practically, for the mass of mankind, the Spirit acts through the Church; and every sect that has grounded itself on the principle of private inspiration, from Montanism to Quakerism, has perished utterly, or drags a decadent, dying life. Protestantism did not at the start assume that ground. It was not a protest against the Church as such, but only against certain abuses and corruptions. And Protestantism itself, unless it can recall its separations and atone its schisms, and renouncing dogmatic wilfulness, round itself into one, is doomed to pass away, and be reabsorbed in the larger fold of an ecumenical Church.

It is often pleaded in excuse of their neglect, by those who absent themselves from the public services of religion, that they are not benefited thereby, that the Church gives them nothing which they need or cannot get elsewhere. O blindness of ingratitude! The Church has given you pretty much all that makes life worth living, all that is comprised in the term civilisation. And the Church is still the main guarantee of that civilisation. For proof of this position I refer you to history, I refer you to the quick, instinctive eagerness with which Christian immigrants into new and barbarous countries hasten to establish a Church, however they may have neglected it at home. Abolish the Church to-day, and to-morrow barbarism will have taken its place.

That you are not profited by these Sunday exercises in the way of devout feeling I can easily understand. I suppose that very few are. There is very little to inspire devout feeling in our churches, and I fully sympathise with those who profess that they are more profited in that kind by the contemplation of nature than by anything they see or hear in the "meeting house." What more provocative of devout feeling than the starry coverlet which night hangs over the hushed earth and the throbbing deep? What more suggestive of religious thought than the vision of sunrise, the daily blossom of creation? What a call to worship the solemn "All hail!" of the kingly orb, as he enters his pavilion, silent and serene, the material god of ancient faith! These, and untrodden mountain-peaks with their virgin snows, and ocean solitudes stretching from horizon to horizon, bring Deity nearer than cushioned pews and stuccoed walls.

And the murmur of pines, and the rhythmic beat of the surf as it breaks on the shore, are more resonant of Spirit than the most select of quartet choirs.

But all this is nothing to the purpose. It is not a question of devout excitation that we are considering, but of formal recognition. You get nothing, you say, from the Sunday service. The question is not what you may get, but what you should bring. The altar was before the temple. In the infancy of religion, men came to it, not to receive, but to offer. They brought their gifts, the fruits of the earth or bleeding victims. These are of the past, but to offer is still in order. Your personal presence is an offering. You may not be able to compel your thoughts into gracious meditation, your heart may not but your voluntary presence, prompted by a sense of duty, is no vain oblation; it is a silent confession of respect for holy uses, to offer which is a contribution to social well-being, to withhold which involves a loss to society.

"In tune be found,
Like David's harp of solemn sound;"

I can imagine a state when the formal service of religion shall be no longer needed, nor any separation of sacred seasons and things, nor any sanctuary, because society shall be so penetrated and possessed by a divine spirit that all its institutions shall be religious, all its business sacred, all its action a worship of the highest, a true theocracy, the Word made flesh in human life. But such a state is still distant, beyond the vision of to-day and beyond the calculation of to-morrow. The sanctuary is still a necessity, an indispensable agent in the life of society.

I note some of the uses which make it so.

1. The Church is society's confession of God, a witness of the divine Presence in our midst. We place the consecrated building in the streets of our cities, in the midst of our business and our homes, thereby acknowledging that God is here, not distant, unheeding, unpartaking, incommunicable, but here among us, perceiving, producing, giving, taking, judging, blessing, co-present to all our endeavour and all our ways; God in nature, God in man, in the blooming landscape and the all-covering sky, in the genial sunbeam and the winter storm; God in public and in private, in the secrecy of the heart and the course of events; the God of the rich and the poor, the happy and the wretched, the good and the bad. A witness is the Church that behind this visible and changeable, behind these appearances which come and vanish like the shadow of a cloud, there abides the invisible Reality; that we, whose daily life and conversation are in the visible, have our root in the invisible, and our destiny there and thence; that, amid the pressure of affairs, the demands of duty, the agitations of care, the solicitations of desire and the search of good, the drift of years and the clamour of this loud world, there lives and reigns, inscrutable and calm, the constant Soul around which these revolve, the impartial Love which dispenses to all their portion of good, the immutable law which awards to each the fruit of his works.

2. The Church is a social bond. More closely than the State, it binds man to man. In the State, we associate on the ground of our temporal interests. The Church connects us by the more interior and enduring bond of our spiritual wants and destination. We meet here on the high plane of a common humanity, where the petty distinctions which separate elsewhere are done away. We meet as simply men and women, in the unity of the Spirit and the primal equality of children of God. In the light of that idea, the individuality which shows so glaring, and plays so dominant a part in the human life, is seen to be an illusion, a necessary one, but still an illusion, a trick of the carnal understanding. It belongs to the phenomenal, not to the real. In appearance, we are many; in our root, we are one. That unity, rightly divined, annuls the accidents of birth, outreaches the bounded relations of home and country, ignores the low necessities of earth and the transient cares of mortality. It constitutes a bond which transcends conventional ties, and will hold when these are riven; an eternal union of man with man through the solidarity of a common nature. All this is expressed, whether consciously or not, in our coming together as fellow-worshippers in consecrated places. We come hither from our several homes, because no earthly home, however abounding in temporal comforts, however blest in its affections, suffices for the soul; because it is dimly felt that there is a higher home common to all, without distinction of rank or place, the home of the spirit. We come as dwellers in or as seekers of that eternal home. These courts, more ample than our private dwellings, this assembly, more numerous than the earthly household, represent that still more spacious dwelling and temple whose fold no roof can cover and no walls define, the many-mansioned house of the Father, the unvalled city of God.

8. The Church is an educator. I will not descant in this connection, for time will not permit, on the function of the Sunday-school, the stated appendage of the Church; its wide capabilities, if rightly ordered, faithfully administered, and invested with the needful authority; its power by indoctrinating and confirming the young in morals and religion, to influence the future of society. I confine myself to the pulpit, the official expounder of the wisdom of life. At its prompting and with its aid, we bring our daily life into judgment, we ponder our duties, consider our ways, reconsider our errors, attack our sins, take counsel of our better selves, and aspire to better things. With the aid of the pulpit, we reflect in our meditations the course of events, the character of the times, and learn our obligations in things pertaining to the common weal and the safety of the State. In this function the pulpit will sometimes come into collision with the prejudices and passions of men, when especially it touches matters in which political as well as moral issues are involved. There are some who would interdict the discussion by the pulpit of themes like these, who formally demand its abstention from all topics which have a political bearing. As if moral principles were not applicable to civil relations, as if here were an outlying territory beyond the scope of the moral law! No preacher who respects himself will accept this limitation of his function, knowing that he is not the minister only of a given congregation, but minister of the moral law in all its applications, minister of the kingdom of God and his righteousness, which he is to endeavour, so far as in him lies, to establish in the world. In the liberty of the pulpit as of the press, all our liberties are bound up. Strike at that, and you aim a blow at Freedom itself. The pulpit is the conscience of society. Let no one attempt by fear or favour to lay a snare in the way of the preacher which shall tempt him—already tempted, it may be, by his own softness—to prophesy smooth things when rough prophecies are needed, to accommodate the law to the fact, to trim the gospel to the time.

I am far from implying that the preacher's normal attitude is, or should be, one of antagonism, and all his preaching censure or complaint. The field is wide, and many and various are the lessons which come within its scope. Special occasions will elicit special lessons, timely words of condemnation, of consolation, or congratulation. But the stated topics proper to the pulpit may all be comprised under the two heads of enlightenment and moral incentive. To plant in the mind a fresh idea, a far-reaching, life-giving idea, to stimulate the will to self-renewal and a better life,—what higher service can one render to his fellow-men? And this service it is in the power of the preacher, if intellectually and morally qualified, to render. Let it not be said that the preacher's influence has declined with the loss of that traditional halo with which a factitious reverence once invested his office,—that, since his position has dropped to the ordinary level of civil life, he ceases to speak with authority. The authority of office is gone. A happy riddance! The authority of wisdom and character, seconded by opportunity, remains. The real influence of the pulpit as a public educator is as great as ever. To preserve it the pulpit must respect itself, maintain its own dignity, and never for the sake of momentary startling effects descend to the trivialities, the vulgarisms, the smartnesses, of what is called sensational preaching,—the rhetoric of the stump. Better a dull preacher than a buffoon. Better a church half-filled with reverent listeners seeking instruction and edification than a purrulent multitude intent on displays of histrionic art. The audience may be large, but the gain is small. Not by such help nor that sort of defenders is the Church to be maintained. The Church's worst enemies are not the atheist and the agnostic, but preachers who enact the zany, whose utmost ambition is to raise a laugh.

In virtue, then, and by right of the functions I have named, as a standing witness and confession of faith in the Highest, as a social bond, as a public educator, the Church has still a reason for being, and holds a legitimate place in the life of our time. However individuals by taste or religious indifference may be alienated from it, it is still for society at large a needed institution.

And the need of the many claims the co-operation of the few who fancy that they need no church for themselves. In orthodox communions, where certain beliefs are deemed essential to salvation, the supposed necessity of guarding those beliefs against the inroads of heresy supplies a motive for such co-operation which is wanting in churches of the liberal faith. Some who nominally belong to these our churches appear to care little whether church and public worship shall continue to be maintained. But, let them consider that the alternative here is not, this church or none, but, this or another of a less desirable type. They would not, I think, be content to see the Church of Rome establish itself on the ruins of our Congregational inheritance, or Calvinistic theories of life and destiny supplant a more rational and hopeful theology in the community in which they live. The light and freedom themselves enjoy they would wish to see perpetuated. But the surest way to perpetuate these is to countenance with their presence and aid the Church of which light and freedom are the fruit. It is in vain to talk of the general enlightenment and intellectual growth of the age, which are fondly supposed to preclude the possibility of any relapse into spiritual bondage. I do not see that people are not quite as apt to be deluded, as likely to become the victims of superstition now as ever. Mormonism and Spiritism are as much the special products of this age as scientific criticism and free religion. It was not in the ninth century, but the nineteenth, that the Bishop of Rome was declared an exceptional being, beyond the reach of error, the special confidant of God. The alternative, I repeat, is not, the liberal Church or none, but, the liberal Church or some exclusive, mind-beclouding, soul-enslaving form of faith. The religious sentiment in man is immortal: a Church it will have. A live and sympathizing Church the religiously disposed will have. If the native communion does not afford it, conversion to some other communion must. The Church of Rome is recruited from the ranks of Protestant indifferentists. If you wish, so far as in you lies, to secure the community to which you are attached from the inroads of an alien faith, then stand by the Church of your inheritance, cherish it, minister to it, not with pecuniary aid alone, but with manifest, personal interest, with every succour that can make it flourish and keep it strong, and hand it down a goodly heritage to the generations following.

GLOUCESTER.—The congregation worshipping in the historically interesting Unitarian Free Church in this city—so intimately connected with the origin and rise of Dissent in Gloucester—have recently carried out a needed work of renovation and repair to the interior of the building. The restoration has been well done, and the edifice now presents a pleasing and cheerful appearance. The cost of the work amounted to about £200, of which all but about £50 was collected or promised some time ago. To clear off the remaining £50 a sale of work was arranged, and was held last week in Mr. W. C. Evans's saleroom. The room was lined all round with stalls, which displayed a profusion of the usual kind of articles sold at bazaars. Some of the articles were of special merit, among them being a handsome banner screen with figures worked on it, sent by Mrs. Laycock, of Sheffield, some water-colour drawings, paintings on terra cotta, and other articles sent by Mrs. W. E. Price, and a handsome card table given by Mrs. Ashbee. One of the stalls, called the Sunday Scholars' Stall, contained articles contributed by young children only. Mr. W. C. Evans lent a number of water-colour paintings, pier glasses, &c., for the decoration of the room, and sold others on commission for the benefit of the bazaar. Mr. Evans also established a "commission stall," on which were displayed some handsome articles—bronze statuettes, clocks, &c.—for sale. The principal feature of this stall was a valuable musical box with gongs, which played a variety of tunes. This was sold for between £7 and £8. A number of plants and cut flowers were presented by Mrs. W. E. Price, Mrs. T. Robinson, Mr. Joyner, and other friends, and added much to the attractive appearance of the room. The Rev. G. Knight, pastor of the church, exerted himself in every way to promote the success of the undertaking, and one pleasing feature of the bazaar was a present of about £40 worth of articles sent from Mr. Knight's former congregation at Sheffield. Mrs. Brooke Hunt and

Major and Mrs. W. E. Price assisted the bazaar both by their presence and contributions. The following ladies presided at the stalls:—No. 1: Miss Millard, Mrs. Bond, and Mrs. C. W. Washbourn; No. 2: Mrs. Evans, Mrs. Gosden, and Miss Ashbee; No. 3: Mrs. Ashbee and Mrs. Knight; No. 4: Mrs. Oskey and Miss Moreton; refreshment stall: Mrs. W. H. Knight, Mrs. Burge, and Miss Isabel Ashbee; Scholars' stall: Miss Farrell and Miss S. Burge. All the articles on the refreshment stall were given. The bazaar was opened on Wednesday, the 6th inst., by Miss Phillips, of Penmoyle, Chepstow, and it continued open till Thursday evening. The proceeds on the first day were about £53, and on the second day about £80, making between £80 and £90 in all, so that the results of the enterprise may be considered very successful. The present chapel in Barton-street is the original building erected nearly two hundred years ago—in the year 1699—for the use of the celebrated James Forbes, one of the pioneers of Nonconformity in Gloucester. Forbes was at first a Cathedral preacher, but was ejected from that office in consequence of the passing of the Act of Uniformity. After his ejection he laboured privately for some time, but, all attempts to conform him entirely failing, he was subjected to harassing persecutions, and to several imprisonments. On one occasion he was committed to Chepstow Castle, where he was confined for a long time in a "strait and dark room." At length he was excommunicated, and a writ de capiendo was issued against him. He retired to Enfield at the time of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, but was afterwards recalled, and allowed to labour among his own people. He died in 1712, having been connected with the congregation fifty-eight years. His remains were interred in a vault in the chapel at the foot of the pulpit, and a black slab was placed over them, which was afterwards concealed by the platform on which the communion table stands. A short time ago the stone was examined, and was found to have been so much damaged by age that it was determined to copy the inscription on a brass and cover the slab with the plate. This, we are informed, has now been done. From the Barton-street chapel came the congregation which built the present Congregational Chapel in Southgate-street. Thus the unpretentious-looking building in Barton-street cannot but be interesting to any Gloucester Nonconformist, to whatever denomination he may belong, when its past history and associations are remembered.

RINGWOOD.—The harvest thanksgiving was celebrated here on Sunday last, the 10th inst. The chapel was tastefully decorated by the ladies of the congregation with festoons of wheat, barley, and oats; the Communion Table with the "kindly fruits of the earth," and beautifully ornamented with flowers. Almost every production of the season was represented, from the climbing luscious grape to the lowly mushroom. Above the pulpit, in illuminated letters, were the words "The Lord of the harvest be praised," and on the window sills on either side, in similar letters, "The earth is full of thy riches." Harvest hymns were sung by the children, and appropriate discourses delivered by the minister, the Rev. J. W. Smith, that in the morning being an address principally to the children, and that in the evening founded on John iv. 35-36, treating of the continuous moral and spiritual harvest ever going on in the great field of human life. A good congregation listened to this earnest and impressive discourse.

MALTON.—The annual meeting of the trustees of the late Miss Popple, of Welton, near Hull, was held on Tuesday at Malton. The trustees are the Revs. Dr. Vance Smith, C. Hargrove, M.A. (Leeds), J. M. Dixon (Hull), F. Sidney Morris (York), Mr. W. Hands (Scarborough), and Mr. Alfred Frost (Hull). The trust consists of a sum of money left by the late Miss Popple to be used in aid of the Unitarian churches. Grants were made to various churches, including Malton. The trustees then dined together at the Talbot Hotel, and in the evening a public meeting was held at the Malton Unitarian Chapel, when there was a good attendance. The choir sang several hymns and part songs during the evening. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, who congratulated the congregation on the improvement in the chapel, compared with what he saw there several years ago. Mr. M. Dobson, on behalf of the congregation, offered their heartiest welcome to the gentlemen on the platform who represented the Popple Trust. Several had at one time or another assisted them by giving lectures of great interest, and he therefore welcomed them individually. Their congregation took credit for having improved the chapel, and they were never in a more healthy condition than at present. They occupied a better place of worship, and never mustered more working members. Aided by a minister who was all they could desire, a great future was in store for them. Mr. A. Frost, of Hull, expressed great pleasure at seeing such a good congregation and such a bright chapel. He then said the founder of the Popple Trust was Miss Maria Popple, of Welton, near Hull, whose father was vicar of the parish. By unaided search of the New Testament she found what she believed to be the truth, and devoted her time and means to the formation of a school and meeting-house at Welton. She died on July 15, 1847, after giving instructions to her sister, Miss Ann Popple, as to how the cause at Welton should be kept up. It afterwards came into the hands of trustees, and so continued, the sum invested being £3,000. Provision was made in the trust for applying the annual income wherever it was required, the condition being that the congregation should not hold the doctrine of the Trinity. At various times Malton had received very fair support from it, and he hoped circumstances would again justify the trustees in giving a generous support to Malton. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. J. Boughie, minister of the congregation; the Rev. D. Amos, of Scarborough; the Rev. F. Sydney Morris, of York; and the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, who called attention to the singular fact that all the speakers, himself included, had seceded from the Orthodox churches, and were basking in the freedom which Unitarianism afforded.

The Rev. J. Ruddle of Hastings has accepted a cordial invitation from the West Riding Unitarian Mission Society to become minister of the congregations at Pudsey and Elland.

By the law of Mexico no nun or monk can now exist on the soil of that country.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Fulton-street Prayer Meeting will be observed in New York this month.

AN ANTI-GOSSIP SOCIETY has been set on foot by the Sunday-school people and others of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Attleboro', Massachusetts.

In October Messrs. Longman will publish a Dictionary of Medicine, edited by Richard Quain, M.D., F.R.S. The editor has been engaged on this work for several years, and has received the assistance of a large number of the most eminent members of the medical profession and others. The work, which will be in one large volume, will furnish a complete record of the present state of medical science.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

London, August 22, 1882.

The death of the late William Annette Pope by fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends, they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London Mr. Pope had been for twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the free churches generally.

THE LATE DR. PUSEY.

THE celebrated divine who has just passed away has given his name to a movement in the English Church which, whether regard be had to the controversial stir which it has caused or to the weighty issues it involves, must ever be regarded as one of the most remarkable and epoch-making of this century. The name of PUSEY will go down to posterity as the name of the chief leader of the Tractarian movement. And yet we may well inquire why his name rather than another's? Why his rather than that of JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, of JOHN KEBLE, of HURRELL FROUDE, or the rest of his more or less distinguished associates? Dr. PUSEY did not join the Tractarians at the outset of their work, much less was he the originator of the movement. He was not a poet like KEBLE, whose hymns are as household words in the Christian Church and home; he was not a logician like NEWMAN, nor a passionate controversialist like FROUDE and WARD. He was, indeed, the foremost scholar and antiquarian of the party; but these are not the prime requisites in a popular leader. His personal piety is dwelt on by his admirers; but that was best known among his private friends. He was not the author of "Tract 90," although he republished it with a preface in later years.

How is it, then, that all the world has come to talk of Puseyites rather than of Newmanites, or Kebleites, or even Tractarians? Well, there was much, no doubt, in the outward position of the late Canon of Christchurch which would help to account for the leadership which was not so much claimed by himself as by common consent accorded him. EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY was a member of the aristocracy. He was a man of affluent means; and throughout the whole of the Tractarian agitation he was Professor of Hebrew at the University. He was always, so to speak, at head-quarters, directing the movements of his troops.

There is something also in a name. PUSEY, though known to the upper ten thousand as a name connected with blue blood, has to the general public an outlandish ring about it, something like that of VOYSEY at the opposite pole of thought, which was sure to catch with the multitude. As soon as the word Puseyite is pronounced in the average English ear, at once the figure is called up of a sleek sacerdotal exterior, a jesuitical evasiveness of manner, combined with a certain stern austerity of tone which is held to be characteristic of the Tractarian priest. No doubt these features, which are borrowed from popular acquaintance with the camp followers or the rank and file of the Tractarian party, are unconsciously transferred in imagination to the nominal leader of the movement by those who have never seen him; and little knew how completely his own exterior and personal appearance contrasted with the associations that had gathered around his name. Picture a face which was a curious admixture of that of the late Dean of WESTMINSTER and the present Bishop of CHESTER, without either the force of the one, or the haggard harshness of the other, a face of exceeding gentleness, and one might say of shyness, with nothing ascetic or sacerdotal in its look, and you will, at any rate, do no great violence to the truth with regard to the outward semblance of the late Dr. PUSEY.

If, then, we ask what it was which in addition to his rank and station, and the mere factitious suggestions of his name, commended Dr. PUSEY to so prominent a position, we shall probably endorse the verdict of Mr. MOZLEY as expressed in his lately published book on "Reminiscences of the Oxford Movement," that it was what that writer calls his "unique authority." Not that this authority was due to any special force of character or any singular vigour of mind, certainly not to any wonderful eloquence in speech. His learning, Dr. NEWMAN tells, was prodigious, but learning alone would not account for his authority. For it is just the most learned who are often swayed to and fro with every wind of doctrine in the progress of their researches. It was rather what some would call the almost unexampled stability; others, the exceptional immobility of his mind. For fifty years at least it may be said of him that he never changed his opinions or varied his practices. Other combatants in the Tractarian ranks were fighting their way towards they knew not what. Some were gravitating towards the doctrine and ritual of Rome, others toward the Eastern Church, while others developed at last an unsuspected tendency towards latitudinarian views, so that it became apparent as time went on that it was rather Protestant narrowness and ignorance that had repelled, than Catholic orthodoxy that had attracted them. Not so Dr.

PUSEY. After a rather hurried excursion in the domain of German theology at a very early period in his career, before he had himself become identified with the Tractarian movement, and before German theology had emerged out of the cruder rationalism of SEMLER and PAULUS, Dr. PUSEY settled down irrevocably into the High Anglican position, which he ever afterwards, through evil report and good report, consistently maintained. Never a shadow of doubt, and never a quail of misgiving seems for a moment to have disturbed his entire intellectual satisfaction and complete serenity of soul. His bosom friends and colleagues might desert him. A Newman and a Manning, more logical than he, might drift away to Rome. Defection after defection, now to the right and now to the left, might decimate the ranks of the Sacred Legion—the veteran Tractarian band. Even many a young man of whom he was the Father Confessor, having stealthily read the "Apologia" or "Essays and Reviews," deserted now to Rome and now to Reason. But Dr. PUSEY budged not an inch. These defections worried and vexed him; nay, we know they deeply grieved him, but from all that he has said and written we may feel well assured that they never caused him an instant's uneasiness with regard to the soundness and tenability of his own extraordinary position. The line which divides Anglicanism from Romanism was, as viewed by him, a very thin one indeed. But it was perfectly well defined, and whatever the misrepresentations of his adversaries may have led men to believe, he never dreamt of crossing it. His so-called Eirenicon or message of peace to Rome, which Dr. NEWMAN epigrammatically described as an "olive branch discharged from a catapult," was rather an attempt to prove that Rome had no just cause for keeping aloof from England than that England had no just cause for keeping aloof from Rome. This singular fixity of opinion was the secret, or one of the main secrets, of Dr. PUSEY's influence. It enabled him to educate generation after generation of undergraduates up to his own point of view, and to rebuke if he could not restrain whosoever went further or harked back. He had all the stock arguments drawn from patristic lore at his fingers' end, in favour of the Real Presence in the Sacrament, of the Communion, of Baptismal Regeneration, Apostolical Succession, the sole validity of the decrees of the first four Ecumenical Councils, the value of Auricular Confession, and the power of Absolution; and joined with this was a most childlike faith, amounting to what ordinary people would regard as abject credulity. It is related of him that he told one of his catechumens the following story, as a fact of personal experience. Walking in the streets of Oxford he met an acquaintance whom he supposed to be alive, but who was in reality dead, and who abruptly addressed him as follows: "Dr. PUSEY, I have been in Hell two days for that lie I told you in confession." This was narrated with the utmost simplicity, and with equal simplicity believed. But the person who reported it has since joined the Church of Rome, and what he now thinks of the story will probably never transpire. It may, indeed, be an instance of that growth of myth by hearsay and misunderstanding which accounts for so much that is marvellous in the Gospel narratives. A conscience-stricken confessee may in the flesh have met Dr. PUSEY, and used the above expression as a strong hyperbole expressive of remorse; from some accidental circumstance he may never have revisited the Doctor, and thus actually left him to suppose that he was an apparition from the grave, or rather from the infernal regions; but the anecdote may serve to show in what a weird and awful atmosphere of supernatural dread those must habitually have moved who gave themselves up unreservedly to the spiritual guidance of this Prince of Anglican Confessors.

But with all this extremity of sacerdotal pretension Dr. PUSEY never expressly or directly countenanced, certainly he never practised, the excesses of modern Ritualism. He was quite content with the doctrine, and thought that the utmost circumspection and regard to the prejudices of others should be observed in regard to the resuscitation of obsolete ceremonials.

In the course of his Oxford career the late Dr. PUSEY had more than once occasion both to suffer and to practise persecution. In 1832 he led a crusade against Dr. HAMPDEN, afterwards Bishop of Hereford, for the alleged heresy contained in his Bampton lectures and a pamphlet on religious Dissent. This assault ended in the exclusion of HAMPDEN, who was then Regius Professor of Divinity, from exercising any voice in the appointment of select preachers. But in 1843 Dr. PUSEY was himself excluded for three years from the University pulpit on account of a sermon entitled "The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent," in which the doctrine of the Real Presence was unequivocally avowed. An attempt was subsequently made to oust him from his Chair, which would probably have succeeded had it not been for the defection from the ranks of his opponents of a section of the liberal thinkers, headed by Professor JOWETT.

The daily Press have made a good deal of the fact that Dr. PUSEY voted with the minority on a later occasion for the decent endowment of the chair of the Greek professor. This event dwells not in our remembrance, but what we do remember is that about this very time Dr. PUSEY along with Professors HEURTLEY and OGILVIE, who had formerly been among his assailants, was promoting a suit in the Vice Chancellors' Court against Professor JOWETT, which, had it been successful, would have issued in his removal from the University altogether. The daily Press likewise comments on the moderation shown by Dr. PUSEY in refusing to vote for the exclusion of Dean STANLEY from the University Pulpit. As a set off against this it may be noted that when STANLEY was made Dean of Westminster he is said to have offered a canonry at the Abbey to Dr. PUSEY and another to Professor JOWETT, in the "name of their common Christianity." In what terms the latter declined the preferment is not known, but Dr. PUSEY took occasion to reply that "his Christianity had nothing in common with the Christianity of Professor JOWETT," a statement which, if true, was hardly calculated to redound to the credit of the man who made it. No one could in justice complain of one who held such views refusing to acknowledge the orthodoxy of his brother Regius Professor; and regarding his influence as dangerous, no one can blame him for trying to combat that influence by argument, by denunciation, by every legitimate means. But when we remember that it was one of the prime counts in Dr. PUSEY's indictment of the Regius Professor of Greek that he had written words subversive of the articles and doctrines of the Church of England which, as a clergyman, he was bound to defend, and that he was corrupting the minds of the youth of England by practically inculcating the doctrine that a man might honestly remain a member and a minister of the Church, while giving to its formularies and declarations of belief only a qualified assent—whatever we may think of the morality, or tenability of the position in question, one cannot but regret that Dr. PUSEY should have thought fit to level a charge to which he himself, if any man, was in a special sense amenable, against a liberal colleague who had befriended him in his need. It is true that the notorious Tract 90, in which the doctrine of reserve is advocated, was not the work of Dr. PUSEY, but he made himself even more responsible for the principles which it contained than if he had been its author, by undertaking to republish it with a preface in vindication, at a time when the writer of the tract was already far advanced on the journey Romeward.

It is instructive at this moment to recall the exact words of Dr. PUSEY in reference to this tract:—"Our reformers, our canons, and the combined teaching of our approved divines," he says, "all refer us to antiquity, and to the authority of the Primitive Church. If we find anything in the Church's formularies which according to any received interpretation is inconsistent with that model, are we not bound to inquire whether that is the only possible interpretation? And if of two possible interpretations one, even though it be a little strained (the italics are ours), is in accordance with antiquity, while the other is not, ought we not to choose the former?"

Now suppose the whole of that passage to be paraphrased thus by the Broad Churchman: "The greatest of the Reformers, such as LUTHER, the sanest of our English divines such as HOOKER, constantly refer us to the reason and conscience of the individual, as against tradition and antiquity. If, then, we find anything in the Church's formularies, which according to any received interpretation is inconsistent with that standard, are we not bound to inquire whether that is the only possible interpretation? And if of two possible interpretations one, even though it be a little strained, is in accordance with the spirit of progress and freedom which was after all the soul of the Reformation, whereas the other is not, ought we not to choose the former? What could Dr. PUSEY consistently reply? How one who had himself sought refuge in this plea, could so strenuously refuse to extend its benefit to another in like case, is a psychological puzzle which must remain for ever a mystery and a marvel to plain thinking men.

And this leads us in conclusion to speak of the work which Dr. PUSEY and his coadjutors have accomplished in and beyond the confines of the Church of England. To begin with, it must be set down unreservedly to their credit that they have restored reverence, dignity, and decency, and sometimes even more than these, to the services of the Church. They have infused into the ranks of the clergy and laity alike an earnestness and a zeal which before were almost unknown. It is good, says the apostle, to be zealously affected in a good cause; and the question next naturally arises was the Tractarian cause in any sense, or in what sense, a good one? That the attempt to reclaim the masses of our countrymen from heedlessness and indifference, to carry the solace of religion to the humblest door, was so far a good and noble cause few will be found to dispute. To revive the long slumbering interest of Englishmen in the relics of Christian antiquity was also in itself a gain, even from the point of view of the scientific historian. But when we come to inquire what was the ultima ratio of all this revived ecclesiastical activity, to what end were sisterhoods founded, auricular confession encouraged, the patristic records searched, the claim of Apostolical succession advanced, the crusade against the principles of the Revolution, and the liberal legislation of the first decades of the century declared, what was the guiding motive, and the all absorbing aim of these devoted men, the answer is not far to seek, and the object must be dispassionately pronounced to be the most baneful and pernicious when viewed with regard to the interests of humanity at large which it is possible to conceive. It was, openly and avowedly, to undo the work of the Reformation, instead of to carry it out to its logical issue—the complete enfranchisement of reason from dogma and tradition. It was the utter and total re-enslavement of the human mind. The Anglican priest, rehabilitated, was indeed to own no allegiance to the Pope of Rome—in this profession the Puseyite was perfectly honest—but he was to exercise despotic sway over the consciences and souls of the laity. An insular reproduction in England of the middle ages, Romanism without Rome and Papalism minus the Pope, that was and is the ideal and the goal which Tractarianism and its foster-child Ritualism have set before them from the first.

There is some danger at the present day lest admiration for the virtues of the departed worthy whose bones were interred on Thursday beneath that Cathedral at Oxford where so many of the great and glorious of England's sons are resting, should blind us to what is really meant by the almost unparalleled success which has crowned the work of his life. It means a tremendous spoke in the wheel of human progress. It means, wherever it spreads, an ever widening breach between religious sentiment and scientific culture. Even its aestheticism is morbid and one-sided, and is at war with that love of universal nature which is the foundation and inspiration of the purest taste. In Puseyism no doubt full many a gentle soul has found a needed asylum from the scepticism it dared not confront and the light it could not bear. Thus viewed, it is a necessity of our age—a necessary evil. Indirect and unwilling service it has also done to free-thought by exhibiting in all its nakedness the hollowness of Protestant Orthodoxy. For the rest, the freedom that it claims is the liberty to enslave, and the antiquity it vaunts is the inveteracy of long lived error.

CANON FARRAR's new work, "The Early Days of Christianity," will be shortly published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co. It will be in two volumes, uniform with "The Life of Christ."

UNITARIANISM AND THE MASSES.

A LITTLE tract with this heading, having appended to it the initials of an esteemed correspondent of this paper, has come into our hands. It is as follows:—

"When we Unitarians dwell upon the duty of our churches in relation to the masses, we should, in the first place, get a clear idea of the gospel we propose to carry to them. Is it to be religion, or something else? Are we to call multitudes together and say, 'O, fellow-men, we have asked you to meet us in order to impress upon you the great scientific fact that you, your wives, brothers, and sisters, are all descended from "four-footed hairy animals," and that everything comes about through a struggle for existence, in which the fittest survive. Most of you have come out of that struggle at a disadvantage, and many of you are evidently not of the strong who have the best chance of surviving. But be of good cheer. Some time after you have been swept away, in, say, a million of years—for evolutionary bills upon the future are drawn at long dates—a far more highly organised humanity will occupy the earth; unless, indeed, this globe should in the meantime have come into disastrous collision with a comet, or, the sun's heat becoming exhausted, the human race should get frozen out.'

"Now, there would be little in all that sort of thing to elevate, cheer, or inspire. Darwin's account of the origin of species and the descent of man I accept upon his authority and the testimony of other scientific explorers. That eminent man, dealing with scientific subjects, wisely confined himself to the matter in hand. He was no atheist; but in his published writings he judiciously left theology alone. If, however, we Unitarians are to go to the masses with religious teaching, we must begin where he left off.

"It is our mission to dispel both scepticism and indifference. We have to carry home to the minds and hearts of the people a living conviction and consciousness of the existence and presence of God. Without that all our building will be without foundation. To the poor, the weary, and worn, what comfort so sustaining as to learn that they have a heavenly Father who really cares for each one of them, who may be approached in prayer, and who will give strength and guidance to earnest, asking souls? Let the struggling sons and daughters of toil come to believe, through faith in God, that they are immortal beings, preparing for a nobler existence hereafter by the disciplines of the present life, and out of that new sense of the dignity of humanity, and of the value of every human soul, they will get hope and courage and inspiration. Go, tell working-men in no merely conventional phrase 'the truth as it is in Jesus?' how he, one of the people, preached his gospel especially to the poor, taught the equality of all men before their Maker, consecrated work and deeds of love as the best service of the Most High, showed in his own person how the despised and rejected may be nearest to God, and then, even in these days, the weary and heavy-laden will find that he can give them rest.

"Assuming Unitarians to have such faith themselves, there is a wide missionary field before them in which to impart it with the happiest moral and spiritual results. But if it is imagined that the work can be done by expositions of physical science, by politics, amusements, and theological negations, good as these may be in their place, the essentials of a religious movement are absent, and there will be neither warmth enough to provide the means of extensive missionary effort nor the spirit to use them. Are we going to the masses? If so, let it again be asked—What is our message to them?"

Now this appears to us to call forth a word or two of friendly comment and remonstrance. We begin with the latter. Is it quite fair to suggest, as the writer of the tract seems to do that those Unitarians who desire to go to the masses, have nothing but theological negations to preach? We quite assent to his view as to what should be taught, and the exact character of "our mission." But there is no need to infer that such things as the writer reproaches are regarded with approval to a large extent by Unitarians. There are some who seem to think there is a wide spread desire among Unitarians to place the religious in subordination to the secular. There is no evidence that any such desire has a strong hold upon them. We therefore deem it not quite fair to suggest, that in making up their mind as to the message they would take to the masses, there is a prospect of Unitarians determining that "expositions of physical science, politics, amusements and theological negations" are all that is required of them.

The writer of this tract quotes a supposititious message, and then says that "there would be little in all that sort of thing to elevate, cheer, or inspire." It seems to us that this is not the test. Is it the truth? That is, or ought to be, the only question. We have no fear of the truth; it may not be palatable to us; its discovery may greatly interfere with our previous comfortable conceptions, but that ought not to make us disloyal to it. To JESUS the message he brought was full of truth; it was that which made him tell it with the vigour of conviction. It was not that it was calculated "to elevate, cheer, or inspire" that convinced JESUS that he had a gospel to preach, it was its truth that inspired him. Ought not that to be our guide also?

Again, the writer says that he accepts the teachings of Mr. DARWIN, and praises him for a judicious reticence on theological matters. It is true that Mr. DARWIN said nothing directly on these matters; but can it be denied that the whole of his teaching is in direct opposition to the older notions of popular theology? Is it not the fact that he has completely altered the current of that theology? What place is there for the doctrine of the Fall, of the Atonement, of the origin of evil, of the literal truth of all that is contained in the Bible, in the minds of those who accept the doctrines taught by the late Mr. DARWIN? No doubt many men have thought, that there have flowed quite naturally from these doctrines, others that they are destructive of very much more in the popular theology than anything we have mentioned, indeed destructive of all theology. Now if these men are right, then DARWIN, in dealing with scientific subjects, has taught that sort of thing in which there would be little to elevate, cheer, or inspire. Was DARWIN, therefore, wrong? Is his doctrine of the Origin of Species and the Descent of Man untrue because it lacks elevation, cheerfulness, or inspiration? We are not saying that these followers of DARWIN, or those who adapt his thoughts to other than scientific subjects, are right; we are simply protesting against an argument raised, as it appears to us, on a false basis.

We are not sure that we quite grasp the meaning of our author when he says that Unitarians must begin where he (DARWIN) left off. If we understand him rightly, he must mean that they are to apply DARWIN'S reasoning to theological matters. If they are to do this they will have a great deal to do in the way of denying popular theology, and cannot at times omit "expositions of physical science." This the writer appears to deprecate. For our part we believe that the message Unitarians have to bring to the masses can be told in various ways. Some of these are better than others, but they are all good in their way, and ought not to be despised. If some feel that they can best tell that message by speaking of matters, not of the highest perhaps, but still of service to their brethren, let them do so by all means. And let those who think they stand on a higher elevation make use of their vantage ground, but do not let them imagine that they can dispense with the services of those others, who, from their standpoint, proclaim what is to them the truth, even if it be not up to the loftier level of inspiration. There is work to do for all; if some of it is not quite so elevating as the rest it cannot be helped, but it need not be spoken of contemptuously.

AFTER DEATH.—III.

THREE views which have been held of life after death have now been considered by us. The first, the Protestant view of this life being our only time of probation, to be followed by one of two alternatives—heaven or hell. The next, the Catholic and Pagan doctrine of purgatory in a spiritualised sense, implying reformation rather than, or as much as, punishment. The third, the Buddhist and Hindu doctrine of the transmigration of souls, technically called, metempsychosis. We will now consider two entirely distinct theories that have been held with regard to annihilation. The one is the somewhat modern protestant theory that there is no everlasting hell; that, while the good or the "elect" are to be ever with the Lord, the wicked will necessarily be thrust out of the presence of the Holy One, and that absence from Him means total destruction or annihilation. The other theory is the materialistic one—that for all men soul and body die together.

The first view is a desperate attempt to get rid of the incongruity and injustice of visiting everlasting punishment on the temporal sins of frail mortals. But against this view many considerations force themselves on our notice. If it be possible to prove (as some would persuade us) that the New Testament does not teach eternal torment, it does not follow, and the New Testament does not teach, that the wicked will be destroyed. It may be that though hell has an existence our conception of it is false and unformed. Or the difficulty may be got over by the doctrine of the final restitution of all, which is more consonant with what we believe or know of GOD than so violent a remedy as annihilation—if complete, final failure can be called a remedy. Again, if we reject eternal torment as unjust and derogatory to a merciful and wise Creator and Father we must take care that what we put in the place of it is not itself unjust. Now, certainly, to mete out to all degrees and kinds of wickedness the even judgment of annihilation seems unjust. These are some of the reasons which militate against so wild a theory, besides those which can be brought to bear against the general notion of annihilation, which is the next point to consider.

To recapitulate the arguments that tell for immortality would be a useless task; to carry them home would be to do ill what has many a time been done well by the noblest thinkers of various ages and countries. Those who are not convinced by the grave arguments and severe logic of BUTLER, by the noble and far-reaching utterances of PLATO, by the poetic aspirations and inspirations of ÆSCHYLUS and SHAKSPEARE, would not be moved by one who merely "stains the water clear" and uses a "rural pen." There are, however, two or three remarks the writer would make, because it seems to him they have not been repeated with the same iteration as other more solid arguments.

Our first remark is that, whereas the laws of nature continually show development, the rising from a lower to a higher type (with incidental instances of the degradation and final disappearance of comparatively ignoble types), the theory of annihilation would completely contradict this law of progress, flatly deny it with a full stop, oppose itself to all the dreams of poets and philosophers—dreams sometimes stronger than foot-sure science. If it be said that the law of progress alluded to is a law of nature and not of mind, and that the annihilation considered is annihilation of the soul and not of matter, two answers may be returned. First, that we trace this law of progress in the spiritual world fully as much as in the natural world; and next, that we are entitled by the method of Analogy to reason about the spiritual world just as we reason about the natural world, believing both worlds are governed by co-ordinate laws. BUTLER, who did not, as HOBBS, LOCKE, HUME and others, combat particular difficulties of his age, but whose thoughts form a firm and sound foundation of reasoning for all ages, points out that in matters reaching beyond our experience we can only depend on probabilities—probabilities sometimes so strong as to warrant the language of certainty. The argument used above is not intended to go further than probability. How much more likely does immortality appear than annihilation, judging analogically by that law of progress which comes under the continued cognisance of observation and experience! In accordance with this law we constantly see that life is stronger than death. The Buddhist poet in the "Hitopadesa," panting for Nirvana, may say (as translated by EDWIN ARNOLD):—

"Meeting makes a parting sure, Life is nothing but death's door;"

but a Christian would retort:—

"Parting makes a meeting sure, Death is nothing but life's door."

If it be true that while there is life there is hope, physicians will tell us that with the loss of hope there is no chance for the continuance of life. The hope of immortality within us is founded not so much on the love of life as on the sense of the strength of life, and on the actuality of the law of progress.

But, again, the idea of annihilation, if there be a GOD (that is, if any meaning can be given to the word justice), is so eminently unjust. HARRIET MARTINEAU boasted that she delighted in the thought of annihilation. That only proves how unjust and selfish the philosophy of one who was a real philanthropist and thinker could become in her somewhat hard old age. Even CICERO, a mere Pagan philosopher, to whom the souls of slaves and other unfortunates were hardly entities, did not go so far as that. Though he was resigned, after he had enjoyed the banquet of this life and had risen with sated appetite to accept the decrees of the gods and slip into the nothingness preached by the minuti philosophi, whom he despised, yet he longed, if it were possible, for immortality. It is painful enough to have to confess that many of our daily actions are mean and petty and selfish, but it is still more painful and degrading to have to confess that many of our theories of right are only selfishness in disguise. We all remember SYDNEY SMITH, who was so touched by a charity sermon that he put his hands into his neighbour's pocket and emptied the contents into the plate. But is that playful verisimilitude worse than the selfishness of a man who has set his heart on "saving his soul"? When a man, finding himself the single one saved out of a gallant company of a ship gone down at sea, fell on his knees and thanked GOD for his deliverance, the action was venial and natural enough, but we can hardly think he "gave glory to GOD." Pain and humiliation, and a great astonishment were more righteous. Among the Plymouth Brethren of the "exclusive" sort, it is customary to dilate one with another on their great "happiness."

I must confess, considering the very small number of the "saints," if I could have my way, I would attempt to lay on them some of the divine grief of the Man of Sorrows. This selfishness, it seems, sticks to us in theory and practice close as our skins, and therefore, until we can clear ourselves, it may be as well not to cast stones too freely at HARRIET MARTINEAU. But nevertheless, to delight in annihilation is an ugly phrase. For, first, if it be true that those who have had the cup of the wine of life presented to them, so that they have drunk to their heart's content, may cease the draught with gratitude to the giver and retire from the hall of life with a charming decorum, the number of such is small. Few are great, and noble, and energetic, and endowed with fine intellects or large hearts, and dowered with splendid tasks which they have been enabled to bring to a successful issue. Few are worthy thinkers or inspired poets. Still fewer are satisfied with the life they have lived and able to profess that it has been happy. Not many of the most fortunate would live their life again. Most men are poor, and dull, and jaded, overworked, underfed bodily and spiritually, unsympathetic, unloving and unloved (at least that is their feeling), with no high or noble ambitions, or with the bitter sense of disappointment and failure. Many are cruelly treated and have slaves' hearts. Worse still, many are slaves to their own passions, selfish, pampered, lustful, cruel, hating and hated, envious, loaded with the ruin of others. At the lowest rung of the ladder are those who are happy to be and to be called "fast," or who are content to be beggars. These are the great multitude whom no man can number. Will the balance of justice and mercy never be applied righteously to heart-worn women, children who have had no childhood, sinners, idiots, sufferers from the injustice of circumstance and the malice of fortune, all who are heavy-laden? Nay, to think so is too grotesque, too hideous. But if it be so, there is no cause for joy, but rather to curse ourselves that we be men, to confess the shameful confession that life is not worth living, to join the cynic philosopher SCHOPENHAUER and the moody poet LEOPARDI in their terrible creed of despair; to say in the words of him with the "two steadfast and intolerable eyes burning beneath a broad and rugged brow"—

And now, at last, authentic word I bring,
Witnessed by every dead and living thing,
Good tidings of great joy for you, for all;
There is no God; no Fiend with names divine
Made us and tortures us; if we must pine,
It is to satiate no Being's gall.

But surely it were happier and juster to believe with old fashioned BUNYAN that if we, with Passion, have had all our good things now, Patience, who has had to wait amid pain and sighs and sneers, will have her good things hereafter.

But, again, a man of generous heart and active mind will not rejoice, even for himself, at the prospect of annihilation. Such an one is eager for the time when his sphere of work may be enlarged, when the reward of duties fulfilled shall be fresh duties enjoined, when opportunities for the exercise of a larger, wiser, more embracing love shall be extended a thousand fold. As GOETHE'S last cry (vitali lampada tradens) was for "more light," so many a man's last wish is for more and nobler work, with deeper insight into truth and the seeds of things.

We have discussed the modern Protestant view of annihilation for the wicked, and the selfish view of annihilation, of which HARRIET MARTINEAU may be considered the Apostle. The Pessimistic views of SCHOPEN-

HAUER and LEOPARDI, which were sincere enough with them and some others, but which it is now rather a fashion to adopt without much sense or reason by those always thirsting after a novelty, need hardly engage our attention. But there remain other nobler views on the doctrine of annihilation than these not yet examined by us.

FERDINAND FREILIGRATH AND DANIEL SANDERS.

The intercourse of literary celebrities is always interesting, and as the name of Dr. Daniel Sanders has appeared more than once in the pages of the Inquirer we are inclined to believe that the following article from the pen of Hermann Kindt extracted from the Deutsches Montagsblatt will be not unacceptable to our readers.

When we remember the cordial delight with which Freiligrath received Geibel's dedication to him of that writer's "Altspanische Volkslieder und Romanzen," writing to the friend and poet in February, 1843, from St. Goar, of his "thousand-fold joy at the distinction accorded him which filled him with honest pride" (Buchner's "Biography of Freiligrath 1882," vol. II. p. 51), it cannot but surprise anyone who has read the just published memoir that Freiligrath should make no mention of another dedication which assuredly filled him no less with "thousand-fold joy and honest pride." I mean the dedication which our great linguist Daniel Sanders prefixed to his German Dictionary in 1866, and which was worded as follows:—"To Herr Ferdinand Freiligrath in London, the German poet and man, as a token of admiring veneration."

It might seem to anyone unacquainted with the facts like ingratitude or actual indifference that Freiligrath himself makes no mention of the distinction thus conferred on him in any letter to the author of the dictionary, the more so as the chief charm of the above named biography of the poet consists in his beautiful letters. And when we consider that thanklessness and indifference were as utter strangers to this noble and pre-eminent nature as were all the baser passions of the soul; when we consider what Buchner so truly and significantly emphasises that he, one of our most gifted poets, was able, even in the most ordinary letters, to display a skill of literary expression which raises him far above our most renowned modern writers of prose, then we feel a kind of yearning to know in what written effusion the poet clothed his "gratitude and honest pride." Fortunately the letter is preserved, which, years afterwards, indeed, was the outcome of a heart no less modest than manly in its greatness.

It is true the thanks were long in coming, but for all that they filled his whole heart when he gave them utterance.

This was nearly three years after the completed publication of the dictionary with its dedication. I was so happy as to be the first to receive this effusion of gratitude on behalf of the illustrious author of this dictionary, and to be the privileged bearer of the same along with a beautiful photograph and a book of the poet.

I was witness at the same time of the amiable manifestation of manly modesty with which the great linguist received the long-delayed thanks of the poet. It seemed as though the great work of a lifetime which he had dedicated in token of veneration to the German poet and man had found its fairest reward and acknowledgment by the mere fact of its dedication. I lived at that time, as is now again the case, not very far from Professor Sanders' residence, and on this account I was honoured by being made "Ambassador Extraordinary," as Freiligrath himself expresses it, charged to bring the venerated scholar the so long delayed thanks of the poet, since the latter with a touching and childlike modesty thought "he stood in need of some sort of mediation," in order to excuse him. The beautiful letter may now be allowed to speak for itself. I should perhaps not have given it publicity, were it not that haply here and there some might accuse Freiligrath of ingratitude towards Professor Sanders in view of the great delight he had expressed at Emanuel Geibel's dedication. Besides, the letter does honour to the worth of both these genuine Germans—why should I withhold it from contemporaries and posterity? When Freiligrath wrote it—viz., 9th of January, 1869,—he was living in Stuttgart, and now let the letter tell its own story:—

"To-day I send you by parcel's delivery a packet with two copies of the latest edition, just published, of my English Anthology, entitled 'Tea Rose, Thistle and Shamrock,' likewise, enclosed, two copies of my last photograph taken a few weeks ago. In one of the two books I have written your name, and beg you kindly to accept it as a kind memento. Also one of the two photographs as a substitute for the expressionless profile by Elliot and Fry, which you had from me a year ago, and which you must really do me the favour of throwing into the fire. It is too horrid—a clod of flesh—a corpse! The likenesses inclosed are on the other hand excellent; at least, so wife and children and friends assure me, and reflect faithfully not only the features, but the expression of my face. Now, as to the second copy of Anthology and likeness I have a great request to make to you.

"Do you not sometimes go as far as your neighbouring Altstrelitz? And will you in that case personally hand book and likeness to Dr. Daniel Sanders—there resident—one of the most excellent and learned men of Germany, with my heartiest and most particular greetings—in the character to some extent of my 'Ambassador Extraordinary'? You see, my dear friend, the fact is this. I have a guilty conscience as regards Dr. Sanders; and I cannot take up his 'Dictionary of the German Language,' which now, thank God, after a long period of privation lies by me on my writing table—and how often do I handle it!—but it gives me a prick in the heart. Dr. Sanders, you must know, has done me one of the greatest honours that were ever conferred on me. He has actually dedicated to me the dictionary just mentioned, a monument of German genius, German learning, German industry, and German thoroughness, such as has few equals, and I for three long years have never so much as thanked him, nor yet, so far, carried out my intention of giving expression to my admiration of his work in the English Press. What must the excellent man think of me? What a barbarian; what a 'churl' must I seem to him? And yet I am not so guilty as he perhaps believes. The last number of his dictionary, containing the dedication, reached me just at the time when by the breaking up of the London Agency of the Bank of Switzerland the ground was cut from under me.*

"What burdens then weighed me down! I could not find leisure to write! and even afterwards was unable to collect myself, so many things of so many sorts, good and evil, poured in upon me in those years! Now that I have got over my resettlement in Germany I begin gradually to regain breath, and look before and behind to think how I may overtake all that against my will and my wish I have been forced to neglect.

"And foremost among these omissions stand my thanks to Doctor Sanders. Will you then, when you present him with the book and the likeness, be so very kind as to bring him these thanks, and tell him how it all came about? It is really foolish of me not to write at once myself to Doctor Sanders, instead of burdening you with this message, but it seems to me as though I stood in a manner in need of some mediation, and as though you who have known me for years as a good fellow, and one who means to be grateful, were the right man for the purpose, and ought specially to journey to Strelitz in order to plead my cause. Do what you can for me, dear friend.

* Buchner writes on this event (Biography II. p. 354):—

The year 1866 was one of the most anxious of Freiligrath's unrestful life. But here, too, the adage held, when need is sorest, help is nearest; and this help was to reach the poet from a quarter whence it was least looked for, and yet most welcome, namely, from his own people. Freiligrath himself in one of his "delayed" letters of this period, beginning 29th September, 1866 (see page 366 of Vol. II.), says:—"I have had since an agitated and in many ways anxious time—and could during this time not attain the frame of mind and inward quiet needful for a letter to you. This, if any, must be my only excuse. Once more forgive me and accept my thanks."

You have yourself often forgiven me long silences, so now appease your venerated neighbour in my behalf. I lay the matter confidently in your hands."

How Doctor Sanders took the "matter" I have already indicated above. I have only to add that he at once wrote to the revered poet, and that from that time onwards both exchanged many a friendly greeting, until the great heart of the German poet was stopped by the hand of death. And then I know from personal experience how the great linguist mourned the "German Man and Poet," to whom he dedicated the great work of his life "in token of admiring veneration."

THE EDUCATION REPORT FOR 1881.—II.

In the previous article our remarks upon the proficiency of the children were restricted to the cases of ordinary primary education. There are, however, examinations in what are known as "Class Subjects" and "Specific Subjects." The former have hitherto been confined to grammar, geography, history, and needlework, and the grants are not given as the result of individual examination, but depend upon the general proficiency of the classes in boys', girls', and mixed schools. During the past year grants to the amount of £314,051 9s. 10d. have been made in respect of an average attendance of 1,799,528 scholars, of whom 1,477,357 were paid for passes in two subjects. The grants made for "specific subjects," on the other hand, are paid in respect of the proficiency of the scholars as tested by individual examination. The subjects so designated were ten in number, and, taking them in the order of the preference apparently shown by the number of children examined in the three stages of each subject, they were as follows:—(1) English; (2) Domestic Economy; (3) Physical Geography; (4) Animal Physiology; (5) Mathematics (Algebra and Euclid); (6) French; (7) Mechanics; (8) Botany; (9) Latin; (10) German. There is great difference in the numbers examined in these subjects; while as many as 127,313 took up "English," only 34 fancied "German." More interest was apparently manifested in "French," but here only 3,360 were examined, and about a third of that number selected "Latin." "Domestic Economy," which ranks next to "English," furnished 55,993 for examination. Several of the scholars selected more than one subject; the report says that as many as 173,665 were so examined, of whom 122,746 passed successfully; 41,961 of them in two subjects, and 1,196 in three. It adds that "all these figures are in advance of the previous year."

One has heard from time to time complaints made with reference to this teaching of "specific subjects," that they go beyond the plain teaching of the three R's, and that the tendency of such "superior" teaching is to convert, what were intended to be elementary schools, into schools fitted for and attracting older children of a superior class. We confess that we do not attach much value to these complaints, and should not be disposed to look too narrowly at the word "elementary." While agreeing in the main with the generally received notion that people value most that for which they have to pay or undergo some sacrifice, we do not think that any child should be debarred of education simply because its parents are unable to pay for it. Indeed, if our board schools were "free," we should not greatly deplore it, though we fear that in the present temper of many of those who now pay school rates the time is far off when such a state of things will exist. Upon this subject there is a passage in the report, in which the Committee, while declining to enter into the question of the propriety or necessity of making the best use of the too short school life of our children of every class, point out that of the four million scholars found in aided schools, during the past year, not more than 157,584 were between thirteen and fourteen, and 45,727 above fourteen; that at the same time the registers contained the names of only 9,513 scholars who had passed the Sixth Standard, which they ought to do before they are thirteen years of age. "The fact is," says the Report, "that the great majority of the older children in our schools are those who, having failed, either from ill-health, or other causes, to receive proper instruction in their younger years, are now making up for lost time; and are presented in comparatively low standards. There are some certainly whose parents, by personal sacrifice, or with the aid of exhibitions, keep them at school beyond the normal age; but these cases are exceptional, and the children found in, or beyond, the highest standards are very frequently in advance of their years. Almost as many scholars (8,006) passed last year, while below ten, in the three higher standards, as those (9,513) whom we referred to as remaining in school after completing the work of the standards. In the case of 1,450 of these scholars in schools under Boards who pay special attention to the specific subjects, we find that only 329 are over fourteen, while 507 are under thirteen, and eighty-eight under twelve years of age; and these children, with few exceptions, are of the class ordinarily found in public elementary schools."

It does not seem, therefore, that those who complain of the teaching of "specific subjects," are able to point to large figures by way of confirmation of their arguments, at any rate at present. When, too, we learn that the whole amount of grants claimed in respect of these subjects, during the past year, was only £28,971 7s. 2d., or just over 2½d. per scholar in average attendance, so that the annual grant last year would have been 15s. 6d. instead of 15s. 8½d. per scholar, there is still less to encourage the grumblers. But there is more to be said in favour of the "specific subjects," and this is to be found in the report. "While," say the Committee, "many districts, moreover, provide, in addition to the requisite amount of public school accommodation, sufficient opportunities for the higher education, at a reasonable cost, of the children of parents even of humble means, this is not always the case; and our returns show that no small proportion of the scholars taking the specific subjects are found in the smaller towns and in rural districts. In many such districts indeed our schools furnish the only means available for the instruction of the children of farmers, small tradesmen, and others who contribute as payers of rates and taxes, or by larger school fees than those usually charged, to the maintenance of schools in which they not unreasonably expect that some provision shall be made for the suitable education of their own children." It must not be understood that in defending the teaching of "specific" subjects we approve of all the subjects that have been selected, or consider that those alone, and no others, should be taught. All we are concerned for, at present, is to point out that there is really no substance in the outcry raised by some people at this giving of "superior" education at rate-aided schools. The real desideratum is to make parents feel that it is not too much but too little education they should regard with disfavour. In confirmation of this view we have only to point to the fact stated in the report, that "the proportion of children who leave school after passing standard four is increasing." It is, however, encouraging to know that Cookery is taught in twenty-three more schools than in 1880, and that Savings Banks, which were established in the year 1879 in 848 schools, are now to be found in 1,187 schools.

It is important to consider whether, having regard to the increased number of children in attendance, the supply of teachers has kept pace with the demand. In 1869 there were 12,842 pupil teachers, 1,236 assistant teachers, and 12,027 certificated teachers at work in inspected schools. Last year these numbers had risen to 30,322—8,559—and 33,562 respectively. It is assumed, in order to meet the future requirements of our schools, and taking into account the large number of small schools in the rural districts, and the increasing employment of adults in place of pupil-teachers, as many as 35,000 certificated teachers will be wanted. It would seem therefore from the figures given above that the demand is in a fair way of being met. Our training colleges, too, provide accommodation for 3,225 students, and are furnishing a yearly supply of 1,500 teachers, trained for two years. Indeed, there is some fear lest the profession should be overstocked, and the report mentions that in April last as many as 154 students who had successfully completed their course of training at Christmas, 1881, were still without situations. Out of the total number of teachers 29.75 per cent. of the masters and 49.32 per cent. of the mistresses were untrained; but there will always be a field for these in connection with poor schools. The profession of school-teachers has improved in a pecuniary sense in proportion to the larger demand there has been for their services. In 1870 the average salary of a certificated master was £95 12s. 9d., that of a mistress was £57 16s. 5d. In 1881 these figures had risen to £120 16s. 1d. and £72 10s. 4d. These averages are arrived at by taking into calculation the salaries paid to the whole of the teachers, whether principal or assistant. If the metropolitan district alone is taken the average is much higher, the masters in voluntary schools receiving £152 6s. 7d., and in board schools £243 14s. 3d., the figures in the case of mistresses being respectively £87 11s. and £165 2s. 8d. It will be seen from these latter figures that the position of a teacher under the London School Board is better than that of a teacher in a voluntary school. In the curriculum for teachers the study of scientific subjects has not been insisted on, but it has been encouraged. At Christmas, 1881, there were 1,349 male students examined in one or more of the following subjects:—Mathematics, Theoretical Mechanics, Applied Mechanics, Acoustics (Light and Heat), Magnetism and Electricity, Inorganic Chemistry, (1) Theoretical, (2) Practical, Animal Physiology, Elementary Botany, and Physiography; while in one or more of the three latter subjects 797 female students were examined; the results of the examination were on the whole satisfactory. Languages, too, now enter into the course of study in all the training colleges; Greek and German are not favourites; French and Latin, especially the former, attracting the largest numbers. Curiously enough, at Midsummer last there were more papers by female students than by male, while at Christmas the positions were reversed.

A by no means unimportant question in dealing with this subject is the financial one. Are our children being educated too expensively, or is economy within prudent limits being effectually carried out? We have pointed out in the previous article that the education grant has increased, but that is to be accounted for by the relative increase of children under instruction. We may, therefore, expect to find that a similar increase would show itself in the rates; nor are we disappointed in our expectation. Of course, the mere increase of the children attending any one particular school would not necessarily swell the expenses connected with that school; it is, therefore, owing to another fact that the rates have to bear a larger proportion than last year, and that is the larger number of schools provided by school boards. The principal item in the increased expenditure falling upon the rates is the interest on loans to meet capital charges, and repayment of instalments of the principal of such loans. On the other hand, the cost of maintenance, so far as it is borne by the ratepayers, has during the years 1879-81 fallen from 18s. 9½d. to 16s. 11½d. per child in average attendance. On looking at the figures given to show the cost of "maintenance" per child in average attendance, we observe that, as might be expected, the cost in board schools is in excess of that in voluntary schools, and, as also might be inferred, the expense in London is far in excess of the general cost throughout the country, in both classes of schools. It should also be noted that the amount paid by the children in voluntary schools exceeds that paid by them in board schools; in London the amount is as much as 4s. 11½d. per child more. No doubt many, if not most, of the parents of these children are ratepayers, so the effect of sending their children to voluntary schools is that they pay rather more than they would if they sent them to those under the Board. No explanation is given why the expenditure in London is so much larger than it is in other parts of the country, though it would not be difficult, we imagine, to find one, and that without imputing anything like extravagance to the managers of either class of schools. Before leaving this branch of the subject it may be interesting to note that in England and Wales, comparing the years 1880 and 1881, the amount of school income derived from the rates has increased only 1.72 per cent., as against a decrease of 1.38 per cent. of income from voluntary subscriptions; while the income from school pence has increased 5.44 per cent. In Scotland, on the other hand, there is a decrease in rates and voluntary subscriptions.

Few persons who have had anything to do with the management of public elementary schools can fail to relish the "Instructions to H.M. Inspectors" which were issued in August last. The occasion of these new instructions is that several changes have been introduced into the Code, and a reorganisation of the work of inspection is in contemplation. The inspectors are mildly reminded that "all hurry or undue haste on the day of examination is incompatible with the proper discharge" of their duty. "Their Lordships" are not unmindful of "the great courtesy, patience, and industry" with which the Inspectors have discharged their duties; still "managers have complained of unpunctuality, haste, and impatience, and of a want of due consideration in the treatment of teachers and scholars." The Inspectors are then reminded that an early attendance at the school is absolutely indispensable, and of the evils likely to result from a hurried inspection, among which are, "the attempt to do two things at once," and "embarrassing young scholars by want of clearness in dictation or in asking questions." We are satisfied that these "instructions" have not been given without good reason; we only hope that they may be attended to, and we shall then hear far less than we have done of dissatisfied school managers and mortified teachers. H.M. Inspectors are like other mortals, touched with the infirmities of human nature, but they need not carry out their duties so as to make their visits dreaded rather than welcomed. We have no intention of criticising the rest of the instructions which have been given with a view to arriving at a uniform standard. They seem to be conceived in a spirit of practical wisdom. We cannot, however refrain from noticing the instructions given as to examination in needlework, to which it is said that at least forty-five minutes should be given. We wonder how many of H.M. Inspectors could themselves pass an examination in this subject? When part of the examination is "to cut out and tack together pattern of girl's shift, also to graft 3 inches, and to take up ladder," does a single one of these gentlemen know what really has to be done? Or, when a child, examined in Standard II., fails "to cast on twenty loops, and knit twenty rows, ribbed, pearl and plain, breaking and joining the wool at least once in the space, afterwards cast off," could any inspector point out where the failure was? And how many inspectors will exercise the option given to them to require girls in Standards VI. and VII. "to Swiss darn a space one inch square, and on a calico hem three-quarter inch wide, do two inches of knotting and two inches of coral stitch." It is not attributing to the inspectors very great incompetence, when we say that this kind of examination is wholly beyond them. It would be well if really competent persons were appointed to conduct such examinations. We should probably not have such wholly unneeded requirements insisted on. This, however, is a detail. The conviction forced upon us by a perusal of the Report and the Instructions is that in the Education Department we have one of the most useful of our Government agencies, and that it is doing its work thoroughly and effectively, though by no means obtrusively. In the present Vice-President, Mr. Mundella, we have a man admirably fitted to the post he holds, and the country may well congratulate itself that he is holding the office which he does, with so much credit to himself, and so much satisfaction to the country at large.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Occasional Notes.

THE "National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches" of America has been holding its sittings this week at Saratoga, beginning on Monday and ending yesterday. The following was the published order of proceedings, subject to possible variations:—

Monday, 8 P.M.: Meeting of the Council.

Tuesday, 10 A.M.: Report of the Council; essay by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Leicester, England, upon "Jesus Christ's Unfulfilled Ideal of Religious Unity"; address by William B. Carpenter, M.D., F.R.S. of London; other addresses by representatives of the Hungarian Unitarians and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; general business.

3 P.M.: Reports of the American Unitarian Association and the chief conferences, by Messrs. Grindall Reynolds, J. L. Jones, Russell N. Bellows, and Wm. S. Heywood; discussion.

7.30 P.M.: Sermon by Rev. Charles G. Ames.

Wednesday, 10 A.M.: Essay, by the Rev. George Batchelor, upon "The Place of the Unitarian Body in the National Life of America;" to be followed by addresses by the Revs. Dr. William G. Eliot, Charles A. Allen, George L. Chaney, and A. D. Mayo.

3 P.M.: Report of the Committee upon the Union of the National Conference and the American Unitarian Association, by Hon. Dorman B. Eaton; discussion and general business.

7.30 P.M.: Public meeting in the interest of the Woman's Auxiliary Association.

Thursday, 10 A.M.: Essay, by the Rev. John C. Learned, upon "The Future of Religion;" discussion of the proposed J. H. Wade School at Cleveland.

3 P.M.: Addresses upon the outlook of Unitarianism in different parts of the country, by the Revs. Thomas D. Eliot, Samuel C. Beane, Oscar Clute, and Rush R. Shippen.

7.30 P.M.: A meeting to discuss the religious education of the young, with addresses by the Revs. Samuel R. Calthrop, Edward A. Horton, and others.

Friday, 10 A.M.: Essay, by the Rev. Francis G. Peabody, upon "Liberal Christianity and the Spirit of Worship;" general business.

In the evening, a sociable [Anglice social] in the parlours of the United States Hotel.

We fancy we may take to ourselves the hint contained in the following paragraph from the Christian Register of Boston, U.S.:—

The feeling that the National Conference should become something more than a mere advisory body—a real missionary, church-planting, and executive society, either auxiliary to the American Unitarian Association, or as an independent organisation—will excite quite the usual amount of discussion at the coming meeting at Saratoga. An earnest friend of the cause writes to us that his feeling, and that of many with whom he has conversed, is that, unless something of this kind is done, faith in the usefulness of the Conference will soon begin to decline. "Fine essays and social good times," he says, "will not save it, though earnest debates about real issues might."

We much regret to learn that owing to indisposition the Rev. J. Baldwin Brown is compelled to prolong his usual period of rest.

THE difficulty of proving a negative is proverbial. Perhaps it is owing to the encouragement derived from a knowledge of the fact that an offer has been made by a gentleman, through the Drummond Tract Society, to pay £1,000 to any Roman Catholic who will prove that the Apostle Peter had no wife. Of course, the fourteenth verse of the eighth chapter of Matthew, which tells us that Jesus came into Peter's house and "saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever," is a stumbling block in the way of such proof.

SPEAKING of the Rev. P. Dean's "Compilations on Piety and Morality," the Christian World says:—"There is a world of wisdom in many of these extracts, and it is a book which may very fitly lay in one's way for occasional use at times of meditation and quiet thought. It is a Catholic selection, and will help to convince some people that good men of all ages have assuredly had the light of God shining within their souls."

PEOPLE need not believe everything that appears in the newspapers, unless they like. We should imagine a good many people would avail themselves of this liberty on reading the following statement made by the New York Independent:—"There are quite a number of Sunday-schools in Jewish quarters attended by large numbers of Jewish children; but in hymns, &c., they never speak the name of Jesus, but give in its place an inarticulate hum. The hymn "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," would be vigorously shouted "Safe in the Arms of hum, hum."

If the people of the United States are unable to boast of their antiquities, they can at least point to some respectable fossils. One of these would seem to be Professor Dana, of Yale College, who, it is said, has received higher honours from European scientific societies than any geologist now living in the United States. Speaking of the first chapter of Genesis, he says: "Examining it as a geologist, I find it to be in perfect accord with known science; therefore, as a Christian, I assert that the Bible narrative must be inspired." One is tempted to say that his theology and geology are somewhat on a par. Is Professor Dana aware that other scientific men besides geologists have a word or two to say with respect to the verbal accuracy of the first chapter of Genesis?

ONE of the greatest blessings that this century has witnessed has been the improved means of communication between all the civilised communities of the world. And no two countries have felt this more than England and the United States. Few of our countrymen who go there fail to come back with the feeling of brotherhood strengthened by the visit, and we believe that this feeling is reciprocated by nearly all of those who visit our shores. Indeed, the sense of kinship is not confined to those who brave the Atlantic. We doubt not that there are several eminent Englishmen who could cordially echo the concluding words of the following letter from Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes to a lady in England:—"We are all burned up with drought in this part of New England, but we think more of your country and its troubles than we do of our brown fields and shrivelled harvests. We count every drop of English blood that sinks into the sands of Egypt almost as if it were from the veins of our own countrymen. The understanding between the educated classes of the two countries and their sympathy with each other grow with every year. I have had myself so many kindly tokens of regard from England that I almost feel as if I had a home there."

THE Wesleyans of the West of England are waking up to the necessity, from a denominational point of view, of providing middle-class education for girls. In providing for that of boys and overlooking the wants of the other sex they seem to consider they have reversed the natural, or at any rate the proper process, because the girls should have the first attention, having regard to the influence that woman has in the home. At a district meeting, representing Devon and a great part of Somerset, just held, a large committee representing every part of the district had the question under consideration. It was stated that they had two millions of worshippers in their chapels, but only about four thousand boys and girls in boarding schools under Wesleyan influence. It was resolved that the establishment of a Wesleyan Methodist middle-class boarding and day school for girls in the West of England is desirable, and that such a school, founded on the principle of the Methodist Middle-class Schools Committee, be commenced as early as possible.

It is not only Royalty that seeks to avoid the penalties of its position, when abroad, by travelling incognito. Mr. Herbert Spencer, who is now among the Catskills, is anxious to go about with as little chance of being worried to death by interviewers as possible. He is, therefore, sinking his personality, and is "unknowable" to the general public under the description given in hotel registers, "Mr. Lott and friend," Mr. Edward Lott being an English friend with whom he is travelling.

WE are afraid that Lord Justice Lindley will be regarded by some people, say Oxford or Cambridge examiners, as very reactionary and behind the times. And yet there will be many who will think that he said what has long been wanted to be said, when, in distributing the prizes to the successful candidates at the Cambridge Local Examination at Norwich on Saturday last, he not only deprecated "cramming," but objected to the high standard of examination which was too frequently set. At this examination questions had been put about the practical working of the Bank Charter Act of 1844 and the rates of interest and discount, and his lordship maintained that they were above boys of the age to whom they were submitted. A good many persons will think that their boys can be far better employed than studying such matters as these.

MRS. BESANT in the National Reformer gives the following striking account of an interview with Dr. Pusey at the time that she was struggling with theological difficulties:—"Personally, I have always felt for Dr. Pusey the very highest respect. As a girl I studied his writings, and by them was led to a careful study of those on whom all his thought was built. To him I owed my introduction to those curiously fascinating Confessions of Augustine, to the Commentaries on St. John's Gospel of Chrysostom, to the terrible denunciations of Tertullian, the arguments of Cyril and of Origen. Through that strange world he was my guide, and when my faith broke down it was to him I turned as my last hope of finding proof of the creed which my brain had rejected but to which my heart still clung. He bade me go to him to Oxford, and I travelled down, and with much inward trepidation found myself face to face with Dr. Pusey. Keen clear eyes, voice somewhat subdued, figure that seemed as if monk's frock and cowl would have suited it better than the cassock. The Deity of Jesus was the subject on which I had appealed to him; he shuddered at the very idea that that Deity should be challenged. Argument he would have none of; when I, doubtless too vehemently, urged my difficulties; 'Oh, my child! how passionate, how undisciplined!' he murmured. And at last: 'I will not argue with you; argument will only increase your pride of intellect.' Once only did he lose his calm and pitying tone of condemnation of the rebellion which dared to question 'your Judge,' and that was when I spoke of the inevitable result of my inquiry, if no proof could be found; namely, that I should leave the Church and acknowledge my heresy. He half rose from his chair: 'I command you to keep silence, at least, if you reject your Saviour; do not drag other souls to hell with you.' It was in vain that I urged to him my desire to find out what was truth, giving as proof the worldly loss my heresy would entail: 'Yes, you will lose everything,' he answered gloomily; 'your home here, and your soul in the world to come.' He told me to read nothing—'You have read too much'—to pray, to ask no questions, to accept and not to criticise. Advice useless and impracticable for one resolute at all hazards to find out what was true. I asked whether such action might not confirm a heathen in his error, and how, without inquiry, a Mahomedan could become a Christian. 'We have the truth,' he answered; as though that were not the very point in dispute. He wrote to me, after I left him, still urging only faith and prayer, and my last letter to him gave my final thought of our interview: 'I wanted light, and you told me to close my eyes.'

MRS. BESANT adds the following testimony to Dr. Pusey's personal character:—"A strong man and a good man. Utterly out of harmony with the spirit of his own time, looking with sternly-rebuking and condemning eyes on all the eager research, the joyous love of nature, the earnest inquiry into a world doomed to be burned up at the coming of its judge. An ascetic, pure in life, stern in faith, harsh to unbelievers, because sincere in his own cruel creed, generous and tender to all who accepted his doctrines and submitted to his Church. He never stooped to slander that with which he disagreed. His hatred of heresy led him not to blacken the character of heretics, nor to descend to the vulgar abuse used by pettier priests. And therefore I, who honour courage and sincerity wherever I find them, I, who do homage to steadfastness wherever I see it, I, Atheist, lay my small tribute of respect on the bier of this noblest of the Anglo-Catholics, Edward Bouverie Pusey."

By slow degrees the houses in London which were once the dwellings, or the resorts of famous men, are gradually disappearing. Under existing municipal arrangements it is scarcely to be expected that these old landmarks, as it were, should either be preserved, or even their historic character recorded. And yet one would like to see the same kind of thing done in the metropolis that has recently been done by the municipal authorities at Rome, who have, at the suggestion of the General Director of Telegraphs in Italy, placed the following inscription upon the house No. 17, Via del Prefetti:—"S. P. Q. R. In this house lived Samuel Finley Breese Morse from February 20, 1830, to January 5, 1831. He was the inventor of the Electric Telegraph. Born in Charlestown, April 22, 1791; died in New York, April 2, 1872." There are many men whose memory we should like to see kept fresh in this country; and this mode of doing it strikes us as at once simple and effective.

WHAT is an ideal school? In the instructions to H.M.'s inspectors of public and elementary schools "their lordships" give a picture of such a school, which, where it exists, they deem entitled to be marked as "excellent." Such a school "is characterised by cheerful and yet exact discipline, maintained without harshness, and without noisy demonstration of authority. Its premises are cleanly and well ordered; its time-table provides a proper variety of mental employment and of physical exercise; its organisation is such as to distribute the teaching power judiciously, and to secure for every scholar—whether he is likely to bring credit to the school by examination or not—a fair share of instruction and of attention. The teaching is animated and interesting, and yet thorough and accurate. The reading is fluent, careful, and expressive, and the children are helped by questioning and explanation to follow the meaning of what they read. Arithmetic is so taught as to enable the scholars not only to obtain correct answers to sums, but also to understand the reasons for the processes employed. If higher subjects are attempted, the lessons are not confined to memory work and to the learning of technical terms, but are designed to give a clear knowledge of facts, and to train the learner in the practice of thinking and observing. Besides fulfilling these conditions, such a school seeks by other means to be of service to the children who attend it. It provides for the upper classes a regular system of home exercises, and arrangements for correcting them expeditiously and thoroughly. Where circumstances permit, it has also its lending library, its savings bank, and an orderly collection of simple objects and apparatus adapted to illustrate the school lessons, and formed in part by the co-operation of the scholars themselves. Above all, its teaching and discipline are such as to exert a right influence on the manners, the conduct, and the character of the children; to awaken in them a love of reading, and such an interest in their own mental improvement as may reasonably be expected to last beyond the period of school life." Was the draftsman of these instructions here describing an actual existent school? or was he only drawing upon his imagination for his ideal? If such a model school exists, it would be interesting to know its locality.

THE Church Times hopes that at the Harvest Festival this year "the pulpit will everywhere resound with denunciations of the new deity which our scientists would put in the place of God, namely, the doctrine of cycles and averages." The failure of the hop harvest, we learn from the same precious authority, is owing to the recent agitation in Kent against special tithes:—"The sole exception [to a good harvest] is as regards the hops, which are a worse failure than can be remembered by the oldest inhabitants. The growers of that crop, unmindful of a most true saying of the rabbis that 'Tithes are bulwark of wealth,' have spent the year in an attempt to defraud the Church of her dues, and they find themselves with hardly any hops on which to pay tithe at all. Discite justitiam moniti!" So the Infinite Ruler of the universe is represented as specially interfering to show His displeasure with the agitation against an unjust impost, and punishing hop-growers and priests alike by withholding the crops on which they are to live! It is a question whether it is better to believe in such a God or no god at all. Fortunately we are not left to the alternative.

Was Milton a Unitarian? We learn from the Christian World that this question is discussed in a pamphlet "Milton as a Theologian (Milton Theologien), by M. Edgar Monod, a nephew of the late Adolphe T. Monod. Our contemporary says:—"The essay was recently presented to the Faculty of Protestant Theology of Montauban as the thesis of the author on seeking the degree of Bachelor of Theology. It is divided into three parts, the first of which gives a rapid glance at the period, the personality, and the writings of Milton; the second consists of an exposition of his theological opinions; and the third is an attempt to determine Milton's true place among theologians. M. Monod devotes considerable space to the discussion of the much-debated question whether or no Milton can be justly claimed by the Unitarians as one of themselves, and he contends with acuteness and discrimination that although the great poet was a declared opponent of the dogma of the Trinity, he cannot properly be regarded as Unitarian in his creed. He points out the difference between the idea of the person of Christ, held by Channing, 'the most illustrious representative' of Unitarianism, and the idea held by Milton; and insists upon the extreme importance of not confounding the dogma of the Trinity with that of the Divinity of Jesus Christ. The latter, it is urged, is an integral element of Christianity, while the former is not directly based on the text of Holy Scripture, but has been deduced therefrom by the labours of theologians, and has therefore only a relative importance. Milton, while rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity, distinctly accepted the doctrine of Christ's Divinity. Whether M. Monod's argument be regarded as conclusive or otherwise, the reader must acknowledge the skill, the force, and the finely sympathetic tone which characterise the essay as a whole." Whether Milton was simply an Anti-Trinitarian or an Arian, as we think he was, it may fairly be conceded that more of the popular theology of the present day is to be found in Milton's two poems "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained" than there is in the New Testament. Modern Unitarians can scarcely claim him as one of themselves.

We desire to call the special attention of our readers to the announcement in our advertising columns that Mr. Brooke Herford's highly popular "Story of Religion in England" is offered by the Sunday School Association to subscribers and schools at the low price of eighteenpence. The original publishing price was five shillings, and the Association is really conferring a great boon by placing so valuable a work within the reach of our teachers and elder scholars.

THE REV. M. J. SAVAGE in his book "The Morals of Evolution" tells the following story:—"When I was living at the West there was a lady who was a very zealous religionist. She was one of those who believe in perfection, and she was one of those who supposed that she had reached it; and a large part of the time she was engaged in attending perfectionist meetings and discussing the subject, and trying to get all her friends to be as perfect as she was. And I remember, one day, a friend of mine met her little boy, out at the knee and elbow, in the street, looking very dilapidated. He inquired where his mother was, and found that she was attending a perfectionist meeting somewhere. And then the boy gave a sigh, and said, 'And when papa comes home, and does not find the dinner ready, you just ought to hear him swear.' And I seriously question which was doing the most evil, she in attending perfectionist meetings under those circumstances, or he in swearing about it."

And now Mr. Spurgeon, in his terse, common-sense way, is saying much the same kind of thing:—"I have heard," he says, "that a woman who has 'a mission' makes a poor wife or a bad mother. This is very possible, and at the same time very lamentable; but the mission I urge is not all of this sort. Dirty rooms, slatternly gowns, and children with unwashed faces are swift witnesses against the sincerity of those who keep other vineyards and neglect their own. I have no faith in that woman who talks of grace and glory abroad and uses no soap at home."

SUNDERLAND.—Two excellent sermons in aid of the Sunday-school were preached on the 10th inst. by the Rev. James E. Stead, to good congregations. On the 11th the annual tea was held, after which a service of song, entitled "Her Benny," was given by the teachers and scholars. This service was much appreciated by all present. The usual complimentary resolutions concluded a very happy and useful meeting.

TROWBRIDGE.—On Sunday, September 17, the anniversary services of the Conigre Sunday-school were held, and were attended with marked success. In the evening the chapel was densely packed, the entrances to the chapel also being crowded, the aisles filled, and the vestries at the end of the building occupied. The sermons were preached by the minister, the Rev. J. Felstead, and were listened to with absorbed attention. Previous to the evening sermon sixteen of the elder scholars were presented with a Bible each, on being promoted to the Bible classes. The collection was £23 11s. 1d., this being a larger amount than that raised last year, although the collection of last year exceeded that of any former year.

TAUNTON.—Services in commemoration of the restoration of Mary-street Chapel were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. George Knight, of Gloucester, preached morning and evening, and delivered an address to the Sunday-school teachers and scholars and Bible classes in the afternoon. Collections were made at each service in aid of the restoration fund. On the following Monday the annual soiree was held, tea being served in the schoolrooms, and the public meeting succeeding in the chapel. The Rev. John Birks presided, and after the singing of a hymn made a few opening remarks, expressing his pleasure at the end of the war, with the hope that righteousness and peace might be the heritage of all nations. He also referred to the death of Dr. Pusey, and without accepting the theological doctrines connected with his ecclesiasticism, could most heartily appreciate the good he had done in the restoration of the fabric of the churches and the renewal of life and earnestness. They were met that evening to hold the anniversary of the restoration of their own church, and to join together in their annual soiree. He gave a most cordial welcome to all present, regretting the unavoidable absence of many good friends, and called upon Mr. Geo. Philpott, secretary of the congregation, to address the meeting. Mr. Philpott gave an abstract of the annual report, with particulars of the work of restoration so successfully carried out and so generally admired. The whole cost had been raised already by the congregation and friends, with the exception of about £50, which it was hoped might soon be forthcoming. The Rev. John Murray, of Ilminster, next gave a thoughtful address on the Christian Church as a beneficent power, referring to the letter of Dr. Martineau to the conference at Liverpool. He cordially congratulated minister and congregation upon the good work they had done and were hoping to do in their day and generation. The Rev. George Knight spoke of the beauty of their venerable house of prayer, now so admirably restored and adapted to the needs of the present age. He had been much pleased with the services on the Sunday, and with the meeting that night, and was greatly cheered with the manifestations on all sides of life and earnestness. The Chairman then called attention to the regular services of the church, the choir, day and Sunday schools, benefit society, provident society, band of hope, and other agencies connected with the congregation, asking for increased zeal in these and other directions for the promotion of the cause they all had at heart. Mr. C. Goodland, in an encouraging speech, proposed, and Mr. Dyer seconded, a vote of thanks to the ladies for preparing the tea, and to the choir for music. Mr. Philpott responded. Votes of thanks were heartily accorded to the Rev. George Knight, for his helpful services, and to the chairman.

Reviews.

The Faiths of the World. A Concise History of the Great Religious Systems of the World. Blackwood, Edinburgh and London. 1882.

It is one important result of the wider reading and broader culture of our time that the religions of the world are getting to be better known than ever before. Works like the one now before us—and they are numerous now—have contributed largely to increase our knowledge on this interesting subject. The researches of students and scholars have led to a new science—that of Comparative Theology—the study of which cannot fail to enlarge the mind, to correct ignorant misconceptions and dispel narrow prejudices and exclusive pretensions. These are the pernicious growths of popular ignorance, and no means of correcting them is so effectual as some acquaintance—the more full and careful the better—with the religious systems which in different ages and among different peoples have obtained the acceptance of mankind. When we find that there have been, and are still, several religions each of which has its countless multitudes of adherents, and that all, more or less, have certain features in common, it becomes impossible to advance exclusive pretensions on behalf of any. The old exclusive ground is cut away, and a broader, truer conception of religion takes its place. The volume now under review will assist in bringing about this desirable result. It consists of twelve lectures, constituting the second course of the St. Giles' Lectures, and are by eminent Scotch clergymen. A brief prefatory note informs us that they were delivered in St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, and in the Cathedral, Glasgow, on Sundays during the winter of 1881-82. Dr. Caird leads off with two lectures on the religions of India; the first taking up the Vedic period—Brahmanism, the second, Buddhism. He is followed by the Rev. George Matheson, D.D., whose subject is the religion of China: Confucianism. Next comes the religion of Persia: Zoroaster and the Zend Avesta, by the Rev. John Milne, M.A. Then we have the religion of Ancient Egypt, by the Rev. James Dodds, D.D. The Rev. William Milligan, D.D., Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen, follows with a lecture on the religion of ancient Greece. Dr. James MacGregor takes up in order the religion of ancient Rome. Next follows the Teutonic and Scandinavian religion. Dr. George Stewart Burns discusses that subject. The ancient religions of Central America form the subject of the next lecture, by the Rev. John Marshall Lang, D.D. Tenth on the list comes Judaism, by Dr. Malcolm Campbell Taylor, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Edinburgh. Then comes a lecture on Mahomedanism, by the Rev. James Cameron Lees, D.D., minister of St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, and one of her Majesty's chaplains. A lecture on Christianity in relation to other religions, by Dr. Robert Flint, professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh, brings the course to a close.

It will be seen from the above enumeration that the series is intended to cover in its broadest aspects the whole ground. Of course it is impossible in a single volume to do more than present the leading features of each system. The subject of each lecture is too vast for it to be considered fully in a single discourse. Still a distinct outline may be presented—a clear idea of what each system was may be given, and this is done in the volume before us. The inquiry opens up before us a chapter of human history, and an aspect of the human mind of the very deepest interest to us, that chapter and that aspect which deal specially with religion. One great merit of this book is its fairness. It is marked throughout by an endeavour to discuss fairly the great religions of the world, to estimate them from a scholar's standpoint without bigotry or prejudice. The writers may not be always successful, but this at least can be said, that their tone differs widely from the old style of dealing with the pagan religions. The old view regarded them as utterly bad, without any good points at all, undeserving of any favourable consideration, and having nothing in common with the Jewish and Christian religions.

This is not the point of view of these writers. They look at the subject in the light of modern knowledge and research, and in consequence their estimate is altogether more just and fair.

As we read these lectures the great religions of the world, Indian, Egyptian, Persian, Greek, Roman, Jewish, Mohammedan, Christian, pass under review; and "we seem to be gazing on a long procession of the supernatural, tricked out," it has been justly said, "in all manner of fantastic disguises—a masquerade of nature—powers, and gods and goblins and demons now vaguely majestic, and now coarsely grotesque, accompanied by symbols and ceremonials in the invention of which the wildest imagination might be held to have exhausted itself. As the strange array moves along with its ever shifting scenery and personages the interest is never allowed to flag, and when the last figure vanishes from the spectator's sight what more natural than that his pent up wonder should break forth in the demand, "What interpretation can be given of phenomena so weird and so full of perplexing mystery?" And the answer must be one that will include all. It must penetrate beneath the surface, and go down to the essential principles that underlie the endless variety of outward forms, for it is in their essential principles that the common ground of unity must be sought.

When we look around us and observe what different creeds and systems of belief are prevalent amongst men, and how conflicting, and even contradictory, in most points they are, we are at first inclined to believe that this very diversity shows that religious truth is really unattainable. What, it may be asked, are these many creeds and systems but so many varieties of error? In one sense they are, but in another and higher sense they are so many differing aspects of some central truth. The former is the first view we take, the latter is that we arrive at after careful and unprejudiced reflection. This is a view of the subject which it is encouraging to contemplate. As truth is the universal desire, so it is also, in some degree, the universal possession of the race. Every system of belief which has extensively prevailed in the world has had its foundation in reality. Every widespread error is the perversion of some truth—its exhibition through some distorting medium. In each creed or system there is a portion of truth widely different in degree, doubtless, but none is wholly without it. Indeed, it is this element of fact of reality which every system has contained, or been the means of teaching either directly or indirectly, that has been its vital principle, which sustained it in life and enabled it to maintain its position in the world. If it had not answered to some want in human nature, if it had not corresponded with something actual in our humanity, if it had not embodied something real, it could not have commanded extensive credence, or held sway for any length of time over the minds of men. In short, we may well believe that every sincere teacher who has appeared in the world, and earnestly sought after truth and attempted to reform and instruct his fellow men, has not been unsuccessful in his efforts. Along with many errors and fancies of his own he has taught much that is true and valuable, and which has permanently influenced mankind for good. Thus all the world's great teachers who have striven to serve faithfully in the cause of truth have been successful according to the light of their age, their several opportunities, their capacities of mind and means of knowledge. Especially is this true of the great founders of religions—Buddha, Confucius, Moses, Zoroaster, Mahomed, Christ—whose great religious ideas are briefly sketched in these interesting lectures.

Great credit is due to those who selected the lecturers and made the arrangements which have resulted in the publication of this volume. And it is a point deserving of special notice that these lectures were delivered in prominent churches on Sundays. This fact, we think, marks a great step in advance on the old ways. It might be followed with advantage by the Orthodox churches in England. It is one function of the Pulpit to instruct, and surely no subject comes better within the scope of its instruction than the religions which in different ages have prevailed in the world; and the relation of Christianity to the other faiths which have been held by mankind. We cordially welcome this work as an earnest attempt to supply this kind of instruction. It can hardly fail to enlighten the public mind on a matter about which a great amount of ignorance has hitherto prevailed; and in the degree in which it promotes this great purpose of popular enlightenment it cannot fail also to disarm prejudice, to lessen bigotry, to rebuke exclusive pretension, and to promote breadth and catholicity of thought and feeling on the great subject of the different faiths of the world.

C. F. B.

The Experimentum Crucis. By James Orr. Dublin: Falconer. 1882.)—Mr. Orr tells us that "the cause that prompted the publication of the above discourse was a correspondence that lately appeared in the Inquirer relative to the resurrection of Christ," and he adds elsewhere that "a strong and ever-increasing sympathy for some years with the Theist in his objections to the supernatural has never been able to divest his mind of a deep conviction that there is more than the light of a purely natural religion in the teachings, life, and history of Jesus of Nazareth." He regards "the cross of Calvary as the crucial test given us by Providence of the Divine Origin of Christianity;" with the cross closely connecting the miraculous narratives of the resurrection, which he evidently regards, notwithstanding critical objections, as historically true. Mr. Orr's position is not ours; but while we reject the miraculous element in the accounts of the origin of Christianity, not the less do we believe that Christ is the light and life in the world, the greatest of the Sons of God, that he has entered upon the immortality of which he had so assured a conviction, and that through his grand words and inspiring faith that larger hope has become a solemn reality to all his followers. For our own part we hold that these primary truths could not be strengthened by any marvellous incidents which are alleged to have occurred in an uncritical age nineteen centuries ago, and at the present time demand for belief in them is rapidly becoming a hindrance rather than a help to the reception of a spiritual Christianity. Mr. Orr writes with much fervour and acuteness, and his reasoning will be very effective to those who are already convinced.

Literary Notes.

The Pictorial World, which has just entered with spirit upon a new series, has commenced the issue in the form of weekly extra coloured supplements of portraits of the generals commanding Her Majesty's forces in Egypt. These supplements will be uniform with the portraits already issued of Sir Garnet Wolseley and Sir Beauchamp Seymour. With the new series Miss Braddon has commenced a new serial story entitled "The Golden Calf."

The birthplace of Whittier, near Haverhill, Massachusetts, has been rescued from decay, and is being preserved for future generations as a memorial of the Quaker poet.

A GRANITE memorial to Elihu Burritt, with only the inscription "Friend of Peace and Philanthropist," has been erected in the cemetery at New Britain, Connecticut.

THE unique copy of Caxton's "Four Sons of Aymon" is to be reprinted by permission of Earl Spencer, as part of the Early English Text Society's collection of English Chaucerian Romances. Mr. S. L. Lee will be the editor.

A COMMITTEE has been formed to promote the adoption of the Public Libraries Acts in Hull. Hull is the only town of its size in the kingdom that has not adopted the Acts.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have issued a fourth edition, revised and enlarged, of "The Soldier's Pocket Book for Field Service," by Sir Garnet J. Wolseley. The passages about newspaper correspondents at the seat of war remain unaltered. Sir Garnet adheres to his opinion that the effect of artillery fire is rather moral than physical.

THE Treasury has sanctioned the purchase from the heirs of the satirist of the original studies for "H.B.'s" celebrated caricatures. The price is £1,000 (not £2,000, as stated in the House by Mr. Walpole), to be paid when funds are available, no special grants being available in the present hard times.

THE author of "O'Hagan, M.P.," is engaged upon, and will shortly publish, a translation of Professor Mérimée's "Colombia."

MESSRS. CHAPMAN AND HALL have now in the press a new book by Mr. G. Baden-Powell, dealing with the problem of State interference in the domains of industry and commerce. The subject is treated by means of a variety of recorded results.

THE Academy hears that the Dublin University Press will shortly publish the first volume of a "Life of Sir W. Rowan Hamilton," by the Rev. A. P. Graves. Hamilton is best known as the inventor of quaternions, but in many respects he was a remarkable man. The forthcoming volume will give some interesting details of his childhood, which was no less precocious than that of J. S. Mill, but at the same time strong and joyous.

THE Home Journal of New York, which, since September, 1879, has taken the lead among American newspapers in introducing a reformed spelling, has issued a special supplement, on a very large sheet, giving the opinions of a great number of academical authorities in favour of the change. It appears that nearly two hundred journals and periodicals in America have now adopted more or less modification of the established spelling.

M. MIGNET, the veteran historian, who is now in his eighty-seventh year, has intimated his intention of resigning the office of permanent secretary to the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques. It is thought that M. Jules Simon will probably be chosen as his successor.

"POVERTY CORNER," the first volume of a cheap edition of Granville Fenn's works, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.

BRIDPORT.—The anniversary services in connection with the Sunday-schools were held on Sunday, the 10th inst., when able and eloquent sermons were preached by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Professor of Manchester New College. The congregations were large, both morning and evening, and the singing was well and efficiently rendered, showing that Mrs. Spencer, the organist, had bestowed much care in preparing the young people for these special services. A tasteful arrangement of flowers had been placed on the Communion table, and ivy was prettily used in decorating the pulpit. In the afternoon a number of friends of the school, and parents of the scholars, attended to hear an address to the scholars by the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, B.A., and also an address by Mr. Drummond, son of the preacher of the day. The latter gentleman's address was on "Work," and from the animated style of its delivery attracted much attention. On Monday evening the teachers, elder scholars, and friends of the school, to the number of seventy, sat down to a well provided tea, after which some little time was spent in conversation, and in listening to music. At eight o'clock the Rev. R. L. Carpenter took the chair, and expressed his pleasure at meeting them on so auspicious an occasion, remarking how gratified he was in having Dr. Drummond with them. Mr. W. Colfox, B.A., proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Drummond for the very excellent sermons he had given them on the previous day. He scarcely knew how to sufficiently express his thanks for these noble utterances, so full of thought, and so redundant with true feeling and liberal ideas. Mr. F. W. Matterface said that he cordially endorsed all that Mr. Colfox had said, and heartily seconded the vote of thanks, which was put by the Chairman and carried by acclamation. Dr. Drummond, in replying, said it afforded him much pleasure in being present. This was not his first visit to Bridport, as he well remembered being there some twenty-five years ago, and preaching his first sermon from their pulpit. As one who took much personal interest in Sunday-schools he would remark how desirable it was that these institutions should be devoted to the work of religious education, and so lift the children to a higher region of thought—to a more cultivated taste—and a more elevated and refined sentiment. Messrs. T. Ralls, T. Male, J. Golding, W. W. Male, Miss Gibson, and Mrs. Colfox made remarks during the evening on the work of the schools. The scholars number two hundred and ten. The collection amounted to about £7.

THE LATE PRESIDENT GARFIELD.—The Garfield monument to be erected in San Francisco will have at its base a seated and sorrowing figure, in bronze, of America, leaning on a sword. The sides of the pedestal hold eagles, the first guarding the emblems of war and commerce, and the second watching over the flag and shield of the country. The bronze statue of Garfield will be 10ft. in height, and the pedestal is inscribed "James A. Garfield, Strangulated pro Republica."

BRAHMOISM.

The Brahmo Public Opinion has an article on "Preaching Brahmoism to the Masses," which runs curiously parallel to our experience in this country:—

Properly speaking the Brahmo movement has been confined, up to this time, amongst the educated few. Men, who have received the light of education and in whom Western thought has worked some change, are our principal supporters. To the minds of the masses, the Brahmo Samaj is a civilised institution, something got up by the "Baboos,"—as the peasant and the trader calls the educated gentlemen,—and one of the fashions of the times. The wildest fancies are even now entertained in many places, with regard to this movement. The Brahmo Samaj is a place, it is said, where young men spoiled by English education assemble and freely indulge in forbidden food and drink. The object of their society is simply to encourage each other in all objectionable practices and in doing violence to the feelings and religious prejudices of their countrymen. The religious significance of the movement is not apparent to these good and simple people. They cannot bring themselves to believe that our actions are influenced by any spiritual aspirations or that we are really seeking the salvation of our souls.

There are two reasons of this popular misconception of our movement. In the first place, our preachings and discourses, our forms of service and other accompaniments of worship, are so foreign to their tastes, and so high above their capacities, that they do not appreciate much of them. They mutely watch the proceedings, wondering and speculating, and in the end leave our places of worship, perhaps with some feeling of admiration, but with no better spiritual enlightenment than they previously had. Secondly, our manner of preaching, the way in which our missionaries live and move about, are a little foreign to their notions and tastes. The missionary, when visiting different stations, spends much of his time with the "Baboos," is decently clad, and rides in coach and two, in company with a number of educated men. His open air address of the other evening may have created a spirit of inquiry in some honest, simple heart, but the poor man finds the speaker encircled by "Baboos" and does not dare to approach him, and the spirit of inquiry dies in his bosom.

From the above it is manifest that in order to reach the masses we must (1) take care to present our faith to them in a form agreeable to their tastes, and suited to their capacities; and (2) appoint a class of Missionaries, who will be positively Missionaries of the people who will live and move amongst them, full of self-sacrifice and zeal, sympathising with all their trials and sufferings, helping them with friendly advice, taking interest in all their little cares and simple enjoyments, poorly clad and living on their simple and homely diet.

It may be argued by some that the theology of the Brahmo Samaj is too philosophical for the conception of the ignorant masses, consequently Brahmoism has very little chance of being a religion of the masses. We do not think our philosophy is more abstruse or more mystical than the mysterious doctrine of the Christian Trinity, yet have masses of people believed in that Christian doctrine and have filled the ranks of the philosophers. The doctrines of predestination and election are no less metaphysical in their nature, and yet have large masses of men believed in them. The chief thing to be borne in mind in this connection is that we must offer the truths, coined and fashioned, to their faith, giving them only such reasons as are tangible to their unenlightened intellects. We tell a little boy that the earth is round, and we adduce only such proofs as are intelligible to his little faculties; we do not present, for instance, those higher and astronomical reasons which established it in the mind of a Newton or of a Galileo. It is sufficient for our purposes if the boy grows up with the conviction that the earth is round and not flat. Let us follow the same method in addressing the people and we shall succeed.

In the world there are 34,274 newspapers and periodicals, with a circulation of 10,592,000,000.

THE EGYPTIAN QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your correspondent "H. J. S." speaks as if he had read the parliamentary papers on the Egyptian Question, yet I find it difficult to understand how anyone who has done so can possibly regard Scawen Blunt's article in the Nineteenth Century as deserving of less regard than you paid it in your leader of last Saturday week; nor can I understand how anyone who has read those papers can doubt that the war we have just been engaged in was a stock-jobbers' and bondholders' war. Mr. Gladstone is to be judged like other men, by his deeds first, and by his words only in so far as they explain his deeds, not in so far as they contradict them. I should have thought that the Inquirer was above the suspicion of holding Mr. Gladstone in insufficient reverence; and at any rate I should like to be allowed to subscribe myself as one of those, be they few or many, who not only refrain from condemning, but heartily respect and sympathise with your leader of Saturday week.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am not about to controvert the somewhat questionable argument of your correspondent "H. J. S." for take whichever side we may as to the necessity of the war, I think we may reasonably entertain the desire that the Government should act humanely towards the fallen rebel leader. We owe much ourselves, as a nation, to two rebellions against the constituted authority of the country, and we are accustomed and rightly so, to regard Cromwell as a patriot, and to speak of the rebellion of 1688 as the "Glorious Revolution." Many Englishmen, however, seem to forget this to-day in their fierce cry for vengeance, or in their parrot-like prattle about the future of Egypt and the necessity of making our work complete so as to prevent the recurrence of any danger to "our interests" in the East at any future time.

It is quite possible that Arabi may not be so much of a patriot as Cromwell or those noble men who paved the way for the Prince of Orange. One thing, however, is certain: he has not been so successful, and this to many is the measure of his guilt. Had he succeeded, more especially if his course had not run counter to "our interests," they would have been ready to crown him with the laurel wreath of patriotic worth and distinction. I cannot help thinking, indeed, that to act upon the advice of the Spectator and the Times, and sacrifice the life of Arabi, would be a foul stain upon the honour of England. For, as the Standard led the way on the 16th inst., "we have not a particle of evidence that associated him with the firing of Alexandria, and he is, therefore, a prisoner of war like another. We shall be told he is a rebel against the Khedive. It will possibly be easy for Arabi, if he chooses, to prove the collusion equally of the Khedive and of the Sultan with him, at some time or other. He is now in our hands, and our honour requires that he should be treated as a general who has failed. . . . He had his views about Egypt, and he tried to carry them out. They clashed with ours, and he, being the weakest, has gone to the wall. There is no sentiment about this; but at least there is no hypocrisy, and it leaves us to enjoy our victory without forcing us to treat Arabi as a criminal." Such is the opinion of a Tory journal which has never condemned the war. Happily the Daily News, which spoke strongly against intervention in its earlier stages, was not far behind in urging that the Government ought to act with clemency towards the fallen leader, and not treat him as a criminal or as a rebel who merits death from the exigencies of military law. Admitting with the Standard that there is no "relevant evidence" to connect him with the burning of Alexandria, the Liberal journal goes on to say that his complicity in the massacre of the 11th of June, "which was not specially directed against his opponents, is equally doubtful," and that to speak of death as the punishment for his revolt "seems to us as ridiculous as it is bloodthirsty."

It is to be hoped this opinion will prevail. I am not in a position to judge what the bulk of your readers may have thought of the war or how they regard Arabi. But whether they admit, with the Daily News, "That there is such a thing as a National Party in Egypt is now acknowledged by many who formerly repudiated the idea," or not, it seems to me that as a denomination we should earnestly strive to promote a spirit of humaneness and clemency. Not that the Government are at all likely to add cruelty to what I conceive has been injustice, but I think the intelligent Liberals of the country ought to let their voice be heard on the subject, and not even seem to acquiesce in the cruel doctrine of the Spectator and the Times.

THE CRANBROOK CHAPEL.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the columns of a local journal, and under the head of Cranbrook, I read the following:—"We understand that the General Baptist Chapel in this town, which has been closed for some years past, is about to be re-opened for public worship. The building is a handsome and commodious structure, situate at the upper part of the High-street, and there is a small endowment attached to the cause. In former days a number of persons of position and influence in the parish attended the services then held there."

This, in fact, refers to the Unitarian Chapel; and another journal expressly speaks of the event as the "Re-opening of the Unitarian Chapel." Can any of your readers throw light on the matter? I have not heard that our body are about to re-open the building. Is this another instance of a chapel with endowment passing into the hands of the Orthodox?

SENTINEL.

THE MINISTERS' AUGMENTATION FUND.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your article last week on "The Liverpool Conference" or rather that portion of it which related to the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Scheme, has suggested to my mind one or two considerations which you will perhaps allow me to state. In your second suggestion as to the mode of applying any fund of the kind which may be provided, you say "That grants in aid should be proportionate to real efficiency of service." This suggestion, I take it, refers not merely to the pulpit power and pastoral aptitude a minister may possess, but to the time he has been in charge of a congregation.

It is to me a most regrettable fact that many of our congregations estimate the pecuniary value of the services of their minister by one standard, and by that almost exclusively. If they happen to hear him spoken of by others somewhat scornfully as a Unitarian "preacher" they are disposed to resent it as an insult. And yet it is simply as a preacher they themselves regard him. Is he a good preacher, they ask; can he keep the pews well filled, in other words will he draw? If he can do this it matters little whether he has borne the heat and burden of the day for twenty years, or whether he is fresh from college. If he does not possess popular power, however high his other qualifications may be, or however many years he may have been in charge of a congregation, they will have nothing to do with him if they can help it, and if driven to this it is a starvation salary they will offer him.

Surely, Sir, this should not be. The moral qualifications which are the result of experience and the moral claims of long years of service ought not to be thus disregarded. With all the defects of the Church of England she cannot be reproached with putting curates fresh from their ordination into good independent positions, while those who have grown grey in her service are left to comparative poverty on an ordinary curate's pay. She insists upon all her young ministers having a "title" to serve under an older one before she allows them to enter her ranks by ordination. If something of the sort existed among ourselves the difficulty of getting domestic missionaries would vanish, and the state of things to which I have referred would be rendered impossible.

The fact is, we require more organic unity in the denomination. I am aware that the members of our richer congregations give very largely toward the support of the poorer ones. But this is not enough, because it is done in an unsystematic manner. We need some general scheme of administration, by means of which the wealth of the denomination might be more equitably distributed for the good of the whole, and the services of second and third rate men properly rewarded. It is to be hoped that the Augmentation Scheme, if actually launched, will do something toward meeting this want by making grants dependent upon the years of service as well as pulpit efficiency. It might be difficult in some cases to draw the line of justice, but manifestly it would be easy to determine whether a minister had been ten or fifteen years in charge of a separate congregation, and, other things being fairly equal to act accordingly.

NEMO.

DUKINFIELD.—The annual parents' party was held on Saturday last. Being the first meeting in connection with the school held since the completion of the new building it had been looked forward to with much interest by the parents and friends of the scholars. The interval between the tea meeting in the old school, when upwards of three hundred people took tea, and the public meeting later on, was pleasantly spent in inspecting the new premises, which were thrown open for that purpose. At the evening meeting the Rev. Hamilton Vance, B.D., took the chair, and was supported on the platform by Messrs. James H. Brooks (Monton), John Heys (Manchester), John Jackson and Thomas Cotterill (Stalybridge), E. B. Broadrick and A. A. Cheetham, two of the school directors, Moses Wilde, and the Revs. P. M. Higginson, M.A., and F. H. Jones, B.A. A choir, composed of teachers and scholars, and led by Mr. Moorhouse, gave glees at intervals in good style. Mr. Vance in his opening remarks, replying to several objections, supposed or real, to dancing and other amusements in connection with a "social union" recently set agoing in the school, gave the tone to many of the speeches of the evening. Mr. Higginson spoke at considerable length on the same topic. Mr. John Heys made a long speech on Sunday-school work in general. Mr. Jones spoke on the responsibility of parents and teachers in the training of the young, especially to the need of cultivating the virtue of "patience," and showed how many valuable lessons grown up people might learn by observing with what patience and perseverance young children will pursue an object they have set their minds on. Mr. John Jackson spoke on the well-worn and nearly exhausted subject of "Competitive Examinations in Sunday-schools," which he advocated for strongly, as tending to method and system in teaching. Messrs. James H. Brooks and Shirley gave during the evening interesting and amusing readings, and a fairly successful meeting was concluded with the acting of two scenes from Pizarro.

REPLY POST-CARDS.—The Postmaster-General gives notice that on and after the 1st of October next double or reply inland post cards, bearing an impressed half-penny stamp on each portion, will be sold to the public at all post-offices at the following prices:—Stout Cards.—One for 1½d., two for 2½d., three for 4d., four for 5½d., five for 6½d., six for 8d., and 6s. 8d. for a parcel of sixty. Thin Cards.—One for 1½d., two for 2½d., three for 3½d., four for 4½d., five for 6d., six for 7d., and 11s. 8d. for a parcel of one hundred and twenty. The reply cards will not be sold in sheets like the single cards. These cards will only be available for transmission between places in the United Kingdom. The regulations laid down in regard to single post-cards will be equally applicable to reply post-cards.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—In general debility, nervous excitement, and mental depression, these unrivalled Pills have a marvellous effect. They have won the confidence of millions in all parts of the civilised world. Constitutions shaken by long residence in unwholesome climates, by sedentary habits, overwork, worry, or anxiety, are wonderfully renovated by a course of this extraordinary medicine, which, powerful as is its action on the whole system, is perfectly harmless to the tenderest frame. The Pills are composed of rare and carefully selected balsams, without the admixture of any mineral whatever, or other deleterious substance. They operate directly, powerfully, and beneficially upon the whole mass of blood. The most sceptical cannot question the fact when we see indigestion cured, liver complaint arrested, the oppressed lungs brought into healthful play, and every physical function renewed and strengthened by their agency.

The Liberal Pulpit.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

The following sermon was preached in St. Mary's Church, Nottingham, on Wednesday morning, by the Rev. J. Maurice Wilson, M.A., Head Master of Clifton College, on the occasion of the opening of the Social Science Congress.

Titus iii. 8:—"This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto all men."

The preacher said there is, we may be sure, but one ruling thought in our minds at this moment, the relation of social science to religion. This congregation is a witness that such a relation is believed to exist. By the first of these two factors we mean to include all that may be learned by history and observation as to the nature and conditions of social and national well-being, the result of methodical inquiry into economical and sociological phenomena; and finally the enactment of laws, those restraints which an intelligent community, having attained freedom, proceeds to impose and enforce on itself for its own good. The second is a phenomenon and factor in life hitherto universal, the power of religion. It has always been a great power in social life, and its standard, though perhaps not its influence, has always been rising and never falling. It is based on human nature itself, man's necessary relation to the infinite, to the supernatural, to God. Now it is not necessary that there should be any relation or co-operation between these two great powers. Social science might be toiled for from scientific or utilitarian motives with as little religious feeling as chemistry. Religion might be a purely speculative or a purely personal matter: either an abstract philosophy, or the sense of individual sin, forgiveness, salvation. An illustration of this separation, full of instruction for us, may be found in the second and third centuries of our era in Rome. In that age may be seen the work of a Social Science Association as great, as wise, as unselfish, as powerfully patronised, as any association in our day. It was the age of the great Stoic politicians, to whom are due the genius and humanity of Roman law. Simultaneously, but existing wholly apart, may be seen the religious individualism of the Christianity of that age, which disregarded politics and economics; whose maxim was to obey the de facto government; which preached resignation, not amelioration; which occupied itself more with the next world than with this. These two factors existed then and may still exist, without relation to one another. But this separation tends to paralyse both. For each supplies something that the other lacks. Assuredly they must be united before the kingdom of God can come. The pursuit of science is with some few men a species of worship: the passion for truth, the presence of the infinite, the reverence it brings, are almost a religion. And it might be assumed that social science and legislation, with its keen human and moral interests, would be the most religious of sciences. Nevertheless, it is not necessarily so. It involves the danger of treating men as instruments, as means; not as moral beings, as ends. It may harden, not deepen. And what power does it possess to create motive? To know the best course is one thing; but how is the will of the social reformer to be braced to the necessary toil? The root of volition is not knowledge, but feeling. How are we to get to feel as we know? Social science needs then a motive outside itself. Isolated it dies, as stoicism died, not wholly ineffectual, but disappointed, despairing. It is more important to remark that religion suffers no less where it is divorced from life. And it suffers from this cause among us now and throughout Christendom. It is too much of an affair of Church and opinions and mysteries, and of conventional believing for believing's sake; too little the sympathetic beneficence of an active life in the world. Busy men, and the best men and women are busy, find that what is by others called religion is crowded out, and that their high social aims are viewed with suspicion. Many a noble heart drifts into what is called irreligion, drifts into a contempt for religion, because the religion presented to it is so unworthy, so unaggressive, so subjective.

Now, the truth that I am here to proclaim is that these two powers must work in closest alliance. Religion will contribute the motive, the love; the infectious, undenyng zeal that springs from Christ.

Science the method, the sphere. This is, I am sure, the line of progress along which we are moving and may move faster, and on which we may find a cure for some of the evils which we deplore. This is something worth living for. This is why we meet here to-day. This combination offers a key to some yet unsolved problems in the life of individuals. Here perhaps is to be found the object of our boasted individual freedom. Freedom for each man to think, and speak, and act as he will is ever growing. But to what purpose? Freedom is a means, not an end. This is, I suppose, Mazzini's meaning in his great saying that it is no longer rights but duties that the social reformers must preach. Social science has become religious. Here, too, is the cure for aimlessness, for melancholy, perhaps even for cynical worldliness. Here is an aid to purity and simplicity. In such a combination may also be found the solution of some speculative problems that tease us. A man learns himself by action, not by self-observation. "Do thy duty," as Goethe said, "and thou shalt know what is within thee." Obedience and love, as Christ tells us, bring an unexpected insight into divine things. Here, too, you may find Christ, if you never found Him before, where so many of the most deeply religious spirits of our time are finding Him, men and women who in past centuries would have sought Him in monasteries and convents. He lived on earth with the outcast, the suffering, the poor; and there you will still find Him, though you may have sought Him in vain in the homes of the rich, or in books of devotion.

Believe it, 'tis the mass of men He loves,
And where there is most sorrow, and most want,
Where the high heart of man is trodden down
The most, there most is He: for there is He Most needed.

Again, the same combination may solve some problems of society. One great evil of our age is the width of the breach between classes in our cities, and England consists of cities. The wedge of separation is daily being driven home by natural causes, which, left to themselves, will widen the breach and ruin the nation. Social science has to find a cure for this, a cure by prevention, no revolution. And in such a work religion is her best ally. Religion could at once put a hand across the breach from both sides; it teaches the true brotherhood of men in Christ; gives men faith in God; teaches the rich that wealth is a splendid trust, and the poor that poverty is not ignoble. Religion alone, and I mean by that the love of God alone, could support such workers as Oberlin and Edward Denison, as Mary Carpenter and Octavia Hill, and others of that noble band, known or unknown to fame, who have served and are serving God in the service of their fellows, and are the salt of the earth. But it is not less true that this combination of social science and religion is the one condition for the permanence and true life and growth of social science. Social science is ultimately based on some philosophy. It may be utilitarian and agnostic; it may be theologic and Christian. The real danger of the students and professors of this science is that they should limit their views to practical utilities and convenience, and should study phenomena alone, and not endeavour to base their action on a real philosophy, and to guide it with a view to some high aim. This high aim, the recognition and extrication of the spiritual and divine element in man, lost and smothered, as it may seem, in evil, is the only worthy and permanent aim. Materialistic and evolutionary philosophies have for the time, perhaps, obscured this divine, supernatural element in the sociological philosophy, or shaken confidence in it. But, nevertheless, this truth is the foundation of all social philosophy, and therefore of that social methodical action which we call social science. Utilitarianism can never be the basis of vigorous social action. Men will judge of their own interests; and the interest of the nation and the race in the long run often conflicts with the interest of the individual in the short run. But the fundamental belief of religion that man is made in the image of God, and the belief that Christ is our Restorer and Saviour, the proof to us that love and self-devotion are essential elements of the divine, and therefore of the highest human character, these are the only permanent springs of consistent endeavour to bring about the coming of the kingdom of God. In the same combination is the hope of the Church. We must never lose the hope of attaining a less sectarian Christianity. Christianity, with all its denominations, as it exists in England, or English speaking countries, does not fulfil the mind of Christ. Let us insist on this. We are not one in spirit. We have not got the true perspective of duties. Variety of opinion, dissent, is a sign, and healthy sign, of earnestness; but bitterness, discord, exaggeration of differences, angry exclusiveness, ought to diminish. Now this result may be aimed at in two ways; one is by arguing about the unimportance of points of difference, and endeavouring to produce amalgamation on points of agreement. This is hopeless. The other and more hopeful way is to forget for a while the points of difference in a great enthusiasm, and thus learn by practice the points of agreement. And experience proves that the enthusiasm for social amelioration, the infection of a grand aim, are strong enough to make Christians of all denominations work together. Any great aggressive philanthropic movement, the abolition of slavery, the promotion of temperance, the protection of women and children, the relief of great temporary local distress, does in fact bring men on the same platform, and give them mutual respect, who will meet in no other way. This is one of the signs of the times. And we surely cannot doubt that for many ages past Christianity has too little aimed at the improvement of social conditions. It soon began to regard the earth as but a lodging place; it forgot that the kingdoms of this world, as well as the kingdom of the next, were to become the kingdom of Christ. It is the old charge of want of patriotism. "They dwell on earth, but they are citizens of heaven," was said of the Christians of the second century. But in remembering that Christ came to save, we need not forget that he came also to heal and to fill with brotherly love, and that this was the sign of his Messiahship to which he appealed. We are too much haunted by the mediæval unchristian opposition between secular and religious. We dare not boldly say, though few will deny, that the first religious duty of a community is to make the conditions of life for every member of it such that he may arrive at the best of which he is capable. That this truth has begun to be whispered is another sign of the times. When this truth takes possession of us it will be a new departure. A new departure of some sort is imminent. The only question is in what direction are we to work for it. I believe it is in the direction of social science pursued in a religious spirit. For if Christianity moves along this line it will find itself in the first place reinforced by the irresistible democratic movement of the age. The deeply seated inherited religious feeling of the industrial classes in England, their faith and trust in God, their wonderful patience, sympathy, hope, are still, in spite of all discouraging signs, the basis of a national religion and a National Church. If Church Christianity had in it more of these practical elements of faith and love, and less of a routine and a sentiment which seem to the poor to sanction unlimited class isolation and personal selfishness, and which are in fact so terribly frivolous and unchristian, then it would be no more possible to overturn our National Church than to upset a pyramid resting on its base.

In the second place, the appearance of direct collision between religious faith and materialistic philosophy would be evaded; they would be seen to be moving on different lines. It is true that the materialist and the Christian must always differ toto cælo in opinion; but a contest about opinion would be seen to be of secondary importance as compared to the Christlike and truth-loving life; and the life of the true Christian, as well as the life of Christ himself, will never fail to command the honour and love of the materialist. He will judge the tree by the fruits. In the third place, Christianity would co-operate with the sociological forces of the age. The age of struggling for liberty is nearly over in England, as in America. Some few rights have yet to be won; but the far more important question is now pressing upon the Anglo-Saxon race. What use shall be made of liberty? Unrestrained liberty tends to widen the breach between rich and poor; it concentrates advantages on the strong, and disadvantages on the weak. Now it is the aim of the statesman, the social reformer, and of the Christian alike to secure favourable conditions for the physical, moral, and intellectual development of every individual. We know that this can be done only by a free people imposing restraints on itself. This is the present more or less distinctively seen programme of statesmen, whether they call themselves Liberals or Conservatives. It is yours to convince the intellect as to the nature and need of such restraints. It is ours to show that this replacement of rights by duties is a part of religion; to induce men for the love of God and their brethren to embrace and to insist on such restraints, to make morality keep pace with freedom. We must work together, neither distrusting the other. Thus alone can a free society make progress; for a nation may perish from excess of misdirected freedom. Freedom must be won only to be sacrificed to higher aims. Would that every rank in our nation were penetrated with this truth.

I know what will be said by some who hear or read these words. They will say, "You sacrifice all that is distinctive in Christianity, and then tell us that it can co-operate with science and with the other great forces of the world. But Christianity is and ever will be in antagonism with the world. Christianity is a body of doctrine entrusted to the Church of Christ as her sacred deposit to teach men how to save their souls; it is this, she must guard and preach; mere philanthropy is a Christianity without Christ, and without the ordinances of the Church. In other words it is not Christianity. You are trying to make men good by Acts of Parliament." If this, or any reply like this, is either fair or true, judge ye. Others again, from an opposite camp, will say, as was said to me the other day, "I am incapable of thinking the Church anything but an obstruction to social science: it is based on principles I cannot accept, barred by tests I cannot submit to." Is then this co-operation a dream? No: it is not a dream. I believe it is coming. There is a Christianity which may yet bring back the religious spirit into daily life, a Christianity which consists in devotion to the ends for which Christ died, the union, the regeneration, the purification of the world. How can any one doubt who believes in the Holy Spirit of God, and in His presence among us? This co-operation might excite a fresh enthusiasm from all quarters; from ourselves the clergy, who are no less influenced by the time-spirit than other men, and are almost ready to say that the most Christ-like life now is to do as He did; to be silent on matters of opinion and apply ourselves to the personal, social, and moral needs of our people, and lead them to our Father in Heaven. It would surely call out fresh enthusiasm from our devout communicants, who week by week or month by month devote themselves to God's service. "What are you ready to do?" might be the question put to every communicant, as it is already the question put to every adult member of some American churches. It might recruit the ranks of our clergy with the men who need this vent for their practical energy and devotion. It would open fresh possibilities to that large mass of our fellow-countrymen who see no middle course between materialism and sacerdotalism, which lead to anarchy and revolt; and who would see in this development the natural outgrowth of the best side of Protestantism, and the natural reaction against its worst; a Protestantism embracing as frankly the historical criticism and the science of the present as it embraced the revival of learning in the past, and once more including in its ranks the representatives of highest thought. It is a religion which reminds us more of the prophetic and apostolic ideals than of the mediæval and modern; it does not require us to make a sharp contrast between things secular and sacred, things natural and supernatural; it does not require us to turn our backs on the world to look at God, or on God to look at the world. It does require modesty in its ministers. It does require the "fruits of the Spirit" in all. Surely the time is ripe for such a growth; surely the hour is at hand when the hope of the age shall find a voice in prophet and poet and priest and people, and the world shall wake to its great inheritance in the Gospel of Christ. To preach such a Christianity we need the help of associations like yours. It is not ignorant and uncombined philanthropical views, nor more charity sermons than are needed, or more so-called charity, but the utilisation of our ministry to enable Christian communities to co-operate for their highest well-being, the scientific organisation and direction of religious zeal.

But it is time to conclude; and I will only say one word more. Aim high, and never despair. There is plenty to do on the largest scale: education, land laws, drink laws, prostitution, vagabondism. But it would be presumptuous in me to attempt to enumerate. Let no private right be pleaded as an excuse for public wrongs. For private rights compensation can be found. There is none for a public wrong. Let no one think that our present shameful condition is inevitable; it is the result of our past and present laws. It is our duty to protect the weak. The helpless and the poor cannot protect themselves against ignorance, vice, ill sanitation, overwork, tyranny. The study of other countries will help to point out the causes of the evil; it is yours to find them out, and to blazon them abroad with the utmost publicity in your power, and to persevere until they are remedied. Never despair. I know that it is heart-breaking to

Haggle with prejudice for pennyworths
Of that reform which your hard toil will make
A common birthright of the age to come.

But this endurance and faith and chivalry is the special virtue of a social reformer, and without it you are talkers and no more. And let each one carry into effect in his own person this identification of religion and work for others. Let him do something for his city, his parish, nay, for one street, one household. Give something more than money; your time, your thought, your love. You are not called on to reform the world; you are called on to do something for your neighbours, to show that you have the spirit of Christ. It is a pleasure to me to utter these words of hopefulness in Nottingham, for I know no city in the country which is more enlightened, more public spirited. You have done something. But you know, better than I can know, what work has yet to be done before you can think or speak without sorrow and shame of the condition—social and religious—of thousands upon thousands in this place. But this work may be done; and it is a glorious sight to see Nottingham welcoming the students of social science within the walls of her grand old church of St. Mary's; a triple alliance of common sense and science and religion in the cause of patriotism and humanity. Finally, let us pray for God's blessing on this meeting, that it may be marred by no jealousies or thought of winning fame, but that love to God and man may rule in your hearts, and that the Holy Spirit may guide all your counsels to the glory of God in the well-being of man.

BOLTON DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this Association was held on Saturday, September 16, at Walsley, near Bolton. The day was fine and the attendance good. Divine service was conducted by the Rev. H. B. Smith, of Darwen, and a vigorous and timely sermon was preached by the Rev. P. Vancesmith, M.A., of Hindley. Taking for his text John xiii. 13, the preacher made a strong appeal in behalf of real discipleship with Christ. It might be that a new science had been born, which bade men to look within more than without, and that criticism showed that Christianity, though the best and grandest, was but one of many faiths. But discipleship with Christ had not been rendered obsolete. The form of it only had been changed. We might claim an affection for Christ as deep and true, considered as a prophet and holiest saint, as if we viewed him in the strange fancy of half man, half God, neither God nor man. The final acceptance of Christ as a master must be in the moral and spiritual part of our nature. In our search and spiritual truth we must bow to Christ's authority. We were not to up to him, and if we waited we should be brought to understand and appreciate him. To those who lost their faith in Christ, he (the preacher) could only say "seek." Having made Christ our pattern in our struggles, we were yielding our will to Christ and showing ourselves true followers of his. Might we fairly earn the title of Christian—the noblest, highest, worthiest that could be borne.

After the service tea was partaken of in the schoolroom, and the meeting was held. The chair was taken by Mr. ARTHUR GREG, of Eagley, who observed that the Association was fifty-six years old, and served to bring members of different congregations occasionally into friendly communication with each other. It also served to bring the laity into communication with the ministers of whom they saw but little except in the pulpit.

The Rev. GEORGE FOX, the secretary, read the minutes of the last meeting and the financial statement.

The Rev. P. VANCESMITH, M.A., spoke to the sentiment "Our Presbyterian Forefathers and other Modern Representatives." He said we had as noble an ancestry as the Church of England. Reviewing the history of the Puritan movement, he asked what was the distinguishing characteristic of our forefathers. He did not think it was their Presbyterianism, nor their doctrinal opinions, nor their steadfastness in bearing persecution; but the wonderful freedom of their religious thought. It was this freedom of religious thought to-day which could justify our possession of their honoured name. This freedom should be left to others, too, to form their own opinions.

Mr. J. W. CROMPTON, of Rivington, spoke on the same subject. He felt it an honour to be descended from a good Puritan stock. He saw one of the first germs of the subsequent Unitarianism of the Presbyterians in the action of Oliver Heywood's father, who, when the clergyman at the baptism of the infant Oliver was about to pronounce the Trinitarian formula, drew back the child. He considered that the secession of the Two Thousand saved the body of Presbyterians from extinction. A complaint was made that there were many Unitarians in the popular churches who remained there and would not come to our chapels. We could not expect to retain a monopoly of Unitarianism. Our difficulty was to keep ever in the van. If we left our freedom and determined to fix the limits of our truth we should fail. He did not much regret the paucity of our congregations; it braced the nerves. We did not need so many props as those in other denominations. He observed that Unitarian principles were spreading rapidly in other bodies. Our position was a unique one, and there was a great future before us if we refused still to be trammelled by creeds.

Mr. J. C. HOLLINS spoke to the sentiment "The Bolton District Unitarian Association." He felt the need of sympathy, and could not agree with "paucity" as being bracing. It was right to spread their views. He therefore did not believe in allowing the outlying congregations to die out. He did not endorse the view that our religion was more from the head than the heart. Were we as Unitarians in the front as we ought, in relation to the great social questions of the day? He thought, in the matter of intemperance, with honourable individual exceptions, as a body, we had not done our duty. Here there was a pressing call upon us.

Mr. ISAAC BARROW also briefly spoke on the same subject.

A vote of thanks was given to the preacher and supporter, which was acknowledged by the Rev. H. BODELL SMITH, who spoke on the means of reaching the people, with special reference to the recent successful camp meetings in North-East Lancashire.

The choir sang during the evening several pieces, and the usual votes of thanks were passed to the Chairman for his services, and to the Walmesley congregation for their hospitable reception of the meeting.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—On Wednesday afternoon, at five o'clock, the forthcoming session was opened by an address from the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A., theological tutor. The session begins with three new students, as we announced last week, viz., Messrs. Jones, Cowan, and Turner. During the holidays the hall has undergone many alterations. It has been repainted and decorated, and the ventilation has been much improved. There was a good attendance of visitors, including many former students and several ladies. The number of students is ten including the Gaskell and Owens scholars, three being of the first year. The subject of the address was "Present Conditions and Recent Results of Old Testament Study." The lecturer briefly noted the changes which had given a new interest to the Hebrew literature, in connection with the growth during the present century of the faculty of appreciating ancient history, and the discovery of the manifold links which connect the history of Israel with that of other nations. This history now presents almost a modern aspect. Israel has not only points of external contact, but of internal similarity, with other nations. A line of natural development now marks the course of her religious progress, and criticism of the Old Testament writings now reveals, instead of strange alternations of enthusiasm for Jehovah and entire abandonment of him, a continuous spiritual and moral growth. The lecturer concluded by drawing attention to recent discussions as to the origin and character of Jewish Monotheism, maintaining that the chief endowment of the Hebrew people lay rather in their keen apprehension of religion as a moral power, than in their special, or specially developed, conception of the Divine Being.

Obituary.

THE LATE DR. PUSEY.

Dr. Pusey died at Ascot Priory on Saturday last. He passed quietly away in the presence of his brother, his daughter, and of his grandson, the Rev. J. E. Brine, who had been summoned to Ascot. The Rev. Edward Bouverie Pusey, who was born in 1800, was a son of the late Hon. Philip Bouverie, and assumed the name of Pusey by Royal license. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. (1st class Lit. Hum.) in 1822, was elected to a fellowship at Oriel College, and took his degree of M.A. in 1825. In 1828 he was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford, to which is attached a canonry at Christ Church. Dr. Pusey was one of the principal contributors to the "Tracts for the Times," and in 1843 he was suspended from the office of preaching before the University on account of a sermon on the Holy Eucharist. Dr. Pusey continued to hold his post as Professor, and for the last thirty years had taken a prominent part in the ecclesiastical controversies of the day. He wrote elaborate treatises on baptism, the Eucharist, the Royal ecclesiastical supremacy, and marriage with a deceased wife's sister, besides many other works, including his celebrated "Eirenicon," published in 1865.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—"Liberalism can afford to be just to the men who, under Dr. Pusey's lead, rose up and armed themselves expressly to confound Liberalism. They have done their best and their worst, and yet the principles which they assailed with such vehemence and such ingenuity survive unharmed. Cardinal Newman, as we know, has drawn up a score of propositions defining the Liberalism with which his school felt constrained to do battle. The contents of his Syllabus are such as these: That no religious tenet is important unless reason shows it to be so; that Christianity is necessarily modified by the growth of civilisation and the exigencies of the times; that there is no such thing as a State conscience; that the Civil power may dispose of Church property without sacrilege; that it is lawful to rise in arms against legitimate princes; that the people are the legitimate source of power. These are all, according to him, most damnable doctrines and positions. It is easy to see how entirely the movement of events has been in favour of the principles which Dr. Pusey and his allies thus prescribed. The modification in the way in which the Western world regards Christianity has been too profound to need to be insisted upon, nor is this the place for insisting upon it. It would be hard to count the number of 'revealed doctrines or precepts,' in Dr. Pusey's sense, which have dropped out of men's minds because 'they stood in the way of scientific conclusions.' It has fared no better with 'legitimate princes,' as France, Spain, Italy, and several States in Germany will all bear testimony. Even in our own country—the only country in the civilised world that has not undergone a great organic change in the conditions of its existence within the last thirty years—the doctrine that 'the people are the legitimate source of power' has acquired a final and practically undisputed ascendancy. Decidedly the world has not gone the Catholic nor Anglican way within the last fifty years. That is no reason why we should not recognise what was virtuous, unselfish, lofty, and serious in the aim and character of the great Anglo-Catholic leader who has now in the fulness of years rested from the battle."

The Daily News writes:—"Few parties have ever achieved such a striking success as the sect which derived its name from Dr. Pusey during the lifetime of its head and chief. It began in weakness, and, however it may end, it is continued in such power as numbers can give, while to reason it does not appeal. It arose from an obscure source in a hostile University, under the frown of heads of houses and doctors, and all the other dignitaries who are prayed for in the University Church. It has not so much conquered as obliterated its early foes, and in Oxford its opponents are no longer Erastians and Evangelicals, but men who stand aloof from all ecclesiastical movements, and whose tenets would have been far more obnoxious to Dr. Pusey's orthodox enemies than anything contained in Tract No. 90. If we turn from Oxford to the Church of England we shall find that Dr. Pusey's doctrines have triumphed all along the line. Where is the Low Church, and where is the Broad Church? Where are the followers of Simeon, and where are the disciples of Maurice? In a few remote country parsonages there may be remnants of the creed which Cardinal Newman once held, and from which Dr. Pusey himself was, in his youth, not averse. One or two popular preachers in large towns may edify or amuse their congregations by explaining how doctrines can be at once true and false, and how valuable moral lessons are to be drawn from facts that never occurred. But, speaking generally, the English clergy have gone over, bag and baggage, to Tractarianism. How this has come to pass it would be out of place to consider here. In connection with Dr. Pusey's life it is necessary to record the fact, for he had much to do with it, though perhaps less than is commonly supposed. The 'Tracts against the Times,' as Mrs. Browning called them, were not read by the public, for reasons which any one may find clearly stated in Mr. Mozley's 'Reminiscences.' Dr. Pusey has never wielded any real direct personal influence over the English people. His learning was respected; but Englishmen, who are apt to fall into irrational ecstasy over a third-rate copy of Latin verses, do not really value Hebrew scholarship. He possessed none of that charm of style which has enabled Cardinal Newman almost to break the barrier between music and language, and to haunt men's memories with the periods of his persuasive rhetoric, as if they were the lingering tones of a symphony. Nor has Dr. Pusey played an active part in the life of the nation. He has applauded from his Canon's house the performances of his enthusiastic disciples, but he has not himself mingled in the fray. He has written books for clerical libraries, but the lay public has cared but little for Dr. Pusey's Commentaries on Daniel the Prophet. All excesses in ritual and extravagancies of sacerdotal pretension have found a strenuous advocate in Dr. Pusey, but he has not himself thought it necessary to defy the law. On the other hand, his ardent admirers in every part of the country have worked hard in the cause of religion, of charity, and of the poor. This is the real reason why the High Church party has carried everything before it. It has been the party of high endeavour, of earnest action, of zealous, unselfish devotion to duty. Its doctrines have never really commended themselves to what is still, in fact as well as in name, a Protestant country. But Englishmen, rightly or wrongly, attach far less importance to the abstract soundness of opinions than to the character and conduct of those who hold them. As Epicurus recommended his lax or lenient morality by his pure and noble life, so the Tractarian clergy and their successors have won acceptance for their cause and calling by industry, courage, and endurance.

"Dr. Pusey's was one of the few figures that had remained immovable during the recent changes and chances of Oxford life. He had not changed his mind during the last half century, and it probably never occurred to him in the course of his long life that he could possibly be in the wrong. This is a great gift to be bestowed upon any man. Dr. Pusey admitted no doubts, and brooked no contradiction. He 'tried the spirits,' not by reference to a remote and obscure standard, but by comparing them with the doctrines which he thought he had found in the Fathers, and which he had at all events thought out himself. Probably no man of modern times would have burnt heretics in Smithfield with greater complacency or a clearer conscience. There was, now and then, something almost hysterical in his denunciation of opponents. He was probably quite conscious in his calmer moments that when he called the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of 'Essays and Reviews' a 'soul-destroying judgment,' he was talking something very much like nonsense. More pointed, if less scrupulous, was his criticism on a celebrated judgment delivered by Lord Westbury, who was flippantly said to have 'dismissed Hell with costs.' A personal interest in the question to be decided ought always, remarked Dr. Pusey, to disqualify a judge.

"Movements in the Church itself, such as that typified by 'Essays and Reviews,' have passed over his head without turning a hair. The storm of scepticism has raged without, but Dr. Pusey has contentedly left all who differed from him, as Mr. Mozley lucidly explains, to 'the uncovenanted mercies of God.' Few people have held their own opinions so firmly through so many external fluctuations as Dr. Pusey. His ostentatious sympathy with Mr. Green, of Miles Platting, has often been declared; but while he has consistently applauded those who bore the cross of persecution, he has never, with one doubtful exception, been a candidate for the crown of martyrdom."

The Echo writes:—"It is difficult for the younger half of the present generation to understand the wrath which the Oxford Movement provoked. The epithet 'Puseyite' in the mouths of those who uttered it was a term of opprobrium. It was something worse than Papist, for the Papist was at least an open foe. The man who taunted his opponent with being a Puseyite meant to assert that his opponent was little less than a Jesuit and a traitor. Yet the Puseyite was neither traitor nor Jesuit. It is true that not a few of those who at one time honoured Dr. Pusey as their leader passed over to Rome; but Dr. Newman, who knew Pusey better than any man, could not believe that his friend would follow his example. How a theologian who accepted with unquestioning deference the authority of the first four councils could find a logical halting-place we cannot pretend to explain; it is one of those ecclesiastical mysteries which to the man of the world passeth all understanding, but to Dr. Pusey it presented no difficulty. If the right of private judgment is to be surrendered there is some salve to conscience in surrendering it to an authority whose lineal descent is unquestionable, whose claims have never been lowered, whose rights are internationally admitted; but an authority which is catholic in theory but insular in fact is painfully lacking in the notes of genuineness and authenticity. The wholesale perversions to Rome conclusively prove that this is the weak point in the movement of which Dr. Pusey was the leader. In his own case insularity was the corrector of logical conclusions, but too many of his disciples had no such deterrent; having traversed three-fourths of the road, the rest was easy. Reason having once abdicated its throne, it was a matter of very little importance in whose favour the abdication was made.

Beyond all question Dr. Pusey was one of those rare men of the time who, without holding high office, and without exercising direct influence over the masses of the people, yet set their mark upon their own age, and call into existence movements that are certain to have important effects in the future. The party of which Dr. Pusey has so long been the leader has become so powerful within the Church of England that its expulsion is impossible. It is intensely earnest, it commends itself to the world of fashion, and at the same time, by its devotion and self-denial, to the world of squalid poverty. It grows in numbers as well as in vigour and audacity, and it thrives on opposition and persecution. Yet he would be a bold prophet who would venture to foretell what will be its future effects upon the Church of England. Should the time ever arrive when it becomes the dominant party in the Church, even though it refrained from attempting the expulsion of members of other parties, the existence of the Establishment would no longer be possible. However the mediocrity of Dr. Pusey may attract the clergy and earnest laymen, it is irreconcilable with the broad current of modern thought. Here and there a High Church Radical, like Dean Oakley and Mr. Arthur Stanton, may demonstrate the possibility of combining democratic opinions with sacerdotal assumptions; but the inevitable tendency of democracy is to repudiate the authority of the priest. The successors of Arnold and Stanley and Maurice and Kingsley may perhaps succeed in reconciling the Church to the common people; the followers of Pusey will certainly not make the attempt, and would assuredly fail if they tried. Though they are a growing party, however, they are not likely ever to become predominant, and the Erastian spirit is too strong to justify the expectation that the State will surrender any of the powers it possesses. The growth of the sacerdotal party, even though it fails to gain predominance, is likely to prove a formidable danger to the Establishment. The alternate disappointments of Ritualists and Evangelicals have led them to look at disestablishment as a refuge from present distress, and many of them have examined the bugbear so closely that they no longer fear it. If the Church of England as an Establishment is to be saved it will be by the efforts of those who have caught the mantle of Arnold and Stanley; the growth of the party who honoured Dr. Pusey as their chief is the chief political danger of the Church; perhaps if she no longer had any political dangers to apprehend from a clerical point of view she would become more powerful than ever."

The Times writes:—"For nearly half a century Dr. Pusey has been the best known and most prominent figure in the English Church. His name has been identified with the most important religious movement of the age. Standing in the front rank among the leaders of the High Church party, he has been a mark for hostile criticism and for bitter, unsparing personal attack. This we may regard as a necessary result of the position he has occupied, and as a tribute, however involuntary, to his power and influence as a leader. These he unquestionably possessed. It is shown by the facts of his life, by the evidence of his friends and of his enemies, and by the large degree of success which his party, under his guidance, have won. Dr. Pusey and the Puseyites and Puseyism have transformed the Church of England. They found it what the eighteenth century had made it—an Evangelical body. They have set up within it a wholly different ideal of life and thought and doctrine. The Evangelical party has survived, but it has been driven into the background. Step by step the work has been at length done. Views and principles which were almost unknown fifty years ago have forced their way into notice and recognition and acceptance. What were then esteemed dangerous and daring novelties rank now among the commonplaces of religious thought. They are still looked upon with suspicion. Those who disliked them at first dislike them still. The difference is that they no longer denounce them in the old terms, and that they have become well aware that it is impossible either to put them down or to treat them, as they were once inclined to do, as the fancies of a handful of enthusiasts. 'We can count you,' was the contemptuous remark of one of the most distinguished Bishops of the Church in the early days of Puseyism. It would have been possible then, but it would be a hard task now.

"The change which has been brought about by Dr. Pusey, and by those who have acted with him and under him, and who have taken their name from him, stands out as the most remarkable religious phenomenon of the century. It has been many-sided. It has reached to doctrines and to ceremonies, to party shibboleths and to the rules of private life. Religious feeling has been intensified by it; religion itself has been strengthened as a disciplinary force. What it has gained in power it has lost in cant. We hear less now of the old party watchwords by which members of the religious world were wont to recognise one another. There is more earnestness than there has ever been, but there is less oppressive outward gravity, less disposition to identify saintliness with a certain distastefulness of manner and tone and language. Ritualism is the new mode of expression by which the modern High Churchman finds an utterance for his devotional impulses. This has now become the characteristic of the High Church party. It is not content with teaching apart from symbolism. The old High Churchmen, the men of 'the movement,' the men with whom Dr. Pusey began to act, can in no sense be described as Ritualists. They were concerned with more essential work, with laying the foundations of the faith, not with the ornamental superstructure. The thing to be done in their time was to bring back the Church of England to a position she had abandoned. They had to begin at the beginning, to recast and remodel the whole doctrinal teaching which they found in vogue. This they did most effectually. They found their ideal and the authorities in the writings of the early Fathers and of the great Anglican divines of the same school of thought as themselves. They found the Church as it was to the mind of Tillotson and Stillingfleet, a Church by law established and dependent upon the authority which had set it up. They claimed for it a divine origin in its outward form no less than in its inner life. It was the visible kingdom of heaven set up on earth; the channel of mysterious graces; the depository of miraculous powers. The more unpopular the cause and the more certain the obloquy, the more prompt and eager would Dr. Pusey be in coming forward as a defender. After the publication of Tract 90, he was one of the very few who dared to say that he approved of it. In gifts of money, too, he was most generous and free-handed. Cardinal Newman reckons his own munificent charities as not least among the causes of his enormous personal influence."

DEATH OF THE DEAN OF WINDSOR.—The Hon. and Very Rev. Gerald Wellesley, Dean of Windsor, died on Sunday night, after a painful illness, at Hazlewood, near Watford, the residence of Lord Rokeby. The Hon. and Very Rev. Gerald Valerian Wellesley was the third son of the late, and brother of the second Lord Cowley. He was born in 1809, was educated at Eton, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1830. He held the rectory of Strathfieldsaye, Hants (in the patronage of his relative the late Duke of Wellington), from 1836 till 1855, was nominated Domestic Chaplain to the Queen in 1849, Dean of Windsor in 1854, and Lord High Almoner to the Queen in 1870.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE DAWSON.—A special meeting of the committee and subscribers of the Dawson Memorial Fund was held in Birmingham on Tuesday night, under the presidency of Mr. Samuel Timmins, to decide what course should be adopted considering the dissatisfaction which existed with regard to the statue of the late Mr. George Dawson by Mr. Woolner, R.A., recently erected near the Town Hall. The statue from the moment of its erection caused disappointment to nearly every person who had been acquainted with the distinguished lecturer and preacher. It is only fair to Mr. Woolner to state that he had never seen Mr. Dawson, and that his model was approved before the execution of the statue. The problem before the committee has been solved by an accident. The committee reported that it had been discovered that the nose of the statue had been broken off and patched on again. Inquiries showed that the workmen in placing the statue under the canopy caused the accident, and that they had not communicated the fact to their employers, Messrs. Barnsley and Son. The committee added that the damage to the statue rendered it useless for them to propose or discuss any alteration of it, and that Messrs. Barnsley had given £250 towards a new statue. It was decided to have another statue, more than 800 guineas having been already raised for that purpose.

DR DAVIDSON ON THE WAR IN EGYPT.

The great success of our arms in Egypt may be hailed with satisfaction, partly because it brings to an end a war on which our Government entered with marked reluctance, and partly because the predominance of a great Western Power in any Oriental country is always a safeguard for the great mass of the people and the guarantee for a just and comparatively enlightened government of the country. Even in the triumphant hour of victory, however, it is well that we should give a fair hearing to what can be said on the other side. It was on this account that in our last number but one we gave an analysis of Mr. W. S. Blunt's remarkable paper in the Nineteenth Century, whose main positions seem to us almost unanswerable, and for the same reason we subjoin the principal part of a communication to the Echo from our venerable friend the Rev. Dr. Davidson, one of the foremost Biblical scholars of our age, and through life an enlightened friend of peace and political and religious freedom:—

That there was no sufficient cause for the bom-hardment of Alexandria's forts I feel perfectly sure. The massacre of twenty Europeans on the 11th of June does not justify the high-handed act of bombarding forts and killing innocent people therewith. I have also failed to see the alleged fact that the Suez Canal was at any time in danger or seriously threatened to our detriment.

But it is not my intention to look at the matter in the light of expediency. Politicians may view it as their passion or their interest prompts. There is a higher aspect of the question. How does it look from the standpoint of the New Testament? If the teaching of Christ is to be our standard of morality, this aggressive war, like every other of the same character, is directly opposed to the lessons of the Sermon on the Mount; for the principles clearly promulgated in that great moral discourse are violated by the present invasion of Egypt. No matter what Government be in power—Liberal or Conservative, no matter who is Prime Minister, and therefore mainly responsible, the right and wrong are unalterable; and that England has done the wrong is unquestionable, if Christianity be the standard.

It is sad to see how readily the Christian religion is put aside or disregarded when so-called "British interests" are thought to be at stake. The nation is nominally Christian; it has thousands of preachers; the followers of Jesus hold forth his name, and proclaim their faith in his Divinity; yet the great majority of them are silent whenever the nation enters upon an aggressive war, or even encourage and applaud it. This is one cause of the small progress which the Christian religion has made, and it accounts for the little influence it really has over the conduct of its professors. The Prince of Peace would be converted into the Prince of War by misguided votaries, but he cannot.

What this Empire is to be is a thought that must often occur to the reflecting Englishman. I cannot help thinking of the parallel presented by the Roman Empire, which proceeded in its mighty career to subdue and annex distant countries by the force of arms. It became rich and luxurious. Its vices at home increased with its barbarities abroad, but it fell by its own weight. Retribution overtakes nations as well as individuals. Under the moral Government of God the former suffer for the deeds of injustice they commit. Let Christ's pregnant utterance be remembered, "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Years ago, when I was associated with the Manchester Party, headed by those noble patriots Cobden and Bright, the familiar watchwords were—Peace, Non-intervention, Retrenchment, Reform; but these are seldom heard now, and are seldom acted upon by Cabinets. Yet they are the true index of a nation's progress in all that contributed to build it up on a secure foundation. The resources of civilisation are not coercive acts suspending individual liberty in a free country; they are not unjust wars abroad; they are not the squandering of money in killing our fellow-creatures; they are the friendly, benevolent acts of a people who fear God and love justice; the acts of such as aim at doing to others as they would that others should do to them.

Is it possible that this country has passed its height? Have the greed of money and the lust of territory demoralised it? Is its profession of Christianity a hollow sound? Are our newspapers, with their boastings of our power by sea and land, of our money-bags and our valour, a true index of national greatness? If they be, I cannot help thinking that children of this untoward disposition will be punished for disobedience to the command "Thou shalt do no murder."

The Liberal Party has done great service to the Empire in past years, and it is capable of doing greater in the future. With such a statesman at its head as the present Premier it ought to be mighty for good. But the policy which dictated the Egyptian war is unfortunate. A deplorable step has led the nation into an un-Christian course. We shall probably succeed in slaughtering thousands of patriotic Egyptians, and newspapers may rejoice over the carnage. But some victories are dearly purchased. I would rather be the instrument of spiritual good to a single family than the conquering general engaged in an unrighteous cause, who is cheered with the plaudits of bloodthirsty Britons, and decked with their empty titles.

LEICESTER.—On Sunday last, the 17th inst., the annual sermons were preached and collections made on behalf of the Sunday-schools of the Free

Christian Church. The pulpit or platform and the stair leading to it were tastefully decorated, and a large quantity of beautiful cut flowers arranged on the table in front, plants being placed in other parts of the church. Three hymns, practised by the children for each service, were sung with taste as well as heartiness, thanks to the choir-master, Mr. Hitchcock. The Rev. J. Moden, the minister of the congregation, preached in the morning, his subject being "The Religious Characteristics of Childhood," and the Rev. W. Agar in the evening, on "The Ministry of Children." A number of the Great Meeting friends were present at each service, and the collections were larger than they have been for several years past.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

London, August 22, 1882.

The death of the late William Annette Pope by fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends, they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London Mr. Pope had been for twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the free churches generally.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE STORY OF RELIGION IN ENGLAND

By BROOKE HERFORD.

With the view of giving this very successful Work a more extensive distribution, the Committee of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION have resolved to offer the same for sale to Subscribers and Schools at Eighteen-pence per copy, nett. It will be neatly bound in cloth, gold lettered, and will serve equally well for general circulation as for use as a class-book. It is a most valuable book for young people; and in this effort to reduce the price from Five Shillings to Eighteen-pence the Committee feel confident that their action will meet with a very liberal response. As a large demand is expected for the Work at this greatly reduced price, the Trade Manager will endeavour to execute all orders with as little delay as possible.

IMAGINARY DANGERS.

MR. HERBERT NEW, in his valuable and extremely interesting paper at the Liverpool Conference, speaks of "the danger of Ritualism" in connection with the development of the religious life within our Churches. In view of the increasing attractiveness of the Church of England he thinks that we have not been wise in our imitation of its architecture and its ritual; and that we have, in effect, "smoothed the path along which more go from us than come to us."

Readers of the Inquirer scarcely need to be reminded that we are totally at issue with our valued friend on this point, and believe that the danger to which he refers is entirely imaginary. Our danger, indeed, until recently has been quite in the opposite direction. The "cultus" of our Churches has been of the most meagre and unattractive character. Our services of worship, with few exceptions, have neither been characterised by the enthusiastic fervour which attracts the multitude nor by the chastened and refined beauty which gratifies the cultivated mind; and in the extreme of our opposition to anything approaching to symbolism we have discarded and neglected the beautiful outward forms which fitly represent the simple faith we cherish, and materially help to promote the inward religious life. Our worship, it can hardly be denied, has been hard, cold, and unattractive, and has failed to impress the young, the ardent and the imaginative. We have partly inherited the old traditions of Puritanism, with its hatred of all the grace, beauty, and adornment of life; we have partly been influenced by the cold spirit of the Benthamite Utilitarianism, which critically analyses the devoutest utterances of Psalmist and Prophet, scornfully asks what is the use of worship, and regards the Church as simply a lecture hall where we are assembled to listen to moral platitudes or semi-scientific essays, and listen as a mere audience to prayers offered up by another, as a kind of spiritual exercise more or less rational and useful. And so in the non-liturgical churches, as it seems to us, the idea of common worship is gradually lost. The people become a mere assemblage of auditors instead of a worshipping congregation; the minister is in fact a priest offering up service for the people instead of with them.

Sacerdotalism or Sacramentalism is one thing. Ritualism or æsthetic cultus is quite another thing. There may be, and there is a good deal of Sacerdotalism in churches which profess to reject it, and which regard Ritualism with abhorrence. A graceful and ornate Ritualism may flourish in churches which totally and emphatically reject the cardinal idea of Sacerdotalism, and are devoted to Liberalism as the very essence of their life. History and Philosophy have not taught us their deeper lessons if we have not learned from them that elements of permanent truth and reality are mingled with systems of thought, which to the superficial eye appear to be unmingled error. It is the truth which is the life of every wide-spread form of opinion; and when errors make way in the world it is by virtue of the truths mixed up with them. Or as Dr. MARTINEAU has expressed it in his own magnificent way—"Every fiction that has ever laid strong hold on human belief is the mistaken image of some great truth, to which reason will direct its search, while half-reason is content with laughing at the superstition, and unreason with disbelieving it."

Puseyism as a Sacerdotal system seems to us the mischievous revival of an old and dangerous superstition, which we are bound to oppose with all our might as a fatal perversion of the truth of God. But there is another side of the great Puseyite movement, which, by the confession of all candid opponents, it has exercised a great and on the whole beneficial influence both in the Established Church and far beyond its borders. It was a reaction against the old, narrow, and prejudiced Puritanism, which had lost the early fervour of its spiritual life, and become a mere ghastly, lifeless phantasm. It was a reaction against the superficial Utilitarianism of the age, which was fatal to the spirit of worship in any genuine form. It was a reaction against the shallow Liberalism of the reform period which summed up all religion and duty in the promotion of mere material good and outward comfort. It is the creed of Puseyism which seems to us wrong and mischievous, and not the attractive and ornate ritual with which Dr. PUSEY himself professed but slight sympathy, and which has no necessary connection with Sacramentalism. The seemliness, the beauty, and, wherever it is attainable, the splendour of public worship are welcome to many who are wholly free from the taint of priestcraft. For the last thirty or forty years the cultivated portion of the nation has been waking up to some perception of art, and we are generally beginning to feel that poetry and music, painting and sculpture may be made to minister not only to the comfort and refinement of our home lives, but to our intellectual, our moral, and our spiritual life and growth. And now, so great has been the almost imperceptible progress of Ritualism, it is impossible so to exclude the influence of this dreaded movement from the worship carried on in our Churches. Rejecting as we of the Liberal Churches generally do the fundamental Puritanical conceptions of art and worship, we fail to see why the most beautiful harmonies, the most exquisite colourings, the most graceful forms, the most venerable liturgical formularies, from which every element of error is carefully expunged, should not render the worship of GOD a thing to be loved, and prized and rejoiced in. So long as faith in GOD and His goodness remains a living sentiment and real power amongst us, so long as we recognise that the essence of worship is in the offering of the heart and soul, and that all else is of the nature simply of external helps, material appliances and symbols, there seems to be no reason why the worship which is the fitting expression of that faith should not be as ornate and quite as impressive as the worship of those who cling to the most extravagant theories of priestly power. The best way of obviating the real danger of Ritualism is not by pouring contempt on a seemly and graceful "cultus," or railing at it in a spirit of hard Puritanical unbelief, but by showing that we can use all things without abusing them; by proclaiming that the most beautiful symbolism has no intrinsic value. These are, after all, things indifferent in themselves; but even the most advanced Liberals are in danger of forgetting that their indifference will best be shown by a fearless use of any means by which Art may render the worship of GOD more attractive, more elevating and delightful.

Even the Evangelical Dissenters, hitherto so deeply imbued with the Puritanical idea of worship, and so watchful against this dangerous Symbolism, are now everywhere confessing, both in word and act, that there is an element of good in the æsthetic development within the Church of England, while they repudiate the principles from which it originated. A marked improvement is discernible everywhere, both in the architecture of Dissenting chapels and their forms of worship. Anthems, chants, and in some instances partial liturgical services, all which a former generation would have stigmatised as "marks of the Beast," are used in chapels which were once the strongholds of Puritanism. As one of the leading organs of Dissent writes this week, the extent to which this æsthetic development has affected Dissenters is that they have renounced many antipathies which had little or no foundation in reason, and that they have learned to cultivate some points of beauty which they had neglected or even condemned, because of associations which they regarded as perilous. And the same authority, while adding that the changes thus accepted may or may not be wise, candidly acknowledges that "at all events they do not indicate any secret encroachment of Sacerdotalism or Sacramentalism."

Our advice to our friends and readers would be exactly the opposite of that given by Mr. HERBERT NEW, standing on the chance steps of one of the most elaborately ornate and highly symbolical of our churches. Let us dismiss this fear of Ritualism as altogether chimerical and imaginary. Our real danger, as we have intimated, is exactly in the opposite direction of Rationalistic coldness and indifference. Our young people, and not the young only, are everywhere longing for more of the spirit of beauty and reverence as well as of life and fervour in our worship. We verily believe that we lose far more people on account of the superior attractions of the stately and impressive service of the Church of England than from any real conversion to the theology of the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds. We are among the last to disparage the humblest service offered in rudest barn if the real spirit of devotion be there. But in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the barn service is not the best we can offer, and so loses the conditions of true and acceptable worship. And when wealthy members of our congregations, whose own homes are filled with every refinement of art, advocate perfect simplicity of worship, and leave their chapels in almost squalid neglect, and are content with unmusical services which they would not tolerate in their drawing-rooms, we cannot help thinking that their lofty spirituality is often a cloak for meanness and indifference, or at best indicates an incurable Philistinism.

Where many of our friends discern imaginary dangers we only see every sign of hope and encouragement. We would urge our congregations to continue to build as stately church edifices as their resources will command. Even our poorer working-class congregations would be better by making some sacrifices, such as some of them have made to enshrine our beautiful faith in a fitting outward shrine. Whatever we do let it be at least the best we can offer. Let Art, still as of old, offer its choicest works in grateful homage on the altar of high religious faith. It is not good that we should imitate other Churches in anything which does not fitly express a genuine spirit of worship. But the language of devotion is very much the same among all earnest souls. The greatest productions of art and poetic genius, the prayers and collects and canticles of the ancient liturgies are the property of all Christendom, and not of any one Church. We, of the free and progressive Liberal Churches, are among the last who should wish to ally ourselves with a narrow and exclusive section, whether of the old Puritanism or the modern Dissent. Let our communion be with the real Church Universal.

LIBERAL CONGREGATIONALISTS.

LIBERAL utterances from the ranks of Congregationalism are very frequent just now. The heaven of Liberal thought is working strongly in that religious body. The evidence of this accumulates every day. Now it is a distinguished layman, now it is a leading minister who utters with applause from his hearers what would have been considered rank heresy only a generation ago. Last week we gave a remarkable instance in the case of the Rev. J. VICKERY, who is about to succeed the Rev. JOHN HUNTER of York, another pronounced Liberal. This time the "heretic" is the Rev. E. PAXTON HOOD. The Congregationalists of Ipswich have just re-opened, after extensive renovations, St. Nicholas-street Chapel. The re-opening was made the occasion of a large gathering. Amongst those present were Mr. JAMES CLARKE, formerly of Ipswich, now the editor and proprietor of the Christian World, and the Rev. E. PAXTON HOOD. Both spoke, and their speeches were more than commonly interesting. Mr. CLARKE reviewed the progress made since the year 1840, when he resided in Ipswich. One passage in his speech, in which he pointed out how strict and narrow was the Orthodoxy of that day, is worth quoting:—

"The whole tendency of the time was against innovations of any sort. Even in Christian society inquiry was frowned upon and hindered. Authority was the God that had been set up, and to this we were all expected to submit. However reverent your questionings, you were regarded with suspicion. Who were you that you should be discontented with aught that satisfied your forefathers? The sinfulness of new opinions in matters of religion was the prevailing sentiment of our spiritual guides in those times. There was a Young Men's Society here, held in the adjoining (Congregational) school-room, but the subjects of debate were very limited, and, intellectually, unprofitable. Real Bible difficulties were rigidly ignored; and even Teetotalism and Phrenology, then making a noise in the town, had to be excluded. If I remember rightly, the society was actually broken up on the question of our being allowed to debate the subject of Phrenology—a free spoken gentleman from London having come like a bombshell into our midst. To several of the brightest of these young men the effect was disastrous. They became sceptical and departed from all Christian society. With regard to our general reading in these days, I am inclined to think that we are not eclectic enough, and that much rubbish comes into our homes that would be far better away. But how could any of us endure the restrictions that prevailed forty years ago? Well do I recollect, when a raw youth from an Essex village, I paid my half-crown to the Ipswich Mechanics' Institution, and was looking along the shelves of the library, and for the first time fixed my eyes on the works of Sir Walter Scott, a Congregational deacon coming up to me and saying 'young man, beware of those books; they will do you harm;'—while another deacon soon afterwards earnestly warned me against even looking into the pages of Shakespeare! With this spirit prevailing amongst us, is it to be wondered at that Nonconformists were accused by their enemies of a want of culture?"

The contrast which all this offers to the present time is very striking, and it is especially so when drawn by one who can speak from actual recollection of the condition of things at a former time. And it is only when the contrast between the present and the past is thus presented that we are able to see what substantial progress has been made. The leading topic of Mr. PAXTON HOOD's address was the present attitude of Congregationalism, and his remarks are no less noteworthy than those of Mr. CLARKE. The spirit of an earnest Liberalism breathes through them.

Everyone, he said, was for going forward, but not on the old narrow lines. The narrow gauge would do no longer, every thing must be on the broad gauge. Technical churches were waning, and for the most part fading away. Man felt that for his salvation he needed something more than that which any merely technical church could give him. He needed the precious truth which touched the heart, penetrated the mind and gave wings to the spirit on its upward, onward way. Congregationalism was comparatively weak, because for the most part it was a sort of coronation of mediocrity. It seemed to him that nearly all the men who possessed real power were relegated to some obscure community. He had found and had rejoiced to find that the country villages and small towns were very frequently being ministered to by men of real learning, of real scholarship and power. He desired that they should recognise the fact that men of religion and Christian Churches wanted something more than the mere lath and plaster, something more than the mere framework that had grown round about them. He believed that to satisfy the mind and the heart of man the religious teaching of the present day must be something upon which the foot could firmly rest, something which he could really tenaciously and strongly grasp. He believed it was because ministers did not recognise this truth that people snored in their pews or stayed away from the church altogether. The Gospel of CHRIST was the one thing which could touch the religious instinct which undoubtedly existed in the heart of man, and it was that religious instinct which ministers should foster. "Do you suppose," said the speaker, "that I would ever devote my energy to building up a technical church? Not if I know it. Do you think I would try Sabbath after Sabbath to patch up some old parchment—some old creed. Not if I know it. I believe in the religious instinct in the soul of man, and I believe the Gospel is the only thing that can minister to it so as to raise it and give it repose and happiness."

Mr. HOOD is not satisfied with the present condition of Congregationalism. We gather from his address that it is not free enough, not large enough, not liberal enough. He disowns being a mere Congregationalist, and prefers being called an Independent. He has paid a visit recently to the United States and there he finds Congregationalism to be much more to his liking. He felt there that he was in the presence of real independence. The ideas of the people there were wider than ours. He was an Independent because he detested spiritual despotism wherever he found it. He was an Independent because it seemed to him the surest way by which a man's mind might be set free from all fetters and walk forth a free and noble thing, as the Creator of our spirits designed and intended it should be. Mr. HOOD's address was frequently interrupted by applause, which showed that the liberal sentiments to which he gave utterance were responded to by his audience. We are not surprised that he should prefer the Congregationalism of America to that of England. There is more scope there, more room for free spontaneous growth. There is less traditionalism there. No State Church asserts its exclusive privileges and prerogatives. Every association is voluntary, and the mind naturally realises a larger and truer freedom.

Mr. HOOD's unfavourable estimate of English Congregationalism may be mistaken. On that point we cannot speak, because we do not know enough of its internal working and condition. It may be that in some instances, through the influence of narrow-minded deacons, it is, as he said, "falling into a kind of spiritual despotism." We trust not, for we hope great things of the Congregational body. But with regard to what he says of the religion needed for to-day and for the future, we find ourselves very much in accord with him. We quite agree with him that the narrow gauge of old creeds and old lines of thought will do no longer. The antiquated dogmas and traditions of the past may be useful for reference, interesting as marking certain stages in the past progress of the human mind, but as pledges for the present generation to abide by they are fast becoming ing absolutely worthless. We fully believe with Mr. HOOD that in order to satisfy the mind and heart of man the religious teaching of the present day must be something upon which the foot can firmly rest, and the educated mind clearly and strongly grasp; and we agree with him that this something is to be found in the Gospel of CHRIST. And, finally, we are at one with him in his idea that a religious instinct exists in the heart of man, and that it is the duty of Christian ministers to foster and cherish that religious instinct, to develop and train it in accordance with the requirements of liberal and enlightened thought. These are counsels which not Congregationalists only, but other sects as well will find adapted to their needs.

AFTER DEATH.—IV.

IN our last article we broke off the discussion of the theory of annihilation midway. We had considered and rejected the theory of the extreme Protestant party, who believe that "the wicked" shall be "destroyed" after death. We had also considered what may be called the selfish view of annihilation advocated by HARRIET MARTINEAU and others. But, in this and all other matters, it is not so important what we think as how we think. And this same theory of annihilation has been adopted by a school emanating from AUGUSTE COMTE, and headed by the name of FREDERICK HARRISON, and the most honoured name of her who has been one of our best and greatest teachers—GEORGE ELIOT—partly with the very object of striking at the root of personal selfishness inherent in most systems of theology, of breaking down immoral self-seeking, and of incorporating righteous enthusiasm in the new cult—the Religion of Humanity. There is no GOD and no immortality, says this cult. There is no room for self-centered interests. Man must live for the race, and his aspirations must be directed to raising the condition and enlarging the sphere of happiness of his fellow man. This must be his religion, seeing that man cannot live without religion, that is, without high-reaching aims and aspirations extending beyond himself. All individuality is necessarily selfish. Though man is not immortal, yet his deeds are immortal, and by great and noble deeds he will make the world better after his death. He will live again in the memories of men and the inherited virtues of the race. This must be his ambition, his eager desire, his patient aim, his religion. Let GEORGE ELIOT be heard out of her own beautiful poem:—

O may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence, live
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end in self,

* * * This is the life to come,
Which martyred men have made more glorious
For us who strive to follow. May I reach
That purest heaven, be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony,

* * * Be the best influence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion ever more intense.

But even this diffused living in the hearts and minds of others will not last for ever. As man himself dies, body and soul, so in the fulness of time the race itself perishes:—

That better self shall live till human time
Shall fold its eyelids, and the human sky
Be gathered like a scroll within the tomb
Unread for ever.

This is, indeed, a be-all and an end-all. It is worse than the old Norse imagining.

Worse than the Buddhist's Nirvana. It is very dreary.

But is it true? Is it even as unselfish as it seems at first sight? May it not be said of this noble woman, to whom so many of us owe the deepest debt man can owe—gratitude for a better and more worthy life—that, with her catholic sympathy for all shapes of truth (not distanced by MAURICE himself), her earlier expression of trust and devotion exemplified in Dinah's prayer was truer to the facts of religion and humanity than this latest utterance? This, perhaps, can be made clear by a little examination.

1. The view sketched above does not commend itself to reason. Not only (it would have us believe) does the individual perish, but in due course of time the race itself, after reaching a mellow maturity, declines and finally perishes, so as to resemble a scroll which has no one to read it. But this idea is contrary to all the laws we have so often referred to; to the law of progress, to the law of the survival of the fittest, to the law of the development of the type. Are not these laws truer than the croaking foreboding of HORACE?—

Nos nequiores, mox daturos
Progeniem vitiosiore.

2. The belief in annihilation is not rendered less unjust by the account given of it above. This point has been so amply considered in a previous article that it is only necessary to state it now.

3. Nor is the belief really rendered less selfish. No one knew better than GEORGE ELIOT, who had so deep an insight into, and therefore sympathy with, all phases of life, how dull and uninteresting the average man and woman is. They have no lamps to carry, they have no strength to carry lamps, they have no oil to light them with, they are always in dependence on their neighbours to give them oil. For these GEORGE ELIOT felt earnestly and generously. Take this example, "After all, the Rev. Amos never came near the borders of a vice. His very faults were middling—he was not very ungrammatical. It was not in his nature to be superlative in anything; unless, indeed, he was superlatively middling, the quintessential extract of mediocrity." Or this beautiful passage:—"Let the sweet woman go to make sunshine and a soft pillow for the poor devil whose legs are not models, whose efforts are often blunders, and who, in general, gets more kicks than half-pence. She, the sweet woman, will like it as well; for her sublime capacity for loving will have more scope." The reader will pardon us for making one more extract. "So very large a majority of your fellow countrymen are of this insignificant type. . . . They are simply men of complexions more or less muddy, whose conversation is more or less bald and disjointed. Yet these common-place people—many of them—bear a conscience and have felt the sublime prompting to do the painful right. . . . Nay, is there not a pathos in their very insignificance, in our comparison of their dim and narrow existence with the glorious possibilities of that human nature which they share? Depend upon it you would gain unspeakably if you would learn with me to see some of the poetry and the pathos, the tragedy and the comedy, lying in the experience of a human soul that looks out through dull grey eyes, and that speaks in a voice of quite ordinary tones." In a novel once read by everyone, WILKIE COLLINS observes:—"Some of us rush through life, some of us saunter through life; Mrs. Vesey sat through life." What countless multitudes there are of us who sit through life, turning animal into vegetable!

But if this be so, what are we to say of the "choir invisible?" We all feel instinctively that Mr. Brown, Mrs. Jones, and Miss Tomkins have no songs to sing, and no spiritual forces to make melody and harmony. Still less room is there for 'Arry and Yellowplush, and the Hon. Deuceace. But leaving out these as quite beneath our notice what shall we say of the many more gracious natures which are conscious of an eager desire to do good and worthy work for GOD and man, to strike for the right, to battle against greed and cruelty, and all the lusts enthroned in high places, but which are still more sadly conscious of weakness and failure, of error and folly, of resolution sickled o'er with the pale cast of thought, and are very clear that, if they are to be classed by their unsuccessful endeavours in this world, there will be no choir invisible for them? What they feel the supreme need of is an immortality in which they may fledge their spiritual wings, and in which they may become apostles and ambassadors of GOD in the work He appoints for them. GEORGE ELIOT's glowing lines of burning aspiration are fitted for the few great and heroic souls that have raised the world to better things in epoch-making times; but there their efficacy ends, in a blind mist of darkness that enwraps you and me and all our near and dear friends. We then, for ourselves, regard this terrible beautiful explanation of the riddle of life as a will-o'-the-wisp, cheating the fancy and leading to no habitation of man.

It may be thought that our view of the various theories of annihilation would not be complete without some remarks on the Buddhist doctrine of Nirvana. But the writer is not a metaphysician. Moreover, it seems that the number of saints who have attained Nirvana may be counted on the fingers of one hand. The writer has carefully read the excellent little treatise of RHYS DAVIDS on Buddhism, and has looked into other well known larger and more ambitious works, but he forms no conception of Nirvana (or holiness, which seems to be the latest translation) which he can put into words. Nirvana is extinction, but it is not annihilation. It is without emotions, but it is individual; it is not re-absorption into the essence of the Deity, because there is no immutable Deity to be absorbed into. What, then is it?

With one more article we will conclude this rough sketch of the various speculations that have been hazarded on the subject of life after death.

H. C.

LEMINSTER.—The annual harvest thanksgiving services were held last Sunday, Sept. 24, at the Old Meeting, which was most tastefully and appropriately decorated for the occasion, several members of the congregation having worked with a will to produce the pleasing effect. The Rev. A. M. Holden, minister of the chapel, preached both times, speaking in the morning of various moral and spiritual lessons suggested by the harvest, and in the evening of activity in the service of God prompted by His manifold goodness to us. At the close of each service collections were made in aid of the funds of the Taunton and Somerset Hospital, the sum of £8 12s. 8d. being realised.

JEWISH FEAST.—Thursday was the first day of the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, called "Succoth," in commemoration of the Israelites' encampment in the wilderness when they departed out of Egypt. At the metropolitan synagogues services were held on Thursday morning, and in accordance with the directions of the Chief Rabbi—the festival being a feast of thanksgiving—special services of prayer and praise for the successes in Egypt were celebrated.

Occasional Notes.

THE Pall Mall Gazette has the following interesting correspondence respecting Mr. Darwin's religious views:—

Sir,—The enclosed is the translation of a letter written by Mr. Darwin in answer to an inquiry from a young student at Jena, in whom the study of Darwin's books had raised religious doubts. It is, perhaps, not altogether irrelevant, at a time when priests of various creeds are claiming Darwin for their own, to publish an authentic statement of what his views really were, particularly as this statement will be widely read in Germany, and Darwin's own countrymen ought to be at least as well informed on the subject as foreigners.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, KATHARINE MACMILLAN.

Frankfort-on-Main, Sept. 20.

[Letter from Mr. Darwin to a young student at Jena, quoted in a lecture by Professor Haeckel at the Natural Science Congress at Eisenach.]

Sir,—I am very busy, and am an old man in delicate health, and have not time to answer your questions fully, even assuming that they are capable of being answered at all. Science and Christ have nothing to do with each other, except in as far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every one must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities.—Wishing you well, I remain, your obedient servant, Down, June 5, 1879. CHARLES DARWIN.

THE Liberal of Calcutta, the organ of Keshub Chunder Sen and the "New Dispensation," has the following curious profession of faith, which looks very orthodox, but would not really meet the requirements of any Orthodox creeds:—

"Some people have asked us now and then what we think of the Gospel narrative of Christ's birth. We declare once for all that we are thorough believers in the miraculous conception and birth. But then let it be borne in mind that we hold Christ to have been and to be a spirit. We believe in the miraculous spirit-birth. All flesh is born of woman; and all spirit of the Holy Spirit. Christ was the spirit of humanity, and as such directly emanated from the essence of the Divine. Christ had no father but the Spirit Father in heaven. He came to establish the Fatherhood and the sonship. He knew no intervening personality between his spirit and that of the Father. He was born in God, nursed in God, he died in God. Christ was the essence of the Father reborn in humanity. And fitly has that birth been idealised in the miraculous conception. If it had been Christ's mission to establish the Motherhood of God also, which it was not, the Spirit instead of the woman Mary would have been recognised as the Virgin Mother. But as fatherhood becomes incomplete without its necessary correlative, Mary has been exalted into the Divine Mother. To us in the New Dispensation the Motherhood forms a separate article of faith. We, on the one hand, escape Mariolatry by accepting God alone as the Mother of mankind. On the other hand, we escape Christolatry by accepting Christ only as the Son, and never the Father, who is eternal and infinite. The birth of Christ is the birth of the most exalted humanity. The birth of Christ is the birth of the regenerated spirit of mankind. The birth of Christ is the birth of the spirit of all faith, love, and self-sacrificing obedience. Is not that spirit a strange mystery in this selfish carnal world? Is not the conception and descent of that spirit the most wonderful miracle? Those who believe in the spirit Christ cannot but believe in the miraculous conception and birth."

We learn from the British Medical Journal that the clerk to the St. Saviour's Board of Guardians had, in reply to an inquiry whether the proceedings of the Salvation Army had had anything to do with the alarming increase of insanity in the union, stated that one case of insanity, awaiting removal to an asylum, was an instance of religious mania, arising apparently from the excitement of the Salvation Army campaign, and that a young woman, who was present at the Blue Ribbon Army meeting at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Sunday had been taken to Camberwell Workhouse as a lunatic. Our contemporary adds:—"No doubt that species of psychical intoxication which vehement indulgence in religious exercises and emotions induce will sometimes end in mental derangement in persons who would not otherwise have become insane; but, at the same time, it is to be borne in mind that many half-crazy beings, men and women budding for madness arising out of inherited or physical causes, are powerfully attracted to every new and strange thing, and so plunge zealously into stirring services like those of the Salvation Army, and evolve, perhaps, at these services, into full-blown lunatics. Their insanity is not unlikely to be attributed entirely to the services, which really had little or nothing to do with its production. They were foredoomed lunatics on the verge of the catastrophe of their fate, and any other kind of agitation would have sufficed to precipitate them into it, as well as the uproar of the Salvation Army. If the statements made as to the success of the Army in drawing into its ranks habitual drunkards who become, for a time at any rate, sober and self-regarding, and in ensuring the closure of public-houses in the towns which it has occupied, be even approximately correct, then the ratepayers will have no serious grievance against the Army on account of its influence in causing insanity. It seems likely that for every case of insanity by its religious revelries at least two cases will be prevented by the limitations which it imposes on alcoholic carousals."

WE learn from Unity (Chicago) that in 1845 James Freeman Clarke, of Boston, published a sermon on the "Principles and Methods of the Church of the Disciples." It was understood that this new society was established on a very liberal basis. It was untrammelled by old traditions. The law had long since refused to recognise the "church" as distinguished from the "society" or "parish." Disturbing and fatal differences between the two had often broken out. The sources of the trouble were usually the creed. The less of it and the simpler, the more safety. Mr. Clarke and his friends gladly accepted that theory of the church which makes it, not a double but a single organisation, giving to it a broad basis of fellowship—a practical, rather than a doctrinal one. In the pamphlet referred to, he says:—"The body which conducts all the religious action has no religious basis, but a purely secular one. . . . It may contain the infidel, the immoral, the irreligious; for infidels and irreligious men generally think it respectable to own a pew, and there is no reason why they should not belong to the congregation. . . . If these happen to be the men of education and talent, they may be the most prominent men in the congregation, and exert the greatest influence on all its decisions; and so you may have infidels as the representatives of this religious body." Unity adds that the author of this language evidently had no fear that a church pledged to good works—a church whose object was to do good, to get good and to grow better—was exposed to any danger from this quarter. Nor is it likely that he suspected that such a church would ever be charged with narrowness of sympathy.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Pall Mall Gazette, calling himself "A Sometime Anglican," demurs to the high estimate given by that journal to the influence and position of Dr. Pusey. He points to the very few persons of note that were present at his funeral, and compares it with the gatherings at Westminster Abbey on the occasion of the interments of Dean Stanley and Mr. Darwin. Excepting Mr. Gladstone and the Dean of St. Paul's, there were no representative men at Dr. Pusey's funeral, "because there are now no distinguished men, or but few, of the party he represented." He adds:—"Excellent, zealous, hard-working, conscientious, pious clergymen were there of second and third rate ability: clergymen who have done no more in the world than their duty as clergymen; who have enriched the world by no one thought beyond their official utterances; who have done nothing during their career by which they will be remembered, besides breaking the law and outwitting the lawyers; whose very names will be forgotten, as their work will be probably undone within ten years of their death. This is a saddening statement to be made at the close of half a century of a movement which opened under such bright auspices and once trained such brilliant disciples. But, under the conditions named, the statement is true. Where are the Wards and Wilberforces, the Fabers and Oakeleys, the Allies and Maskells, the Barffs and Mivarts, the Ripons and Burys, the De Veres and Patmores, the Pugins, the Paleys, the Baddelys and Hope Scotts, not to mention other and more eminent living names, of the High Church school of to-day? I gladly admit that Canon Liddon is, in his position, supreme; I shall rejoice to admit any individual exceptions to the sweeping generalisation; their names will evidence the substantial truth of the charge. Into the causes of this decadence of the High Church party in brain-power, in logic, and in force of character and will, I will not here enter. That it has been replaced by much that makes the party more popular to the active as distinct from the thoughtful portion of the community, in this age of unrest, I do not deny. But I do point to the roll-call, so to say, of Dr. Pusey's funeral; and I hold that it proves a lamentable failure of his existing system to enlist clergy of even a high class, intellectually or by attainment; and that he possessed 'little direct influence on the English layman.'"

"PROUD PRESTON" is likely to receive fresh honours. It is said that at the conference of the Roman Catholic bishops of England, which is shortly to take place at Newcastle under the presidency of Cardinal Manning, an important discussion is expected to take place as to the advisability of establishing an archiepiscopal see for the North of England at Preston. Should such a course be determined upon, as is considered extremely likely, it is thought that the Right Rev. Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford, will be translated to the new diocese thus created.

WE are not sure that the Bishop of Manchester was far wrong when preaching at Hulme the other day he said:—"Some persons thought that intemperance was the greatest curse hanging over England at the present moment. He did not think so. There was no doubt a residuum who were cursed with that terrible curse of intemperance; but there were other curses more deadly still. Seeing what he saw, and hearing what he heard, he distinctly said that he believed that licentiousness was the sin which was eating out the moral life of this nation—licentiousness which they saw rampant through the streets of Manchester every evening that they moved through those streets. That was a cause which in pulpits they hardly dared to mention for fear of shocking some delicate taste, but it needed to be mentioned sometimes, when they knew the ravages it was causing on every side. Unhappily Manchester does not stand alone in this respect. But we scarcely think that the destruction of vice is due to pulpit exhortation or denunciation. The spread of temperance owes but little to this mode of meeting the difficulty. So long as society views the male offenders so leniently there is but little hope of improvement."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Spectator suggests a new employment for educated women—viz., that of reading aloud. The idea is that clever lady readers might form classes, composed of people of both sexes, who could meet at certain hours, and have read to them the latest works in theology, history, science, or fiction.

THE indefatigable band of reformers who procured equal rights for women from the Council of London University, and crowned their other triumphs by obtaining the medical diploma for members of the fair sex, are taking a new and very significant step. Concurrently with the opening of the medical schools for the winter session, they will open a residential hall for ladies who are anxious to be students at University College or at the London School of Medicine. As temporary quarters, a house at the corner of Gordon-square, W.C., has been secured. It was recently occupied by a couple of doctors, and it is sufficiently commodious to provide separate sleeping apartments for ten ladies. The committee who have charge of the arrangements have concluded—very naturally, considering the adverse circumstances—that not more than ten ladies are likely at present to present themselves simultaneously as candidates for the ordeal. By-and-by they mean to build for themselves.

It will be seen from an announcement in our advertising columns that the new session of Manchester New College will commence on Tuesday afternoon next, when the opening address will be delivered by Professor James Drummond, LL.D., on "Religion and Liberty." Professor Henry Morley, LL.D., Principal of University Hall, will also deliver a short address on occasion of the re-opening of that Institution under the auspices of Manchester New College.

NOTTINGHAM.—A public conference was held at the George Hotel, Nottingham, on Monday, on the question of opening museums and art galleries on Sundays. Professor Symes, M.A., of the Nottingham University College, presided, supported by the Rev. Brooke Lambert, vicar of Greenwich, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, A. W. Worthington, S. A. Steinthal, Mr. Mark H. Judge (hon. sec. Sunday Society), Mr. Jos. Brown, Q.C., Mr. T. Taylor, J. P., Mr. James Solly, Mr. E. King Fordham, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, Mr. E. J. Wetherston, Mr. Walter Wren, &c.—The Chairman said he was looking forward to the time when the working classes should no longer be shut out on Sunday from their drawing-rooms, the art galleries, and museums. He could scarcely imagine any one questioning the need of such drawing-rooms. Many of his hearers, no doubt, would agree with those who desired religious duties to be carried on on Sunday, but the whole day could not be spent in church or chapel. Many poor families had to live in one wretched, uncomfortable room. Where did the opponents of Sunday opening want them to go? To stand in the streets, perhaps in the rain, or to go to public-houses? With regard to the attendant difficulty, it seemed to him that the Sabbatarians did not logically argue as they did argue on this point so long as they allowed dinners to be cooked or beds to be made for them on Sunday by their servants.—Mr. Mark Judge gave some account of the success which had attended the opening of museums on Sunday wherever the experiment had been tried. He proposed a resolution to the effect that the conference heartily endorsed the objects of the Sunday Society.—The Rev. R. A. Armstrong seconded the resolution, and warmly supported the movement, asserting that the gloom of the English Sabbath had laid the foundation of many wicked lives; that to close museums and picture galleries on Sunday was a gross injustice and absolutely indefensible.—The Rev. Brooke Lambert and Mr. Thos. Taylor, J.P., also spoke in support of the resolution, which was carried with acclamation. A second resolution agreeing to petitions in support of Sunday opening was passed on the motion of Mr. Councillor Jacoby, seconded by Dr. Chas. A. Cameron, medical officer of health.

BRIGHTON.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held in New-road Chapel on Sunday. The decorations were most tastefully arranged under the superintendence of Mrs. Saunders and Miss Slater. A striking feature was the arrangement of long trails of ivy with fine bunches of black and white grapes up the pilasters at the back of the pulpit, while the pediment over was decorated with evergreens relieved by rosy-cheeked apples, and wheat and oats were clustered round the gas standards each side of the reading desk. The whole space in front of the pulpit and the communion table presented a most tempting appearance, being one mass of splendid fruit, comprising almost every variety. Thanks are due to many liberal friends who contributed, the gifts of fruit especially being even larger than usual. The Rev. T. R. Dobson preached appropriate sermons, tracing, in the morning, the agency of wheat as a civiliser, and the part it was playing in binding nations together in the common bonds of interest as producers and consumers, and hoping that better and more enlightened ideas would prevail.

"Till the war-drum throbbed no longer and the battle flags were furled
In the parliament of men, the federation of the world."

There were full congregations at both services, and the musical arrangements were very efficiently carried out by the newly organised voluntary choir, the singing being of a more congregational character than formerly. The flowers and fruit were afterwards given to the Sussex County Hospital and the Crèche.

Reviews.

The Electorate and The Legislature. By Spencer Walpole. Author of "The History of England from 1815." London: Macmillan and Co. 1881.

Under the title of "The English Citizen, his Rights and Responsibilities," Messrs. Macmillan are now issuing a series of short books, intended to meet the demand for accessible information on the ordinary conditions and the current terms of our political life, ignorance of which takes from the study of history the interest which comes from a contact with practical politics, and unfits men for their place as intelligent citizens. We are told that the series will deal with the details of the machinery whereby our constitution works and the broad lines upon which it has been constructed, the aim being not to give mere compendia of technical information, but to sum up shortly and clearly the leading points, and to arrange these so as to show their relation to one another, and their general bearing on the life and the duties of the citizen. The series will consist of thirteen volumes, and among the writers are Mr. H. D. Traill, the Rev. T. W. Fowle, Mr. T. H. Farrer, the late W. Stanley Jevons, Mr. F. Pollock, Mr. A. J. Wilson, and Mr. Spencer Walpole. Of this series the only one that has hitherto come under our notice is the little work the title to which is to be found at the head of this review.

Mr. Spencer Walpole has recently been appointed to the governorship of the Isle of Man, but he is better known by the three vols. in which he has given us a history of this country from the year 1815 down to the year 1840, and which are so good, that we shall regard the announcement of another volume being ready for publication with much pleasurable anticipation. In the little volume of 160 pages now before us Mr. Walpole has told the story of the growth of our present legislative and electoral system. It is not a mere synopsis of facts, nor is it simply a compilation from the works of Mr. Hallam, Mr. Stubbs, and Sir Erskine May, although to all these writers Mr. Walpole acknowledges his indebtedness. It is not enough for us to be told a fact; we want to get at the reasons for it, and these Mr. Walpole gives. Few of those who have paid the slightest attention to constitutional politics can have failed to observe that there are several absurd anomalies in our mode of government, and must have wondered how they came to exist. Were we now framing the constitution of a new country it is hardly to be supposed that such an absurd anomaly as the House of Lords would be among its articles, although it may be doubted whether anyone would be found to object to the utility of a second chamber. Yet at more than one period of English history we may well recollect "that it fought the battle of English liberty when the Commons were either unrepresented or powerless;" still, while "such circumstances deserve the gratitude of a people; they cannot, if alone, preserve an institution in an age which judges everything by the modern doctrine of utility." In his remarks on "The House of Lords," the general tenour of which will, we should think, greatly scandalise Lord Brabourne, of whom in the words of Selden it may be said that he is one of the new ones whom "we slight, because we know their beginning" Mr. Walpole calls attention to the remarkable consequence which has ensued from the distinction between England, where birth is made the only or chief qualification for entering the Second Chamber, and other countries where no such qualification exists. Here, he says, "the status of individual peers is exceptionally high, but the status of the House of Lords is constantly declining. In the United States and France, where the Senates owe their existence to election, the position of individual senators is comparatively unimportant, but the privileges of the Senate show no symptoms of decline." This distinction may, we think, be pursued a little further. The individual status of English peers is higher than that of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, or the twenty-eight representative peers of Ireland. That all this is to be accounted for by the two great advantages of rank and position, the former of which makes our hereditary legislators, as Mr. Walpole thinks, fortunate in their marriages, and the latter fortunate in their opportunities, we are scarcely prepared to admit, but we are fully in accord with him when he says that "the House of Lords must rest its claim to exist on its present services, and not on its past history."

In the eight chapters of the book under notice the author deals with "Parliament," "The House of Lords," "The House of Commons," "Parliamentary Qualification and Electoral Corruption," "Prerogative and Privilege," "Public and Private Bills," "Supply," and "Order and Obstruction." Much of the matter is historical, still there is much which is of interest at the present time. Although in a series of books designed to give information rather than to discuss improved methods, long dissertations would be out of place, Mr. Walpole does not hesitate to make such comments as, from his point of view, he considers the matter under discussion calls for. With nearly all of these we find ourselves in hearty accord. On the subject of bribery, for instance, he expresses the opinion that the best hope of terminating it "is to be found neither in the ballot, nor in the penal laws, but in the gradual growth of healthier manners." On the subject of the great expense caused by inquiries before Parliamentary committees he expresses himself greatly in favour of the formation of a competent tribunal capable of inquiring into all schemes submitted for the approval of the legislature, and of framing provisional orders for the sanction of Parliament. Such a tribunal would no doubt have in many cases to be a local one, and whatever our views may be on the question of Home Rule, as our Irish fellow-countrymen would have us understand it, there can be little doubt that such a system of Home Rule as is here indicated would meet with but little opposition. His observations on the best method of dealing with obstruction are, too, conceived in a wise spirit, though they would not, perhaps, find favour in the sight of Mr. Marriott, who seems to have got "bare majority" on the brain. We must stop, however, only remarking in conclusion, that if the other books of the series carry out the promise and intention of the publishers as faithfully as does this one by Mr. Walpole, "The English Citizen" will prove fully as attractive and interesting as any of the other serial volumes issued by the same publishing firm. We hope to be able to notice these as they appear in due course. R. B.

Is Atheism or Theism the more Rational? A Discussion between Mr. Joseph Symes and Mr. George St. Clair. London: Free-Thought Publishing Company. 1882.

We confess that we do not attach much value or importance to ordinary theological discussions. They almost invariably disappoint us. Sometimes the debaters are very unequally matched. Seldom or never does the debate rise to the height of the great argument we had expected. Often the struggle is more for victory than for truth—which can say the smartest things, which can gain an advantage over his opponent. The really difficult points are evaded on both sides, and the question is left at the close just where it was before the fight began. The debate before us, according to the admission of the combatants themselves, is no exception on these grounds to other discussions. Each appears to be disappointed with the other as an opponent, each avers that the other has not met his arguments; each declares the other side proof against the appeal to reason when against him, and in the end Mr. Symes, instead of leaving the verdict to his readers boldly claims the victory for himself, while Mr. St. Clair closes the discussion in terms of undisguised contempt for his opponent.

The debate consisted of twelve letters, six by each disputant, which appeared in the columns of the National Reformer, and have since been published in pamphlet form, making an addition to several similar discussions also issued by the Free-Thought Publishing Company. The precise question for debate has the advantage of being more than commonly definite and clear. "Is Atheism or Theism the more rational?"—that is, the more rational interpretation of the universe? Is the belief in a Supreme Mind as the author of the order of nature more rational than the belief in no such mind existing? That is the real question between Theism and Atheism. The superstitions which have been mixed up with Theistic belief do not affect the main question. The Atheist only evades it when he makes the corruptions or defects of Theism an absolute ground for rejecting Theism altogether. The essential thought, the existence of a Supreme Mind as the author of nature—may be true though the special forms in which it finds expression may be imperfect, inadequate, mistaken or even absurd. Trinitarian Theism, so far as it is Trinitarian, may be false, while pure Monotheism may be true. The tactics of the Atheists who dispute with Theists are to insist on the imperfect, erroneous conceptions of Theistic sects as sufficient disproof of Theism itself. They take its most partial, objectionable forms, and having without difficulty exposed these mistakes, they claim to have shown that Theism itself is irrational. Against this mode of argument Mr. St. Clair protests, and repeatedly charges Mr. Symes with ignoring his Theism and assailing some other form with which Mr. St. Clair has no sympathy, and which he has not undertaken to defend. The Theist has often handicapped himself in the struggle by undertaking to defend more than was really necessary to his case. If he is wise he will limit himself to what is absolutely necessary to his position. He will not allow himself to be entangled in the definitions which his opponent assumes for him. In this discussion Mr. Symes puts the theory of the existence of God in the form of eight questions, which he thinks cover most of the ground, and conducts his argument in accordance with these definitions. Mr. St. Clair does not accept any of them, but undertakes to "maintain that there is an intelligent Creator of man, against whose perfect goodness nothing can be proved." Taking this definite ground the question follows, is such a belief rational? Is it supported by the facts of nature? Mr. Symes replies in the negative, and alleges in support of his contention the evil that exists, the numerous defects of nature, the pain, misery, suffering, that prevail so widely in the world. Mr. St. Clair admits that evil exists, but that "is no proof that perfect goodness does not exist." On the other hand, Mr. Symes contends that the presence of evil in the universe, in whatever form or whatever degree, is fatal to the hypothesis that a God of perfect goodness exists. His opponent replies that evil serves a moral purpose—that it is limited as to time and effect—that it is evanescent, and that in some forms it is diminishing with the advancing knowledge of mankind. He regards it as part of a needful discipline, and believes that in the end good will prevail. From this point the controversy proceeds through the twelve letters, the Atheist making the most of the evils that exist in the world, the Theist minimising the evil as much as possible, and giving prominence to the evidence of goodness and wisdom that the system of the world affords. The one looks on the dark side, the other on the bright side of nature and of life. Mr. Symes has an eye quick to detect the imperfections in all things as they are. Mr. St. Clair prefers to dilate on the harmonies, beauties, and utilities of Nature. This difference is characteristic of the two creeds. The strength of Atheism is in the imperfections and anomalies discoverable in the present order of things, and the impossibility of reconciling these with the attributes and perfections of the Deity as commonly understood. On the other side the strength of Theism consists in the obvious order of Nature and the evidence this affords of mind as the source of that order. The Atheist will never be without objections telling more or less strongly against the popular notion of God; nor the Theist be left without evidence of mind as the directing controlling power of the universe. So long as man is led to connect mind with method and order, with adaptation and symmetry, Theism will have a firm basis in our mental constitution. The utmost that Atheistic arguments can do is to expose the inadequacy and mistakes of men's theories concerning the Deity, and here there is abundant scope in the errors and absurdities of the popular theology; and this is the service which Atheism renders to rational thought. It helps to correct the mistakes of a false theology, and to prepare the way for a truer and purer faith. The rational Theist has nothing to dread from it, however superstition may be damaged by its reasoning.

One word more. Mr. Symes may not think so, but he has really damaged his cause by the unbecoming tone of his letters. In the last he says, "I am well aware that my style of treating this subject must be very offensive to some. But I make no apology for it. I adopt it deliberately and of set purpose. I regard Theism as immensely stupid, so much so that serious argument is wasted upon it." When a man writes like that he not only commits an offence against good taste, but shows to all the world that he is too conceited, or too ignorant, perhaps both—to estimate the importance of the subject he has undertaken to discuss. Truly it is a waste of time to debate the question of Theism with him. However, Mr. St. Clair claims to have derived one advantage from his opponents' letters:—

"They seem to show how men become Atheists. There are certain questions which cannot be answered, and they are always asking those questions. There are certain difficulties of belief, and these they cherish in preference to the stronger reasons for faith and hope. There is sunshine and shadow in the world, and they prefer to dwell in the gloom. They search out all the crudities and failures, stinks and sores, diseases and evils which the world affords, or ever has afforded, and look at them through a magnifying glass. Impressed with the magnitude of the loathsome heap, and oblivious of everything else in creation, they presume to think they could have advised something better if the Creator had only consulted them. Had there been a wise Creator he surely would have done so! Henceforth they shriek out that there is no God; and, nevertheless, illogical as they always are, they whimper at pain instead of bearing it, and complain of evils, as though there were some God who was inflicting them. They complain that life is not worth living, and yet speak of death as though it were maliciously designed and the greatest evil of all."

This is severe, but we think not unjustly so, for any reader of pessimistic and atheistic literature must be aware that it is but the simple truth. In fine, we are profoundly convinced that the belief in a righteous Governor of the universe has a salutary influence on human character and life, that it tends to make life more happy and the ills of life more endurable than the absence of that belief, and that comparing the Theist and the Atheist, other things being equal, the Theist has every cause to be the happier and the better man. Literary Notes.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE contributes to the October number of the Contemporary Review a paper entitled "Principles of British Policy in Egypt," while Mr. Sheldon Amos reviews Mr. Seymour Keay's pamphlet "Spoiling the Egyptians," and Mr. M. G. Mulhall treats of "Egyptian Finance."

CARLYLE'S "Hero and Hero Worship" is the newest of the series of cheap standard works published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

PROFESSOR VAMBERY'S new work on the origin of the Hungarians will come out in a few days, simultaneously in Hungarian and in German. Ethnologists have hitherto classified the Hungarians among the Finnish-Ugrian branch of the Ural-Altaic race, but Professor Vambery, declaring this theory, based mainly upon philological evidence, to be quite untenable, proves the Turko-Tartar origin of the Magyars.

THE Academy hears that negotiations have begun between the French and German Governments for a new treaty of international copyright.

THE Drapers' Company have offered £300 per annum for five years towards the establishment of a technical school in connection with University College, Nottingham, with a grant for the first year of £200 for purchasing apparatus, &c.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN and Co.'s announcements include the "Life of Frederick Denison Maurice," by his son, Major Maurice, R.A.

MR. LAURIE, of Edinburgh, has, says the Athenaeum, just finished an etched portrait of the late Dean Stanley, which is to be immediately published by the Artistic Stationery Company (Limited), of London.

AMONG the books to be issued by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin and Co., of Boston, which are of interest on this side of the Atlantic, are a new edition of the complete works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, in twelve volumes, with biographical notes by his son-in-law, Mr. George P. Lathrop.

MESSRS. BENTLEY AND SON announce "A Memoir of Lord Hatherley," by the Rev. Prebendary Stephens.

MR. RIDGWAY has in the press a work by Baron de Malortie, entitled "Egypt: Native Rulers and Foreign Blunders."

MR. ELLIOT STOCK will publish almost immediately a volume of "Recollections of Rossetti," by Mr. Hall Caine, who was Rossetti's daily associate during the last year of his life.

THE Cambridge Philological Society intends to publish its Proceedings terminally, for the benefit of the limited number of scholars who take an interest in the doings of learned societies. The publishers are Messrs. Tribner and Co.

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL AND SONS have ready for immediate publication "The History of Wood Engraving in America," by Mr. W. J. Linton, with one hundred specimens.

MR. EDWARD WALFORD, who, in conjunction with Mr. Walter Thornbury, wrote "Old and New London," has been engaged in the preparation of a companion work, entitled "Greater London."

"THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN," by John Morley, has been published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, in their large octavo series of standard works. This is the work so highly praised in the course of a recent speech by Mr. Bright.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish next month a "Dictionary of Medicine," which has been for some years in preparation. The articles are contributed by many eminent members of the profession, under the general editorship of Dr. Richard Quain.

NEW BOOKS.

MESSRS. T. AND T. CLARK, of Edinburgh, will publish early next month the second issue of their "Foreign Theological Library" for this year—viz., "Martensen's Social Ethics," and "Weiss's New Testament Theology," vol. 1; also Meyer's Commentary on "Hebrews" (1 vol.), and "James and John" (1 vol.) This now completes the "Meyer Series" in twenty volumes. The following are also preparing for publication:—"Final Causes," by Mons. Paul Janet, second edition; Uhlhorn's "Charity in the Primitive Church;" "The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit," by Professor Smeaton, D.D. (Cunningham Lectures); Hefele's "History of Church Councils," vol. 3 (to the Council of Chalcedon). Of the "Bible-class Handbook" series, three more volumes are in the press—"Genesis," by Marcus Dods, D.D.; "Romans," by Principal Brown, D.D.; and "The Reformation," by Professor Lindsay, D.D.

MESSRS. BENTLEY AND SON announce for the new season "A Memoir of Lord Hatherley," by the Rev. Prebendary Stephens; "The Retrospect of a Long Life," by Mr. S. C. Hall; "Personal Reminiscences of Lord Stratford de Redclyffe and the Crimean War," by the author of "Frontier Lands of the Christian and the Turk;" a large paper edition of "Jane Austen's Novels" (the Steventon edition); "In the Land of Misfortune," by Lady Florence Dixie, author of "Across Patagonia," &c., with numerous illustrations by Major Fraser and Captain C. F. Beresford, R.E., engraved by Whymper and Pearson; "Notes upon some of Shakespeare's Plays," by Frances Anne (Fanny) Kemble, in one vol. demy 8vo., finely printed in an especial ink; "Old Coaching Days; or, Road Sketches in Bygone Days," by Stanley Harris ("An Old Stager"), with numerous full-page illustrations by John Sturgess; "Brighter Britain," a full description of life in Northern New Zealand, with chapters upon the Maories, natural history, productions, gold digging, &c., with appendix on New Zealand literature by William Delisle Hay; "In the Black Forest," by Charles W. Wood, author of "Through Holland," "Round about Norway;" "Memoirs of the Duchess of Abrantes (Madame Junot)," a new edition, with numerous portraits on steel of the Bonaparte family; "The History of Antiquity," from the German of Professor Max Duncker, by Dr. Evelyn Abbott, the sixth and concluding volume; "Letters to a Friend," by the late Connop Thirlwall, D.D., Bishop of St. David's, and edited by the late Dean Stanley, a new and much enlarged edition; "Some Experiences of a Barrister's Career," by Mr. Sergeant Ballantine, a new and revised edition (being the fifth); and "Turning Points in Life," by the Rev. Frederick Arnold, author of "Christ Church Days," a new edition.

Our Contemporaries.

THE LATE DR. PUSEY.

The Spectator writes:—

The character of Dr. Pusey's influence will, of course, be differently judged by every different mind and class of opinion, but upon one point at least all will be agreed. If it is good that the Church, as a teaching corporation, should be alive, should be comprehensive, and should at least endeavour to reach the body of the people, the total result of Dr. Pusey's life was distinctly good. His followers, apart from their distinctive tenets, woke up the English Church, which was fast sliding into the morass which has so often beguiled it, a cold and decorous profession of tremendous doctrines to which no living importance was attached, and which, when once the vitality was out of them, choked up the religious intelligence. They restored learning to its importance. They gave back to public worship its attractiveness. They got at, or tried to get at, human beings with souls, instead of confining themselves to respectables. With a zeal which often led them into absurdities, especially in the way in which they pressed symbolism on the attention of a people traditionally impatient of symbols, they aroused an attention which, whether it became at last reverence or rejection, was at least the necessary condition of effective and living thought. They taught energetically a lofty morality more dogmatic than that of the Broad Church, and, therefore, more certain in its application; while it was free from that taint of earthiness, of the desire to make the best of both worlds, of the latent belief that God gives flocks and herds to the good, which so spoils for all the higher minds the usual teaching alike of the old Clapham Evangelicals, and of most, though not quite all, the Nonconformist sects. Surface Puseyism seemed to the body of Englishmen, and in many respects was, a rather contemptible imitation of Rome, which at least avoids the folly of exaggerating localism, and talking as if a Christian Church could have geographical boundaries; but the inner Puseyism proved itself a vitalising force, in a country where the temptation of every creed is to lose its vitality under a crushing load of smug respectabilities.

The Saturday Review attributes chiefly to Dr. Pusey the fact that we have now in our country—

A spiritual organisation whose title-deeds are recognised as going back to the very beginnings of English social life, and which is now a marvel of the world in its renewed youth, for the length and breadth and depth of its sympathies; for the matchless daring and multiplicity of its enterprises, at home and in every quarter of the world; for the minuteness of its solicitudes, and for its singular gift of attracting the willing labour, not only of its ministerial order, but of that vast body of laity, both men and women, among whom it exists and for whom it dispenses its privileges. Of this quiet revolution the central, and approximately the earliest, agency was the unaided action of a few devoted Oxford men; and of these the one from whom the popular name of the movement was borrowed has just passed away in peaceful old age. The ascetic, affectionate, high-born, and deeply-read professor at Oxford; the man whose speech was so thrilling, his writing so profound, his personal influence so electric.

The Record says:—

What can we say of Dr. Pusey's life-work? We see in Dr. Pusey one who has laboured earnestly, sedulously, powerfully, to turn the Church of England from the right way, to destroy the work of our forefathers, by overwhelming it in the soul-destroying superstitions and cunning inventions from which, at the sacrifice of their own lives, the Reformers were enabled by God's grace to rescue our Church. Newman was content to go alone to Rome; Pusey desired to take the Church of England with him. If ever there was a man who, endowed with great powers, used them to a large extent to the injury of the truth; if ever there was a man commissioned to do important work for the edifice of God, who yet built wood, hay, stubble, "work that shall be burned," that man was Dr. Pusey.

The Tablet says:—

A leader of religious thought, in any proper sense of the word, Dr. Pusey could not claim to be. But his personal influence was always great, nor was it, in the long run, injurious to many of those who most strongly experienced it. No inconsiderable number of his disciples have now the happiness to be Catholics. Outstripping their master, seeking a clearer atmosphere than that in which he was content to dwell, a broader and firmer grasp of divine verities than that which he possessed, they have found, one after another, their way to the region of light, the fulness of truth. Thus the late Pope was led to liken him to a church bell, summoning others to the household of faith, but himself remaining without. Upon the actual religious controversies of late years in the Church of England he exercised but little influence. He belonged to a day in which there were giants, and he moved among the lesser men, whose cause he defended, but with something of heroic mien.

The Christian World writes:—

It would, perhaps, not be any exaggeration to say that a very numerous section, especially among the laity of the Established Church, would not shrink from adopting the language of quaint old Thomas Fuller, when, after describing the death and funeral of a man at the antipodes of ecclesiastical opinion, unfortunate Robert Browne, he adds: "And it is no hurt to wish that his bad opinions had been interred with him." Such a wish, indeed, may be perfectly consistent with the most thorough recognition of all that was tender and kindly, and even noble, in the man, of his ability as a scholar, his loyalty as a friend, his constancy as a thinker, and his devotion as a Christian. It is a question not of a man, but of a system; not of the personal qualities of a teacher, but of the practical tendencies of his teaching; not of the beauty of a life, but of the nature of an influence which is very widely diffused, and must tell either for good or evil both on the Church and the country. There is no want of charity on the part of those who believe that the influence of Dr. Pusey has been distinctly adverse to all enlightened progress, and that it has contributed to the revival of a mediæval superstition which is pregnant with danger, both to freedom and to religion, if they desire that the effect of the teaching should cease with the life of the teacher. Dr. Pusey was opposed to some of the strongest, and, as we believe, most beneficent tendencies of the age, offered a strenuous resistance to all progressive reform, sought by every means within his power to revive the authority of the Church and the dominion of the priesthood. All this is reaction, and reaction of the worst kind. Restore the priest and the confessional, and an impressive service with soft and subduing music and all the attractions which art can bring, would be but sorry compensation. The question most vital to human liberty and true religion are involved in the teachings of Dr. Pusey. The Protestantism of England is on the one side; he was, and his party still are, on the other. It is a battle of the Church against the right of the individual conscience, and as we have absolute faith in the fullest recognition of that right, we cannot hesitate as to our judgment on the character of that system of which Dr. Pusey was the chief exponent and the ablest champion.

LIBERAL CONGREGATIONALISTS.

We have frequently said that a very considerable part of the ministry of the Congregational denomination, though they are supposed to preach the theology of the old Puritans, are in reality either Unitarians or Universalists. The Congregationalist, of Boston, the leading newspaper of that communion, it seems, agrees with us exactly. This is what it said in a recent discussion of the subject:—

"We maintain that a theory of inspiration which exhausts its force in the statement that the Bible contains a revelation from God (without itself being one); that a theory of the Atonement which denies its sacrificial, in order to assert purely its moral quality and influence; and a theory of the future life which holds out to the sinner in some form a hope of probation beyond death, are not evangelical theories. They are essentially Unitarian and Universalist, and fall outside of the line which, by common understanding, divides between the evangelical and unevangelical bodies."

The younger men in the Congregational pulpits seem to be very generally affected by the prevailing religious scepticism. Nearly all the cleverest of them are Universalists, and some of the honestest and boldest avow their doubts of inspiration. They are as far removed from the orthodox Puritan theology as Dr. Channing was when he seceded from the Congregational body to found Unitarianism. They have the same indefinite faith as that disclosed in the sermons of that eloquent divine who wrought so great a change in the religious thought of New England. Like him, they preach a sublimated morality rather than the theology they were educated to expound.

Those preachers, however, do not follow the example of Dr. Channing in leaving the Congregational Church. Their flocks are in sympathy with them. They are all the more popular because of their Unitarianism or Universalism. Accordingly, they are likely to grow bolder and bolder in their liberalism.

Knowing the feeling of the churches, ecclesiastical councils are usually afraid to declare such ministers heretical, though there can be no doubt that the logical consequence of their teachings, of their loose theology, is downright infidelity. Even if a council does pronounce against a minister, he can find churches enough which will be glad to get him as a pastor, provided that he sufficiently sugar coats his scepticism. The average congregation of these days would not tolerate a man in its pulpit who talked about hell. Nor is it alarmed when its minister avoids embarrassing disclosures by giving the fundamental doctrines of Puritan theology the go-by. It has no relish for what the churches of a generation or two ago regarded as the strong meat they required for their spiritual up-building.

It is time, therefore, for the orthodox party led by the Congregationalist to bestir themselves to protect the old Puritan theology from obliteration. Would not they do better if they boldly separated themselves from the rising party of liberalism which wears the livery of orthodoxy only to serve scepticism? Religious earnestness and religious sincerity are lacking in New England. There is too much pretence of belief where there is really no belief. It would be a good thing to make everybody show his true colours.

BY THE REV. ROBERT COLLYER, NEW YORK.

"A servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God."—Romans i. 1.

It was a real trouble when your old friend and fellow-townsmen, Dr. Dewey, died, and his family sent for me to conduct the funeral services, that I was far away from my home, and so missed the message I should otherwise have answered by taking the first train.

Those were days of such pressing care, indeed, that I had not kept track of the papers, and so did not hear one word of our friend's death until the Monday after the funeral; and then the news came to me very sweetly, and fell in with the spirit and temper of the time, like a whisper from heaven. I was sitting with some dear old friends in Chicago; and we were talking of the old times, and the brevity of life. It was a very tender talk, but a little sad, and was likely to grow more sad still, when one of the company struck a more cheerful note. He said that after all these complaints we are so apt to make about the swift passage of time and the brevity of our mortal existence, life, as a rule that we can trust, is ample enough for all our needs, and should be ample enough for all our desires; that very much of this talk we hear is not true, and is mingled in many men of the mere lust of life for its own sake, and of an egotism no man should dare to nourish, who would rest in the eternal providence. Indeed, he said, I have known those who, nearing the line of fourscore, have grown tired and a little heartsick of the burden of the years, because they found they were but another name for labour and sorrow, and so were ready to cry with the psalmist, "Oh, that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest." I said: I have one dear friend, who has come to just this conclusion—my dear old friend, Dr. Dewey. He is in his eighty-eighth year. I went to see him last summer, and he told me how tired he was, and how he longed to go. "But Dr. Dewey is dead," my friends answered, "he died on such a day." It was the first word that had come to me, and yet the tidings brought a touch of joy threading itself through the sorrow I felt that I should see his face and hear his voice no more. I thought of the longing that was in his heart when I parted with him for this great and blessed boon of death; then of the great sorrow that had fallen on him in the winter, in the death of the dearest friend he had on the earth outside of his own family—in the death of Dr. Belows; then of the long and gracious span of the years which had fallen to his lot, of the sunny heart he had carried through all his pilgrimage, and the ever-gentle, loving spirit, and of the grand day's work he had done, which he himself thought of to the last so humbly and with such a beautiful misgiving. I thought of the times also which had come to him as they had come to all men of a true spiritual vision, when the mysteries of our human life press very sore on the heart and brain—times when faith sinks down to zero, and hope loses her radiant upward look, and can soar and sing no longer, and only love remains, and the city of God is hidden in the mists of doubts we cannot master. I thought also of the years of pain and frustration he had endured with such a noble patience—years when the spirit in him so eager and hungry to work while it was day had to fall back before the great walls of hindrance, and it would be very hard to believe that "they also serve who only stand and wait." He had not much to say about this, because his heart was too great to make the world a sounding-board for his complaints, and compel all who came near him to share his trouble; but those who knew him intimately in New York have told me how sore and sad this chapter was in his life. It is all done with now, I said, when I heard the angel of release had come and borne him away to the rest that remains. The burden of the years is lifted. Doubt, fear, pain, and frustration—these are all over. The former things have passed away: there is no more sorrow, nor crying, nor pain.

And I felt since then that it might be of some worth to us all to hold a memorial service for our great and dear friend, and have asked for this privilege of coming to Sheffield to hold such a service with you. It is the one place on all the earth he loved most dearly, and is blended most intimately with his life, as it will be, through the long years to come, with his memory. It is of all places the fittest, also, because the heart was in him which cleaves for ever to the old home nest, and to the memories of our childhood and our youth. These mountains were dear to him, on which the mists lay far away back in the century, and the great purple shadows. He loved them as the farmer's boy in Bethlehem loved Carmel and Sharon; and these green lanes and the wild upland pastures were dear to him—through which he wandered in those old days, dreaming his happy or his troubled dreams—and the river and the woods. He lived for many years far away from the old place, and won such honour and esteem wherever he went that it would have been no great wonder to find that he was weaned of this love and liking at last, and had begun to forget his old home and his old friends. He was not a man of that nature. There was no joy greater than this—that he could always return here in the sweet summer time, clasp childhood, youth, and manhood together, find his old friends and companions so long as any were left, and, if I may read his heart by my own, count no honour quite so dear as that which came to him in the place where he was brought up. Nor would he care so much for this because he was a minister of the very first distinction, but because he was still one with you and one of you, and above all was the son of Silas and Mary Dewey, who were among the pioneers of this town, and with some of our own fore-elders made good the promise—"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose."

When we think of this hard, rough life of the pioneers hidden away among these mountains a century ago, and ask how it was that such a man-child should be born and nurtured in this life to so grand a purpose, do we not seem to touch this great mystery, first of all, of which Paul speaks with such a deep assurance—of a calling and election through which God worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will? I remember talking with a wise old gardener once about his flowers; and, in the course of our conversation, he told me how he would sow a thousand seeds in some choice corner of his garden, would watch them and tend them all alike, and so give each seed an equal chance. But then a day would come when one plant in the seed plot would arrest his attention by some hint of an excellence he did not find in the rest. There was no difference in the seed or soil, and he had made none hitherto in his care. The difference lay deeper than the turn of his hand or the glance of his eye. The little mite had caught and treasured something the rest had missed. There was a promise in it of a new and nobler variety; but when this was done, he said, or how it was done, no man could guess. All he could be sure of was this: that, when the rain and sunshine had done their best for all the flowers in his garden, this would still stand forth in its own singular and separate beauty, elected, shall I say, and justified and glorified.

And we may notice this law of life in our human family. The children come to us from God, and fill our home with blessing; and, in such homes as I love to think of, they are all alike welcome and wonderful, so that when you hear the fathers and mothers talk of them, you might imagine there never were such children since the world was made. But the years sweep on; and then one in a town like this of yours begins to reveal a new and very noble promise, like that my friend found among his flowers, and then the time comes when the town is very proud and glad for this gift of God in one of his children which has lifted the land and life into the light, and turned the human gaze that way. A man is born and raised like Ebenezer Elliot in the five-century smoke of your old mother town of Sheffield, in England, and sings of the green lanes and purple moors so that you see the moors in their summer splendour from thousands of miles away, and breathe the sweetness of the hawthorn and the primrose in the deep shadowy lanes. Or he is raised on a poor hill farm in Massachusetts, as our Whittier was, and in a community of Quakers where you would imagine that any budding forth of a fine imagination in the heart would be frozen out, root and branch. But the buds break forth and blossom on the harsh uplands, and the day comes when the farmer's boy sings of the old home and the old life so that the barren pastures stand in a light which is not of the sun, and the old log house becomes a shrine.

Now, when we try to account for this wonder, we find it touches this mystery on which the deeper heart of man in all the Christian ages has set such store, and say such men come to us through a divine ordination and are God's elect as they are ours. But when we try to touch the truth which lies on the surface of this divine and, to my mind, most beautiful mystery, we search again for a wise and steadfast father or a tender and deep-hearted mother, and still we do well, because these are the grandest factors we can lay our hands on after God's sovereignty in the sum of our human life; and in this way I would account for the advent of your great friend and fellow-townsmen. The son of these pioneers, he was one of God's elect. You cannot accept that truth more frankly than I do, when I think of him, and of the life out of which he sprang. And then, as the inevitable sequence of this truth, he came to you and to us through these conditions which made his calling and election sure.

For the old man could look back to his childhood and youth, and find there the true father for such a son as my old friend was, the true gardener for his choice and rare flower; a man, as I have heard, to whose heart great books were as the bread of life, and who made the poets of the old days especially his companions as he toiled on his farm, and who, loving them, must have grown like them through his loving; for that is the eternal law. They say he was a man also whose heart hungered after the words of those to whom God had given eloquence, and nursed his soul on all such things rather than on this world's gain and pleasantness. He was a man, too, who saw the promise quite early in this boy God had given him, the loves which budded forth for the almighty book rather than the almighty dollar, and was glad to find it as men are glad who find hid treasures, and spared the boy to his books as far as this was possible in that life of the early days when each hand must do its full stint, and encouraged him in his quest for knowledge, feeling this would be the best possible investment he could make; for that noble brain and those gleaming eyes were as the seal of heaven to him that the boy would find his way into an ampler world than this which lies within your mountains, and make vocal, please God, the dumb longings and yearnings he was aware of always in his own heart. Silas Dewey was a poet in the depths of his nature, as I make out his story, as William Burns was, and as the father of Rosa Bonheur was a painter, though he never rose above the rank of a drawing-master, and had to be content to give lessons and wonder over this child who was drinking at the fountains, while he was sipping as it were from the hollow of his hand. Silas Dewey was, in one word, a father of the grand old New England type, and just the father, as their life was laid out for them, to raise such a boy; and as the father was, so was the mother—not like in like, but like in difference. For Mary Dewey was a woman of a simple and pure piety, who knew but little of books, perhaps, and did not care for very much that touched her husband's heart, as is often the case with very noble women, but who loved God and all goodness, and, fearing Him in all reverence, lost all other fear. It may be as I say this, and you remember that I am the minister of a church which professes to have no dealings with the doctrines Mary Dewey held so dear, that you will say I accept the woman because she was Orville Dewey's mother, but denounce the creed. Believe me when I say I have no such intention, and that to my mind there is no finer man or womanhood in the world than the Puritan faith she held so dear has given us; and I only make this saving clause, that Mary Dewey seems to have been of the fruit which grows on the sunny side of the grand old Puritan tree. This is to be said also—that she was able to impart to her boy that absolute assurance of God's presence in our world and our life which became the deep and sure foundation of his Christian ministry. And so as I think of her, if you should ask me whether a mother of another faith, my own for instance, might not have been of a choicer worth to this boy, I should make two answers to your question. First, he could not have another mother. Mary Dewey was the one woman in all the world and all the ages to nurse such a boy so that he might make his calling and election sure. And then when we think of the men who are to speak to us, as Orville Dewey did, of those deep things of God and of our life that stir us as the sound of a trumpet, and touch us like white fire, and convince us because the preacher is convinced—when we want a man who is the word, we say then that man cannot be nursed and nurtured into this power and grace by a mother who could not tell you for the life of her what she believes, or whether she believes anything surely beyond what her eyes can see. Orville Dewey's mother believed in God with her whole heart—in His divine sovereignty, in His presence in our world and our life—and her son in this was of the mother's heart. Blessed are the sons, I say, who have such mothers as Mary Dewey, call them by what name you will; for they maintain the Church of the living God.

It was evident also, while he was still a child, that, like Samuel, he would be one of those who abide by the altar, and minister all their life in holy things. This was a religious genius that was hidden away in the little farm-house; and this man-child was called to be an apostle, and separated unto the gospel of God. So when the peddler came around with his pack, and the boy had some little choice of the book he might buy, he took Bunyan's "Grace Abounding," and pondered over that meat for the strongest men with all his fervent and eager little heart. If it had been my boy, I think I should have said, Take the Pilgrim, my lad, and so have trusted he might drink the pleasant milk of that rare book, and be content to sit down with the shepherds, as I did, and do some pleasant singing in the valley. The "Grace Abounding" did not abound with grace for the little reader. The shadows were heavy and the light was dim at the best, and I fear that in those days the Church was not so gentle toward the children as she is now, thank God, and did not mind the good old tinker's warning that hard nuts spoil tender teeth; so his life grew sad to him early.

His sense of moral responsibility was very painful: he was a boy of ten years, and was trying at the problems that trouble men of thirty. Still, the trend of his heart and life lay toward these high things, and they were clear in their minds who had to fend for him that he should go to college. So William Maynard, whose memory was fragrant to him quite to the end of his long life, prepared him, by a year's thorough schooling, for his great adventure; while your townsman, Squire Lee, gave him Greek.

He went to Williams. There was trouble by this time in the eyes, I hear; for the lad seems to have laid heavy burdens on himself then, as he did for so many years after, and made his body the slave instead of the servant it should be of the spirit, or the cherished companion. Then, as he went on with his studies, the heart in him yearned over those who were in darkness and the shadow of death; and he went out as he found time, and tried to preach the gospel. But it was no real gospel, while this darkness lay on his own soul which had endured since his boyhood. So he pondered over these things again, as they all do who are of his election; and he could not rest, for the time had come for the new birth. When darkness fled away, the light came rushing in like a sunrise in the tropics; and he said, "It was as if another sun had risen in the sky." The heavens were unspeakably brighter, and the earth fairer; and from this time the gloom left him for ever that had troubled him so sorely, and he thought of God as a father of an intimate, tender love.

He used to say, also, that this decided him to enter the ministry; but, if I understand him, it was only a human glimpse he had caught of the divine ordination, and the writing on earth of that which was already written in heaven. I think the option was no more in his hands or heart than it was in the hands and heart of Luther to champion the Reformation, or of Angelo to build St. Peter's, or of Columbus to find this New World, for and the grand divine doom of Orville Dewey was to preach the Gospel. He still held with Calvin, but the fruit we are gathering now with a joy deep as tears was setting again on the sunny side of the tree; and if he had died in the faith to which he was born he would have been a preacher of the order of Thomas Chalmers, and made the grand old verities radiant and winsome beyond my power to tell through the light which had come to him when it seemed as if another sun had risen in the sky. But the eager young soul had sown in recklessness, and was now reaping in dimness. He had to come home and rest those poor eyes, and did this while he was teaching school here in Sheffield; but, maimed as he was, the traditions still hold good of the supreme excellence of his teaching. He went after that year to the metropolis, where he was destined in the full time to be such an influence for good, and did what he might do through one year to earn his bread. Then he went to Andover to try what could be done with such poor sight as remained, and used it on Hebrew—I wonder at that, and how he managed to see at all reading Hebrew—got a lift from his generous roommate on Greek—but what did such a spirit want with Hebrew and Greek anyhow?—thought his own way in theology, as he had no eyes, poor lad, for the institutes and systems; and, thinking for himself, we must not wonder that he thought—I will not say beyond them, but to quite another purpose. He was led by a way which he knew not, and the Holy Spirit of truth brought him into a large place. He seems to have been a heretic of about the pattern his Alma Mater and his mother Church are now beginning to accept, and to show through such acceptance that the divine life is still beating strong in their heart. He was not born out of due time, that was not possible. He was born, as the prophets always are, to usher in the morning.

But doom is doom through man's free will";

He went to Gloucester and split the Church, but was wise while he was true, and would not leave the wedge in chasm; for the last purpose in his honest heart was to steal a meeting-house, and then say God had bid him do it. Then they heard of this youth, who was stirring the hearts of the fishermen on the Cape so wonderfully, in Boston, and besought him to come, I think in 1818, to be co-pastor with Channing; and he says he was able to sympathise thoroughly with a brother minister who had to preach in Channing's pulpit once, while the master sat there to listen, and had taken for his text, "Forgetting the things that are behind." For, of all things in the world, he could not forget how those wonderful eyes were watching, and this man who had stormed New England was listening to his words. But, if we could imagine any mistake made in a matter sincere and true as Heaven on both sides, I would say it was a mistake for Orville Dewey to be so intimate as he was then with Dr. Channing.

Channing had hurt his body past all mending many a year before this by hard usage, and held on now to life by the frailest tenure; while his convictions of what a man should do for God and his fellow-men had a certain ruthlessness in them, dangerous to such a nature as this of his young companion, and likely to add fuel to that fire which had hurt him so sadly as a boy. One longs, therefore, for a companion and friend for him, who would have made the yoke easy and the burden light; but, as it was not so, we must leave the matter as we find it, to say that when our young apostle went to New Bedford, in the year your speaker of to-day was born, and did there the most precious work of his life, he did it in a way that reminds one of the saying that it is not the work, but the pace, that kills. I have met men and women who could tell me of the New Bedford preacher. The best heart and life in that lonely old town still beats and pulses with the power he gave forth. Men and women have told me how they would make errands there to hear Dr. Dewey, and excuses when reasons failed, and travel far out of their way, and count all things of this sort but loss for the choicest gain, that they might take away a sermon which would stay with them all their life. Only one man in all the world doubted now and then whether this was one of God's elect preachers talking there down by the sea, and that man was the preacher himself. It was a spell he wrought and cast over them,—God's spell we call the gospel. His trouble with the eyes had prevented him from reading much that others have said, but this left him at liberty to make good the poet's thought that "The spirit which from God is made

The noblest of its kind,
Asks not the help of rules that serve
To guide the feeble mind :
It soars, however bold its flight,
Right onward safe and free,
And all that schools and books can teach
In its own self can see.
What charms this soul all souls shall charm,
What grieves it saddens all :
It holds the choices of the world
Within its subtle thrall."

But again, if they can be wrong who are so close to God as that Church was and its minister, they were all wrong. They were so eager to listen and he was so eager to preach that for ten years he wrote two of these sermons which came out of his innermost heart and brain every week, with rare exceptions; and, not content with this, must be working for the journals, which were always urging him on to write. And the result was that, as your elder men remember, the splendid, delicate brain revolted against this savage mastery; and Orville Dewey at forty became a broken man. He came to New York with the threat of that trouble in him forty-seven years ago, and our city answered at once to his deep and searching appeals for God's truth and for a diviner life. They crowded to hear him, standing in the aisles; and old men will still tell you how long, long ago they heard Mr. Dewey preach some great sermon which made an era in their lives and turned them from darkness to light,—how the sweet and solemn music of which the words were blended stole over your heart and held you, and how the word seemed to be of God's own saying as it came from his heart. Some of the best men we have ever known in New York answered to his word by deeds as noble; while others were of the make of a young man I heard of, who went to hear him for a few Sunday nights, and, as he went out one evening, was heard to whisper, "I must either quit hearing that man or quit sinning."

He did a very grand work in New York, but he was lamed as he did it, and could not make so many new sermons; but the old sermons, whenever he would preach them, were heard as eagerly as the new, and he was not the man to be ashamed of the word he had once said, and try to disguise it with a new text and a new exordium and peroration any more than the great poets would palter with their poems once done perfectly, but said it all frankly over again. And when a dear friend said to him one day as they were going to some special service, "What are you going to give them?" and, when he told him, said again, "Why, everybody will remember that sermon," the doctor flashed out with that bright humour, which lay hidden in his heart to the last, and answered, "I wish you would preach a sermon anybody could remember."

I said he was a lamed man when he came to New York, and yet I think his work there was in many ways the most beautiful and noble ever done in the pulpit on that island. And his power went far beyond his pulpit. I remember going to see a dear friend once, who lived a thousand miles from here, who was in great trouble. He had lost his wife: she was lying dead in the house. She was his one great joy, and I used to think it was with him as it is with so many men, that he only loved God through his love for the good woman God had given him for a wife. So I said to myself as I went toward his house: What can I do to help my friend? What can I say to him? He looked at me when I sat down beside his dead wife with a light in his eyes I had not imagined I could see. He had been reading a book by Orville Dewey, and told me how in the great desolation he had taken him up as a mother takes her pained child to her heart. He had found words in the book that had made another heaven possible besides this in which he had been living that had fled away, and broken up the vast despair.

Last summer, with all these things in my heart that I had heard of or seen, I came to Sheffield to see this grand old man. You will not wonder when I tell you that I have marked my visit down as one of the great and most precious memories I am able to look back on in all my life. Here was the home he had lived in, when he could first remember. I heard about the old days, and of the kith and kin who had gone forward into the great Divine mystery, of the steadfast father and the mother, who was as Mary in the old time, and of the time when the one wonderful revelation had come to him, which had been the lode-star of his life, that God is love and God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. I remember also how the tears sprang to his eyes, dim then with age and feebleness, as he told me of that revelation, and what it was to him in those early days when he was hungering and thirsting for some truth that would fill his heart full and make good the words of the Master. Whosoever shall eat of the bread I give shall hunger no more; and how this truth of the love of God had stayed by him and in him, staunch and true, as he was feeling his way through the mists that were all about him, and had led him finally to the faith he held, and which he tried to preach for so many years after. There was a very lovely humility about it all. It did not touch you, as you heard him talk, that he felt he had done much, but rather that the best had been done through him; and I would fain have praised him, but he would not hear one word of that. Yet when I told him of my old friend, far away on the earth and in time sitting by his dead wife, and of others, who had confessed to his power to keep them in their sore need, these things touched him with a solemn joy, because they were not of works but the grace of God, as he thought of the past and saw it standing in the diviner light of long ago. He told me something of his ministry in New Bedford, and of those two sermons every week—how eager he was to preach and how it burnt in him, like a fire, this love of God to man, and then how the work became a woe, which had been such a perpetual delight.

They say that the word we translate "old and full of years" should be made to read "old and satisfied." It is the best word I can think of to describe the feelings of your great old friend, as I found him here last summer. He was satisfied, not with the worth of his life, but the length of his days, which had done so much to dissolve the tabernacle, while his heart beat still to the primal purpose, and his mind still brooded over the grand old themes—old as the heavens and new as this day. For, in the few words the old man could say, I found this pure charm, that he was still young in his thinking, as we all should be. The new problems were all floating into his room where he sat, and he was by no means satisfied to give them answers that were well enough forty years ago. Here was a man who durst look any truth in the face, or an error, and try to make true answers, but who must feel that the answer was from God and of God. "Tell me," I said, "how you would preach other than you have done, if you could begin again." He pondered a moment, his voice was broken but his eyes shone, he lifted his weak hand above his head, and said, "I should try to fill my sermons more and more with faith in the eternal love, the eternal presence, and the eternal providence within the eternal laws." And, thinking of my visit, this feeling stays with me deeper than all the rest, that my old friend was still greatest in that which had touched men in the old time. Broken as he was and feeble, I could still hear the echo of the old touching wonder which held so many hearts once in its sweet thralldom and did so much during Dr. Dewey's stay in our city of New York to mould and inspire our human life. His heart seemed to dwell in a solemn sense of the pregnancy of true human speech. He was one of those men of whom I think it may be said, "The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us"; and he knew what the Scripture means—for every idle word God will bring you into judgment. He loved this beautiful world, and, while he might do it, took a vast delight in life, as I have heard; and our human nature was as another Bible to him, over which he never ceased to wonder and ponder and learn new lessons. The whole basis of his noble thought and his pure and true love was his sense of its close kinship to God and of the world we live in, as the work of his hand, rising for ever into a nobler light and life.

Once, when crossing the Atlantic, I noticed how low the sky seemed day after day; and then there came a day when the storm broke on us and drove us up toward Cape Race, so that we could see the light shining steady and clear on the far wild headland. And the day broke in storm, and until high noon it was the wildest weather I ever saw. But after noon the storm abated, and then the clouds lifted, and we began to say to each other, "See that sky." There was an infinite deepness and brightness, revealing vaster spaces than I had ever seen, and a sweeter colour while the clouds drifted away to the south; and the sun and sea touched you at the sun's setting like John's vision on Patmos. So the heavens are growing clearer and wider and deeper to the human heart through the living word of men like Orville Dewey. God is lifting the clouds through such ministries, and decking them with its new light. They bid us look up as we bid each other look up that day, and in the old day they stood on the headland and shot their light out across the darkness; and this light was the living word, which will win the whole world at last to love Him they loved so supremely, and to serve Him in the confidence of dear children. Let us thank God for such men then, and not sorrow because they have gone, but be glad with a great gladness because they came on this great mission to say this living word. We think of Orville Dewey as dead; he is living and must live. New York is a better city beyond my power to guess than it would have been but for the fourteen years of his ministry among us there. We have nobler merchants, the sons of those who caught the inspiration from his heart, and fairer Churches of every name, and a greater and wider life. So I have but one more word to say. He belongs to you in this valley and this town by birth and nurture, and he rests here after the long day's work. I bid you treasure his dust, and lay his beautiful and simple life to your heart. Read his books, keep his memory green, and be glad that God gave you such a man. He was what many cannot be in his faith; but he was your boy and your man, and now he is your saint. And, if you can do no better, you can do as my old mother did when I had left the Church of my childhood, and she came to hear me preach, and then said, "My lad, I am not sure that I can believe in thy doctrines, but I believe in thee." It is really all I care for in this word to you, that you should feel, as I do, how among men in this century no man has more sincerely spoken God's word according to his deepest insight and conviction than Orville Dewey, no man has more deeply impressed us with a sense of the sacredness of our human life and its high destiny; and, if we could explore his heart and life to its depths, I believe we should all say the Church of his father and mother never raised a truer son. He came through this mystery which was the great corner-stone, or would you have me say one of the five great corner-stones of their faith who nursed him. He was elected to this great calling, he is justified now and glorified; and, if God be for him, who can be against him?

See in the west how grand yon mountain stands,
Its base rock-rooted and its lofty brow
Serene, alike in sunshine and the storm.
In its recesses, birds and runlets sing,
Its groves are fresh with beauty, fountains gush
Amidst its thickets, and the wild flowers blow
By sylvan paths all through its templed shades;
About its borders, quiet farms are tilled,
And life is nourished there, and praise ascends
Through all the days to Him who is unseen.
So strong and firm upon the Living Rock,
Whose waters slake the cravings of the world
Stood our great friend in God's eternal day,
Clothed on with beauty, making music sweet
That held in holy thrall the hearts of men
Till Christ should enter in and sup with them,
Unmoved by storms that prostrate faithless souls,
And calmly waiting the new earth and heaven.

ABERDEEN.—The Rev. G. T. Walters, one of the founders of the Junior Liberal Association of this town has been elected one of its Vice-Presidents.

PLYMOUTH.—On Sunday evening the annual service of harvest thanksgiving was held in the Unitarian Chapel. With it was united the children's service, which had been postponed from the time originally appointed for in it May last, because of the chapel jubilee services falling upon that date. There was a numerous and respectable congregation. The communion table, the recesses behind the pulpit, and the chandeliers were tastefully decorated with flowers and foliage; and there was also a fine display of fruit. The floral and fruit tributes were arranged by the ladies of the congregation. At the close of the service these fruits and flowers were distributed amongst the sick members of the congregation, and some were sent for the comfort of patients in the hospital. It being a children's service the sermon was a brief discourse specially adapted to the juvenile portion of the congregation. The preacher, the Rev. W. Sharman, chose as his text the 13th verse of the 2nd chapter of the 1st Epistle of John: "I write unto you little children because ye have known the Father."

CAUTION.—The Rev. C. Howe, of Notting-hill, writes requesting us to warn the Unitarian public against a young woman who represents herself as a near relative of the Rev. C. J. McAlester, in great temporary distress, with three children, and a husband out of a situation. Mr. Howe has ascertained that the woman is wholly unknown to the minister whose name she is using, and on a visit to the address she gave no such person was known there. She asks for work and then for money, is about twenty-eight years of age, of medium height, dark complexion, and respectably dressed.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Cocoa Essence for afternoon use.

FREE INQUIRY IN RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In some of the accounts of the recent meeting of the British Association at Southampton I read that the Bishop of Truro's sermon "was a splendid vindication of the liberty to inquire, and to express the results of inquiry in matters both material and spiritual; declaring that free inquiry was necessary for man's intellectual and spiritual development."

These be brave words, especially in the mouth of a Bishop. But will the Bishop of Truro, or any other Bishop, have the courage and honesty to give practical effect to them?

There was a subject of unquestionable importance—relating to marriage and some cognate matters—on which I had drawn conclusions from the facts of Scripture which were not exactly in accordance with commonly received opinions, but which appeared to me, and to many other persons who had read my book, "Hagar," to be obvious and irresistible. As I could not obtain adequate attention to this subject from a private application to the Bishop of London and other authorities in the Church, I at length endeavoured to bring the matter publicly before the Convocation of this Province during the last session. But the Bishops took no notice whatever of my petition—thinking, I suppose, that any inquiry into the subject would be "inconvenient." When, therefore, I heard that the Bishop of Truro—a Bishop of this province—was advocating free inquiry in all matters, "both material and spiritual," I at once took the liberty of writing to his Lordship to ask if he was prepared to carry out this principle in regard to my own case, and the serious injustice of which I had complained. That is now four weeks ago; and I have not yet received from his Lordship a single word of reply or acknowledgment.

What am I to suppose is the reason of his silence? That the Bishop did not mean what he said in his sermon? or that he intended his "free inquiry" to be strictly limited to such subjects and to such conclusions as the Bishops generally might approve of?

How, indeed, can a Bishop or well-beneficed Clergyman indulge in free inquiry in spiritual matters? If his investigations should lead him to any opinions not exactly conformable to what is legally required or even conventionally expected of him, he knows that either he must stifle them in his own breast, or else, if he should honestly avow them, it will be at the cost of getting most unpleasantly into "hot water," and perhaps even of utter ruin in a professional and worldly point of view. Is it in human nature to engage in free inquiry under such circumstances?

But if a man's soul is in fetters, so that he dare not honestly look for the truth, what slavery can be more ignoble than this? what can be more unworthy of a professed minister of the God of Truth? and yet how slow is the Christian Church in arriving at a due appreciation of this great principle!

MERCER DAVIES.

THE LATE WAR IN EGYPT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It is a matter of thanksgiving—I will not say of rejoicing—that the war in Egypt is now a matter of history. We may now hope to be spared both editorial and pulpit denunciations on a subject which is only of a secondary interest. Before, however, the subject has entirely passed away permit me, with all brevity and deference to the writer of the articles in the Inquirer, to the venerable Biblical critic whose views are set forth in the letter to the Echo which appeared in your columns last week, and to my friend Mr. Wicksteed, to demur to the views expressed by them respectively. The value of Mr. Blunt's opinion on Egypt and the existence of any National party there has been fairly tested by the utter collapse of the military rebellion. Had there been such a party, it is inconceivable that in one week not only one fortified place should have been taken but that town after town should have been surrendered, and the leader of the rebellion who escaped after the first defeat could not have hidden with friends or supporters. Mr. Wicksteed asks us to believe that this war has been a stock jobbers' and bondholders' war; that is, he asks us to believe that men like Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Lord Granville, Sir Charles Dilke, and other members of the present Ministry entered into this war from no sort of patriotic motive higher than that of securing certain advantages to a few members of the Stock Exchange. [I include Mr. Bright's name, because he was responsible for all that led up to the war, even if he did not actually sanction the bombardment of Alexandria.]

I agree with Mr. Wicksteed that Mr. Gladstone, like other men, is to be judged by his deeds. But every deed has to be looked at not only in connection with surrounding circumstances, but in relation to the past career of the doer of the deed. I do not doubt that there were and are some persons in this country whose views on this question are somewhat warped by their interest in a certain class of speculative securities, but I utterly refuse to believe that Her Majesty's Ministers were influenced by such low motives in the action they took. I was one of those who regretted that the difficulties which had arisen were not capable of being solved by diplomatic means; I have no love of military glory, and no undue desire to swell the revenue of the country by paying a single penny more than is absolutely needful. But I am not so bigoted in my anti-war notions as not to see that war may be a disagreeable necessity, and this, as it seems to me, it was in the case before us. Nor am I one of those who subscribe to the doctrine embodied in the sentiment, "Our country, right or wrong." We have no special privilege accorded to us to perform all sorts of high-handed acts, irrespective of their propriety, but as a mighty nation we have cast upon us duties which we dare not disregard. We are not called upon to enlarge our borders, but we are bound to protect them. What has been done seems to me to have been done not only in the protection of our own borders, but in the cause of freedom and of good government; and I for one am proud to think that there is not a nation which could do such a work with such clean hands as ours, or under men who can point to such an excellent record as Mr. Gladstone and his confrères. As to the conundrums which are asked with reference to how such a war as this, or indeed any war, is to be regarded from the New Testament standard, I submit that they have long ceased to regulate all such matters, and that a war of self-defence is as Christian an act as pitching into a burglar or handing over a criminal to justice. According to the literal New Testament standpoint, to draw the sword on behalf of liberty, honour, or self-protection is no more justifiable than to fight for gain, or for the mere love of it.

With respect to the question of what is to be done with Arabi and the other leaders of the rebellion, it is premature to pronounce an opinion. If they have out of mere ambition plunged their country into war there is no reason why they should not receive justice, and that only. I trust it may turn out that right will be done by tempering justice with mercy.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The Committee of the London Domestic Mission Society are deeply sensible of the generosity with which their appeal on behalf of the widow and children of the late Rev. W. A. Pope has been answered throughout the country. They recognise with gladness that the sum already raised will afford a substantial provision for the stricken family, and they do not desire to put in any further claims on the goodwill and sympathy of the public. They propose, therefore, to close the fund at the end of next week, and they respectfully request the friends who have been kindly promoting collections in various congregations to make this intention known to their contributors. Donations may be sent to either of the undersigned.

ARDWICK: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A NEW CHURCH.

On Saturday afternoon last the memorial stone of the Longsight new church was laid by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A. The congregation and friends assembled at three o'clock in the schoolroom, Whitfield-street, Hyde-road, Ardwick, and headed by the Heywood Temperance Reed Band marched in procession to the site of the new building near Stockport-road. Among those present were the Revs. William Gaskell, M.A.; William Mitchell, Ardwick; C. T. Poynting, B.A., Platt; J. E. Odgers, M.A., Altrincham; T. Lloyd Jones, Hale; J. B. Lloyd, Knutsford; W. G. Cadman, Miles Platting; James Harrop, Embden-street Domestic Mission; Silas Farrington, Brook-street; J. T. Marriott, Strangeways; John McDowell, Pendleton; B. Walker, Rial-street Mission; John Moore, Swinton; Geo. Ride, Chorley; Geo. Fox, Wigan; and Messrs. Harry Rawson, Thos. Rawson, G. W. Rayner Wood, John Hadfield, John Peacock, John Heys, Edward Lawton, James Bellhouse, David Baxter, John Johnson, James Burgess, Sidney Fielden, Frank W. Holland, John Mellor, W. H. Mellor, E. Manley, Thos. Tonge, Thos. Cooke, &c.

Mr. JOHN HEYS, who presided, said that as representing the congregation and the friends of the church at Whitfield-street he felt that his first word on their behalf must be one of gratitude for the very bountiful and ample gifts that they had received, through the aid of the Manchester District Unitarian Association, for the realisation of their hopes. They were grateful, too, to those gentlemen who had laboured so long, so patiently and so assiduously on behalf of that congregation, and the sister churches, in gathering the large sum of money that had been collected for the purpose of church building. From the eldest church member to the youngest scholar of the school they had nothing but a feeling of the most profound gratitude, that so large a sum had been raised and placed at their disposal for the realisation of hopes that had been slumbering in their breasts for years past. Not the most sanguine of them could ever have dreamt that the means for erecting such a structure—as would be there when it was completed—would have come to them so easily, so promptly, and so generously. So long as they existed as a church he trusted they might always feel grateful to those who had given so liberally to the fund, to those who had had the gathering of it, and the dispensing of it, and grateful, too, for the kindly feeling that had been manifested to their church on every hand, by those who had had their patience tried in so many ways by the work which they had so generously undertaken. His next word must be of welcome to all present. He noticed there many dear and valued friends whose interest in the cause of Whitfield-street had never wavered, never weakened, and he was sure he spoke the sentiments of every one connected with that church when he said, with his whole heart they were proud and glad to see those friends on that occasion. In regard to the congregation who were going to rejoice that afternoon with their dear old friend Mr. Gaskell—(applause)—coming as he had done so readily, so promptly, though crowned with years, to perform a task for which he was so eminently qualified—in regard to the church he thought it was something like it was in the case of Topsy when asked about her own birth—she "expected she never was born, but that she "grew." He thought it was in some such way that their church came into existence. It was not born, but "it grew." Its first time of asserting itself took place on the 27th of April, 1866, when their good friend, Mr. John Phillips, of the Unitarian Herald office, preached the first sermon—the text being from Ezra, "A right way for ourselves and our little ones"—(applause). Previous to that, however, the church had existed in a sort of embryonic state, for they had had helps and fathers in those days in the person of their good friend, Mr. Harrop, of the Domestic Mission—(applause)—who from week to week came to the homes of the various families then living in Ardwick and conducted the services there. So that its removal to the church in Whitfield-street was simply a transference from their homes. He spoke what was in the breast of every member of that church who remembered those days, that they were grateful to Mr. Harrop for his kind services there. After that they went to their dear ever-remembered friend, the late Rev. T. E. Poynting, who was then the secretary of the Manchester District Association, and consulted him as to the widening of their sphere; and from the moment that the project was broached to him it had his most hearty sympathy, and as they might also well be sure, the sympathy of their venerable president, who was then president as he still was—(applause). From year to year during the whole period of sixteen years they had had the generous aid of that Association, and he must humbly bear his testimony to the good feeling that had ever existed between that Association and themselves, and the heartiness with which they had helped that congregation every time they had asked for help, and he might say that that had not been an unfrequent occurrence. As years had rolled on their pulpit was supplied by such men as their good friend Mr. Phillips, already mentioned, their dear friend Dr. Marcus, Mr. Jones of the Memorial Hall, their friend Mr. Manley, and the students of the Home Missionary Board, and from the day of opening to the day upon which they left that church to go to the Longsight Institute service had never missed being held there, not even for a single Sunday or for half a Sunday—(applause). The chief aid in connection with a church should be a Sunday school. Their friend Mr. Brooke Herford once said to them, as a sort of encouragement, when perhaps desponding at their lack of success. "You never mind success, you have the power and capacity to grow from within." He believed that had been fully realised, at least to the full measure of their success; because those who were connected with them in the main were those who had been reared in the classes of the Sunday-school and had grown up in association with their church. They were then entering upon the third stage of their being, or at least the promise of it, and he believed the promise that was before them was ample and sufficient enough, and he trusted they would all soon feel what a privilege it was to be present to aid and assist in the rearing of a church such as that would be when completed, upon a plot that for suitability was second to none in the whole district—(applause). He could easily interpret the prayer that must rise from every heart, that God's blessing would rest upon their handiwork that day, and crown its after-life with the fullest success—(applause). He was glad, though almost sorry, that they had trespassed upon their venerable Bishop to such an extent as to induce him to walk with them at the head of their procession—(applause). That procession, however, would have been greatly wanting had it not been graced by his presence—(applause). He trusted he would take no harm by his venturesome spirit; because he was never to be daunted so long as he lived, but would continue in any good work which he thought needed his help—(applause).

Mr. John Mellor then presented a silver trowel and a handsome mallet (the latter made and given by a member of the congregation) to the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, who then duly laid the stone, which bore the inscription, "This stone was laid by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., September 23rd, 1882."

Mr. GASKELL said:—I need hardly assure you that I account it no small honour to have been singled out to take the part which I have now done in the interesting ceremony of this day. The only claim which I can lay to that honour, unless that which length of days confers, is that I have always taken a lively interest in the Whitfield-street congregation, and have been ever ready to do what I could to help it—(hear, hear). Mr. Mellor has already intimated what the objects to be kept in view in their church will be. I am sure it must be gratifying to you, as it is to me, to believe that in this church the blessed Gospel of Christ will be preached free from those accretions which have grown up around it in ages of gross darkness, and have done so much, as we think, to obscure its simple beauty, and to which no little, I believe, of the prevailing scepticism and infidelity is owing—(hear, hear). Long after we are all of us gone to our rest we may trust that many, as week follows week, will come up here to worship God in the beauty of holiness; to be strengthened to resist the temptations and bear the trials and perform the duties of life in a Christian spirit. In the school, too, connected with this church we may trust that very many young people will be trained in the way in which they should go, armed for the battle of life, and prepared to come off conquerors. Well, therefore, may we be gratified at what has taken place here; feel that it has been a good and holy work in which we have been engaged, and may, without the least misgiving, ask the blessing of Heaven upon it—(applause.)

The Rev. GEORGE FOX, Wigan, having offered up a prayer,

Mr. HARRY RAWSON said: I desire, in the very first place, to offer my most hearty congratulations to the Ardwick friends on their attainment to the marked and satisfactory stage of progress of which we are the happy witnesses this day. It is the outcome of much anxiety. It is the reward of much patience. It is the result of no little self-sacrifice. It is true that you have been substantially aided by contributions from the Central Fund raised with so much enterprise and energy some two years ago; but it is also true that you have established an indefeasible right to help by showing your desire to help yourselves. Those who are acquainted, as I have the pleasure to be, with a good many members of the Ardwick congregation, will best be able to testify to the sacrifice involved in the very large subscriptions of many of them; considering them relatively to their means, they may be fairly described as not only handsome, but even as munificent—(applause). I trust, as these walls rise from the ground higher and stronger and more beautiful still, they will be regarded with sympathetic interest by all the residents of this neighbourhood who are not of your household of faith. You do not come here as aggressors and as rivals, though you are anxious to make aggressions upon sin and ignorance, and to become rivals in every good work. You will, I am sure, desire to co-operate with every established organisation in this district—(hear, hear)—which has for its aim the cultivation and promotion of the religious life, which seeks to reclaim the erring, to teach the young the principles of virtue, and to lead them in the paths of knowledge and of peace, and also to carry to those who are in the very midst of the hard battle of life consolation and comfort, courage and hope. In the "open trusts" which you have wisely adopted in connection with your new church, you declare your faith in the eternal vitality of truth. You yourselves have never subscribed to any creed, you have never been in bondage to any priest, you have never surrendered your reason to the dictatorship of any ecclesiastical organisation. Freely you have received and freely you will give. You will send down to your children the high privileges you yourselves have enjoyed, untarnished in the slightest degree. You believe in truth, and therefore in dedicating this church to the worship of God you have avoided the embarrassment of seeking to define the undefinable; you are willing to leave posterity to the enjoyment of this property with no dread that it will be alienated from them by any change in their views to which they may be led in the process of independent inquiry, and in the exercise of the right of private judgment. No penalty will follow, however divergent their views may be from those which you in this generation hold. I have only one word to add, and it is the expression of a fervent hope that in the church, the memorial stone of which we have this day laid, you may all find a religious home, a home for the cultivation of the purest and divinest affections; and that it may be to your descendants and to the neighbourhood in which it is placed a centre whence shall radiate every sweet influence of piety, virtue, and religion—(applause).

The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. C. T. POYNTING, B.A.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Gaskell having been moved by Mr. JOSEPH MITCHELL, seconded by Mr. EDWARD LAWTON, and carried with acclamation, the stone-laying proceedings terminated.

THE EVENING MEETING was very largely attended, and was held in the Mechanics' Institute, Longsight; the Rev. Wm. MITCHELL presiding.

Addresses were delivered by the Revs. DENDY AGATE, J. HARROP, W. G. CADMAN, and S. A. STEINTHAL; Messrs. G. W. RAYNER WOOD, E. MANLEY, and JOHN HEYS, and a very cordial meeting was brought to a close.

The new church is situate in a prominent position at the corner of Birch Hall-lane and Albert-road, at their junction with Stockport-road, and comprises a church in the early English Gothic style, 70ft. in length by 36ft. in width, with north and south transepts, altogether providing accommodation for four hundred persons. At the east end, fronting Birch-lane, is situated the principal entrance and vestibule, as also an ante-room for the accommodation of the congregation. At the west end will be the platform on which is placed the pulpit and organ. The choir will also be here accommodated. The vestry is conveniently situated near the end on the south side. The church will be lighted by eight large two-light windows with tracery heads and the transepts each by a large four-light window filled with tracery. Over the porch of the main front will be placed a large handsome-traceried window, which it is intended to fill with stained glass as a memorial window. The roof will be what is known as an open timber roof, being ceiled near the apex with the object of providing air space in the church. The visible woodwork of the roof will be pitch-pine, as also all the interior fittings, viz., the benches, vestibule, pulpit, doors, &c. The ventilation has received special attention in conjunction with the heating, which will be secured by means of the apparatus of R. Renton Gill, of Liverpool, which will be situated in a chamber beneath the vestry. It is intended to provide schools in connection with the church on the plot of ground at the west end of same at some future period. The church has been designed by and is being carried out under the superintendence of W. Telford Gunson, C.E., 10, Marsden-street, Manchester, and the contractor is Mr. L. C. Webster, of Brook-street, Chorlton-on-Medlock. The total amount of contract for the building, boundary walls, &c., is something under £3,000.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

The National Association for the Promotion of Social Science has been holding its twenty-fifth Congress at Nottingham, during the past few days, under the presidency of the founder of the society, Mr. G. W. Hastings, M.P. In his inaugural address, Mr. Hastings not unnaturally occupied himself with a survey of the progress which had been made by the country in the interval, in those directions to which the influence of the Congress has been chiefly directed. To the Settled Land Act of last session he attached great importance, doubting whether any greater revolution, legal and social, had been accomplished in this country. The mediæval theory was that estates were not to be sold, lest the Crown or the great lords should be robbed of their tenants, the object of the law being that sixty thousand should be maintained as the military force of the country on as many knights' fees. The system was broken down during the Commonwealth; by the Act of 12 Charles II. knight service with all its tyrannous incidents was finally abolished, and the old Saxon tenure of free socage was restored. A system of settlement subsequently sprang up which reproduced the whole mischief; but the Act just passed has provided a cure for the evil:—

"On the first of January next, when the Act comes into operation, there will not be (with small exceptions) an acre of unsaleable settled land in England. Every tenant for life, under whatever instrument his interest may have been derived, whether Act of Parliament, settlement, or will, can sell the land which he holds for life, or any part of it, subject to the conditions that he must obtain the best price to be had, and that he must invest the purchase money in approved securities for the benefit of those interested after himself. He may do this without applying to any court, or being subjected to any litigation; he can sell, in fact, as freely as if he were owner in fee simple. The exception to which I alluded is that he cannot sell the mansion house of his estate, at least without obtaining the leave of the High Court of Justice. The wisdom of this proviso may be doubted; for the price of an estate in the market often depends on the house, and if it is deprived of the character of a residential property, its selling value might be seriously diminished. Nor will some other dubious points escape the notice of a critical reader. But, taken as a whole, the Act is beyond question the most important in relation to the landed interest passed for two centuries, and one for which every landowner may well be grateful."

The Married Women's Property Act was another important measure, and these two illustrated the practical work of the association and the mutual relations between the different branches of social philosophy. More highly, however, than anything else he rated the progress that had been made in elementary education since that society came into existence. Much still remained to be achieved, and their great aim was to imbue the public mind with a sound social creed. While not claiming for the association the whole credit of such improvements, he claimed credit for it as providing a free and fair arena, without class or sectarian exclusiveness, to all who had something to teach or anything to learn on the wide questions affecting the social welfare of the people.

In the Jurisprudence Department, on the following day, Mr. Fox Bristowe, Q.C., Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, read a paper advocating such a change in the law as would make the devolution of real property in case of intestacy follow that of personality. He did not desire to prevent any one making such testamentary disposition of his estate as he thought fit within reasonable limits. Mr. Meryon White, M.A., proposed a plan for making exceptions in favour of the heirs of peers; but the general opinion of those who took part in the discussion seemed to be opposed to any such exceptional legislation.

In the Repression of Crime Section of the same Department Sir John Pope Hennessy discoursed on State-created crimes, giving prominence in this class to crimes resulting from the opium traffic. In the colony of Hong Kong, of which he is governor, he explained that one million sterling changes hands every month in the matter of opium. He remarked:—

"But with commercial activity and trade profits there comes an increase of crime from opium, from its consumption, and from its smuggling. Hong Kong wages a chronic opium war on a small scale with China. A desperate class of men, the opium smugglers, make the colony the base of their operations; they purchase cannon and ammunition there, they fit out heavily-armed junks, and engage within sight of the island in naval battles with the revenue cruisers of the Emperor of China. Sometimes the Emperor's revenue officers are killed, sometimes the smugglers. Not unfrequently wounded men of both sides are brought into the colony. All this gives rise to a class of crime difficult for the Governor to repress, difficult on account of the influence of those who profit by it, whether they are local traders or the financiers of a Viceroy. But the crime created within the colony by opium is as nothing compared with that which it is creating in China. . . . During the nine years that I have been responsible to the Queen for the good order of her Colonies in the China Seas I have constantly observed that, whilst opium-smoking may not injure the physique of some individuals, it invariably deteriorates the moral character and increases crime. . . . The responsibility of creating and spreading such crime in a nation of three hundred millions against the earnestly expressed wishes of the Empress Regent and her Ministers, and, indeed, the wishes of the whole literati of China, is a responsibility that I trust England may soon be able to shake off."

In the Health Department the desirability of further legislation as to the employment of married women in factories, with a view to diminishing infant mortality, was discussed; a resolution was ultimately adopted condemning any such special restriction.

In the Art Department the question in what way the influence of art could best be brought to bear on the masses of the population in large towns was determined very much in favour of the views of the Sunday Society, notwithstanding the bitter complaint of Mr. Hill, of the Lord's Day Rest Association, that the question of opening museums on Sunday had been raised in an indirect manner.

Bread Reform was warmly commended in the Health Department on Friday by Miss Yates, who ably sustained her contention as to the superior nourishment of wheat-meal bread against the dicta of two medical gentlemen, who suggested that the constituents of whole meal-bread, which Miss Yates commended for their nutritive qualities, were not really easily assimilated. Miss Yates, however, appealed on this point to the favourable opinion of Dr. Beddoe, of Bristol, and the majority of her hearers appeared to regard her answer as complete. "Rational Dress" was subsequently discussed, Mrs. King pleading for freedom of movement among the gentler sex, consequent on the introduction of the divided skirt, the chief difficulty as to which appeared to be the objections felt by ladies themselves to don the proposed costume.

Dr. Gilbert Smith directed attention to the need of reform in the administration of hospitals, the conclusions at which he had arrived being thus summarised:—

sick poor should be vested in a board of management, consisting of men possessing a practical acquaintance with the working of the charity, and including an adequate representation of its medical and surgical staff, and that this board be subject to periodical election by the governors. That a common council, consisting of representatives of the various large hospitals in London, should be established in order to consider the best means of managing these respective charities, and to adopt and devise a uniform system of keeping the books and accounts. That a properly constituted controlling authority should be established, whose duty it shall be to exercise an authoritative supervision over the erection, extension, and administration of all hospitals and institutions for the care of the sick, and to subject each institution to periodical inspection, and to publish an annual report of its operations. That in order to provide easy removal of the sick and wounded to the nearest hospital without aggravation to an injury, a metropolitan ambulance brigade be established and administered by a central authority, and that stations be placed more especially in localities where large numbers of men are employed. That the system of poor law medical relief be reconstructed, and the administration of the nursing department of each hospital should be in hands of a nursing committee."

In the result a resolution was adopted, requesting the council to continue their exertions to obtain the appointment of a Royal Commission with the view of obtaining reliable data upon which the reform of the metropolitan hospitals and other institutions for the medical treatment of the sick should be based.

The desirability of permitting defendants in criminal cases to give evidence, and of admitting the evidence of husbands and wives of prisoners, came under discussion in the Repression of Crime Section on Friday. Mr. Alfred Hill reminded the association that at his suggestion queries were several years ago sent to the American judges as to the working of such a system then recently adopted in that country. The replies were almost unanimously approbatory; but, as they did not receive adequate notice in the debates in our Parliament, and as there would now be a more ripe experience of the change, he proposed that the inquiries should be addressed anew to the attorney-generals and chief justices of the States of the North American Union. This proposition appeared to find favour with those present.

An animated discussion took place in the Jurisprudence Department on Friday on questions relating to that which was wont to be called the "palladium of British liberty," trial by jury. Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., arraigned the whole system, impeaching juries for frequent ignorance, inexperience, and imbecility, for occasional partiality, for being selected by chance instead of by choice, and for being so constituted as to be wholly unfit to deal with the more important and more difficult class of cases which are now brought before them. In deference to public opinion he consented to make an exception in the case of trials involving "political questions or cases of popular rights." Mr. G. C. Whiteley, on the other hand, warmly defended the existing system. He was opposed even to any such change as would allow a verdict to be taken from a jury divided in opinion. The unanimous verdict, he contended, gave weight and finality to the decision. On behalf of the people he pleaded that it was good that they should continue to be associated with the judges in the administration of the law. On behalf of the judges he pleaded that they had already quite enough to do in deciding questions of law. The balance of opinion was evidently in favour of a continuance on the old lines.

Sir Rutherford Alcock, in the Health Department on Saturday, urged the necessity of continuous and vigorous effort to check the spread of infectious diseases. His main proposition was that the adoption of compulsory measures of isolation and disinfection was an act of self-preservation and public policy, in the way of which no pleas of personal liberty should be allowed to stand. In the last ten years, he reminded his hearers, on the authority of official records, the death-rate had fallen by nearly 4½ per cent., and the reduction is mainly discoverable in the deaths from diseases most influenced by sanitary improvements. In the army the saving of lives in one decade by improved sanitation is 40,000, or twice as many as were killed in actual battle in our twenty-two years' war, including Waterloo and Trafalgar. Official returns showed that from one-fifth to one-sixth of the total mortality in our large towns was due to diseases which it was in our power by the adoption of proper sanitative measures almost to eliminate. On this point of preventibility he assured the Congress that the forthcoming report of the Hospitals Commission would satisfy the most sceptical. The evidence about to be published shows that in Hastings the Sanitary Aid Association has found it possible to prevent infectious fevers spreading even in the same family by simple means and attention to sanitary requirements. Dr. Guy's investigations into the fluctuations of the small-pox epidemic in times of war and peace for the last two hundred and fifty years were also laid before the Health Department, who were interested in his conclusion that in the nineteenth century—the epoch of vaccination—there had been visible through the fluctuations a progressive decrease in the death-rate by small-pox, which could only be accounted for by some new and powerful cause or combination of causes acting continuously and with ever-increasing force, coming into operation in the early years of the nineteenth century. Vaccination replacing inoculation, and extending its protective influence to an ever-increasing section of the population, was the only force which fully met the conditions of the problem. The subject was further continued in the Health Department on Monday. By a majority of forty to sixteen a resolution was adopted by the department, declaring it desirable in the public interest that the Legislature should, at the earliest possible opportunity, pass a general enactment for the compulsory notification of infectious diseases, on the principle of the Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Hastings.

Free Trade, it was once thought, had passed out of the range of debatable topics, but the recent promulgation of the "Fair Trade" heresy has furnished occasion for instructing the minds of the rising generation on the principle involved. Professor Leone Levi read a paper showing how much of the expansion of trade, the increase of wealth, and the greatly improved condition of the people was the direct consequence of a policy of freedom. The exports of British manufacture and produce were in 1840 only £1 18s. per head. They are now £6 14s. 10d.—increase 252 per cent. "Protection," remarked the professor, "produces hot-house flowers—speedily rising, speedily falling. Free Trade favours strong, hardy flowers, able to stand wind and weather." Discouraging on the same subject, Professor Bonamy Price thus dealt with those who clamour for a policy of retaliation:—

"It has been shown that Free Trade increases the wealth of a country, and Protection diminishes it; consequently, by giving up Free Trade and substituting for it Protection, a certain and abiding loss of wealth is incurred. Is there any compensation obtained for this loss by making the foreign attacking nation suffer a loss on his side by putting duties on his wares? None whatever. The facts are simply these. England incurs a loss by America putting a heavy duty on English iron. Her trade is diminished; her power of acquiring wealth is lessened; there is less demand for her iron, the iron industry suffers. But at the very same time she is reaping a very real gain by procuring corn from America duty free. America derives a profit from this sale of corn; England does the same. Both win, both are enriched; but England, of course, is injured by the duty charged on her iron. Now let England retort with a counter-duty on the corn sent by America. The price of the American corn is raised in England, or its importation stopped altogether. In either case England loses. Her people must pay more for their bread without any compensation for this additional cost. American wheat becomes dearer, and with it English wheat also. The farmers make a gain, but at the expense of every consumer of bread in England. Without the counter-protection England would have had the same quantity of bread, and by means of its cheapness an addition of other goods besides, with the same cost of capital and labour. This is incontestably a second loss. Two losses instead of one ruin the policy of retaliation; it is an inexcusable blunder to practise it."

Miss Helen Blackburne, in a paper read before the Jurisprudence Department, after contending that the position of women was relatively higher in England under the feudal form of society than under the more democratic conditions of modern times, concluded with a practical suggestion for organised agitation for securing equality for rate-paying women at the polling booth. From those who took part in the discussion there was an almost unanimous expression of opinion in favour of women being made eligible to serve on boards of guardians.

Workhouse education was also passed under review. Strong dissatisfaction was expressed with the existing arrangements in workhouse schools, and a resolution was passed requesting the council to consider the subject with the view of securing uniformity in the control and inspection of these schools with the public elementary schools of the country. Some speakers favoured the abolition of the workhouse schools altogether and the sending of the children to the Board Schools.

In the Repression of Crime Section the system by which vagrancy is kept in check in Berkshire and some other counties was explained by Mr. J. H. Bonner. Relief is only granted to holders of tickets obtained on certain conditions, and involving the walking of a long distance before a second application for relief can be successfully made at another union. The idle, worthless tramp is made to feel that honest labour is an easier life than vagrancy, and at the same time deserving distress is not left unrelieved.

On Monday some interesting telephone experiments, including the transmission of music from other towns, were arranged for the members of the Congress by the National Telephone Company.

A large number of the members of the association, after the business of the day was over, formed into various excursion parties to Welbeck, Thoresby and Clumber, Southwell, and Wollaton.

The annual meeting for working men, at which members of the Congress address the working people of the towns they visit, was held, and was addressed by the president and other prominent members of the Congress, and members of Parliament attending the Congress meetings; and with this the proceedings of the twenty-fifth Congress terminated.

The Nonconformist, to which we are indebted for this sketch, adds:—

"The variety of subjects discussed affords a tolerably clear indication that matters connected with the Condition of England question are not likely to pass again into the neglect to which for so many centuries in the past they were relegated."

BIRMINGHAM.—On Sunday, the 24th inst., the twenty-first anniversary of the Birmingham Free Christian Society was celebrated. The services were undertaken, morning, by the Rev. James Taplin, and evening, by George R. Twinn, the secretary. The attendances were extremely good. The church was decorated with beautiful flowers, and the singing was accompanied by a full band of instrumentalists. The offertories realised £11 18s. The next evening a public meeting was held, largely attended. There were present the Revs. Dr. Crosskey, Dr. Collier, Lindsey Taplin, J. B. Gardiner, and Charles Joseph (Baptist), and many others. Mr. Bagley presided. The Secretary read the report, which stated that with many drawbacks the work had been perseveringly carried on, all its agencies were maintained as usual, and the public were asked to estimate the society not by any single year's work, but by the aggregate labours of the past twenty-one years.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—All our Faculties.—Almost all disorders of the human body are distinctly to be traced to some impurity of the blood. The purification of that fluid is the first step towards health. Holloway's Pills recommend themselves to the attention of all such sufferers. They search out and remove all impurities from the vital fluid. In indigestion, confirmed dyspepsia, and chronic constipation the most beneficial effects have been, and always must be, obtained from the wholesome power exerted by these purifying Pills over the digestion. Persons whose lives have been restored to ease, strength, and perfect health by Holloway's Pills, after fruitless trial of the whole pharmacopoeia of physic, attest this fact. This is beyond dispute.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE EGYPTIAN CRISIS.

[Sermon by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., delivered in Little Portland-street Chapel on Sunday morning, Sept. 24.]

1 Kings xxii. 4:—"As the Lord liveth, what the Lord saith unto me that will I speak."

This day is to be observed throughout the land as a day of thanksgiving to God for the victory of the British troops in Egypt, and the Archbishop of York, in exhorting the bishops to further the celebration, says that "It would be desirable that the clergy in their pulpit addresses should give expression to the national feeling, and should direct it to the throne of the Most High God."

The thought of the clergy of a nation expressing over the length and breadth of the land a "national feeling," which may be "directed to the throne of the Most High God," without fear of a rebuke, is indeed full of majesty and of uplifting strength. In any "national feeling," once recognised as such, there is, if we can throw ourselves into it, a fulness and power which lifts us up out of our narrow and personal surroundings sweeps us into a wider current and makes us sharers of a wider and deeper life. Any "national feeling" unlocks the latent energies of the nation—for good or ill—and gives a stimulus to all its powers. When "national feeling" of any kind is strong and permanent, it glows on the canvas of the painter, it burns in the words of the poet, it inspires the statesman with larger schemes, it infuses into every citizen a sense of something greater than his own immediate material interest, and knits together the hearts of men in a common purpose and a common loyalty. And if this "national feeling" is one which directs itself, or even one which can be directed to the "throne of the Most High God," then it is truly a power for good to the nation which experiences it—at once the record and the promise of a new birth. To be called upon to give expression to such a "national feeling" is indeed a privilege; and it is one which it appears the Archbishop of York conceives the clergy of England may enjoy to-day. Yet I, for one, must confess in shame, and yet more in sorrow, for the part our country has played, that I had rather be with the Jews who yesterday celebrated their "Great Day of Atonement" than with the Christians who to-day hold their national thanksgiving. It is not a position which a man would seek, or one in which he can rejoice, to find himself thus cut off from all sympathy with the national sentiment that surrounds him; to feel an answer of shame and protest rising in his heart when he is summoned to rejoice and give thanks. Bear with me, then, while I speak, as I best may, on the subject we are invited to consider to-day.

It is not because the subject of the proposed thanksgiving is connected with all the horrors of war that I cannot join in it. I can well conceive a victory of the British army, attended with many times more bloodshed, and causing many times more immediate misery and loss than the Egyptian war has done, being nevertheless the fit subject of devoutest thanksgiving, spontaneously directing our thoughts in grateful love to the "throne of the most High God." It is easy to conceive of our country locked in a deadly struggle with some equal foe, with right on her side and with the prospect of incalculable loss to humanity, of indefinite crippling of her own energies, and postponement of her own advance in case of her defeat. It is easy to think of her as saying, and saying truly, that she is fighting for liberty, for progress, for right, for mercy, for God, pouring out blood like water for the cause, and after long agony issuing at last victorious, and bursting into a great cry of thankfulness. It is easy to conceive of her as engaged in a struggle involving no matter of life and death, indeed, to any great cause, but demanding patience, generosity, self-denial, even the sacrifice of precious lives, to bring it to a successful issue; some struggle in which she has made herself, in the beautiful words of our prayer-book, "the stronghold of right, the refuge of the oppressed, and the moderator of lawless ambition." Such an undertaking, though involving no very desperate struggle, would at any rate be one on which we might think with well-founded satisfaction, and for the success of which we might well be grateful.

Now I am willing to believe that the majority of my countrymen, and I have no choice but to think that many of my friends, actually believe that the Egyptian war is precisely such a case. They believe apparently that we have as a matter of fact delivered Egypt from a state of anarchy into which we did not plunge her, or at any rate a state of anarchy on the verge of which she was standing with a certainty of falling over, even if we had not given her the final push. They believe that we have "moderated lawless ambition" in the person of an unprincipled military adventurer, and that we have secured the permanent good of an oppressed and patient race, which, but for our intervention, would have been given over to the tender mercies of a savage military despotism. They believe, then, that we have, by our late warlike expedition, secured the good of Egypt. More than this, they appear to have persuaded themselves, or allowed themselves to be persuaded, not only that this "good of the Egyptians" will be the result of the war, but also that it was at any rate to some extent the cause and object of the war also, or at the very least the justifying condition—sine qua non—of our armed intervention to secure other objects. To me I confess it seems painfully clear in the first place that we have interpreted "the good of Egypt" in the narrowest and most material possible sense, and that in the next place we have sought the good of Egypt, so conceived, just so far as it coincided with the material interests of Europeans, and have utterly neglected and ignored it the moment it appeared in any way to clash with those interests.* I should think many believers in the disinterestedness of British motives must have experienced a shock, or at least a vague sense of discomfort, one day this week when one of their friends and counsellors incautiously expressed in a daily paper or a telegram his great satisfaction that the Egyptian "tax-payer" was now once more peacefully at work.† It was an unfortunate expression, to say the least of it. But I do not expect everyone to share my own belief that that expression gives at once the motive and the measure of our active interest in the material prosperity of Egypt. For the materials on which alone an independent judgment can be formed, though quite accessible, at any rate in sufficient quantities, are in a form which most men are not in the habit of reading, and from which, perhaps, it may need some

* A sum of between three and four million pounds is paid yearly out of the Egyptian revenues to European "bondholders," on account of debts contracted by the late Khedive. This amounts to nearly one half of the gross revenues of Egypt. What is known as the "Control" is the system by which an English and a French agent arrange the finances of Egypt in order to secure the punctual payment of this annual sum. Arabi represented projects and aspirations which, in the opinion of the Controllers, might ultimately and indirectly lead to a state of things which would render the payments in question less secure; and which might, more immediately, cause a curtailment of the monstrous and parasitical growth of European officials paid out of the (remaining) Egyptian revenue. Anyone who will take the trouble to read the correspondence, which may be obtained for a very few shillings—(ask for "Parliamentary Papers, Egypt, 1882),—will see that the whole war has risen out of this opposition on the part of the "Control" to Arabi's projects, resulting in a demand that he should be banished. "The good of the Egyptians" has been sought in as far as their comparative prosperity was a necessary condition of the payment of the taxes, and in so far as the British administrative instinct may be held to secure favourable conditions of life to the races on whom it is exercised; but any spark of national life has been promptly suppressed, and the grossest abuses have been fostered or protected whenever the great interest of the bondholders or the petty interests of the European officials seemed in any degree threatened. To justify these statements would be to quote the whole of the Egyptian papers. The "Control" and its financial functions occupy the whole, and there is no room to get in the edge of a knife to represent any other motives or considerations from the beginning to the end.

† I regret that I have not been able to recover the particular passage to which reference is here made. It was in one of the daily papers.

little practice to extract even the plainest story. The British public therefore takes what it can get from the daily Press, and in this case one half of the Press is committed in principle to an aggressive policy, and the other half is committed to the support of the present head of the executive. A stray voice here and there excites little attention, and even the secession of an honoured member from the Cabinet on the express ground that the war is an immoral one has failed seriously to shake the placid confidence of the public. Sordid motives are naturally kept in the background by the defenders of any policy, and at present there seems little prospect of any awakening of the public mind to independent investigation and judgment.

It is decreed, then, that our intervention in Egypt has been and will be a blessing to the Egyptians, and the fact that the Egyptians pay about a pound per head per annum to European bondholders is boldly asserted to have no connection whatever with our military interference in their affairs. I suppose this disavowal is made sincerely. In some cases I am sure of it; in others I have no right to doubt or question it. But after all, it is felt that mere philanthropy does not quite explain the war, and other motives are sought. If we had been actuated by a simple desire to see bad government superseded by good there were many other fields, some of them much nearer home, on which we might have employed ourselves. The Archbishop in his letter to his episcopal brethren declares that "anarchy in Egypt meant danger to that wide empire which we have received as a trust, and which we may not abandon," and in his prayer he calls Egypt "the highway between England and our Indian empire." This is the second ground generally taken. The preservation of our highway to India and the good of Egypt are respectively the motive of the justification of our war. As to the facts, I will not say more than that a glance at the map seems to indicate that the conquest of Egypt is a singularly circuitous and expensive way of protecting a canal that lies on the other side of a desert, is commanded for the most part by a railroad, and would never have been threatened unless we had been at war with Egypt. But I will waive all this and take the supposition as it stands—that non-intervention in Egypt might have meant some problematic danger to our quickest route to India. For myself, I do not see how it can be, but let us suppose it is. And here I hope we may find some common ground and may be able to question our own hearts, as in the presence of God, with no feelings but those of fellow-seekers after the truth and fellow-workers. I am aware that what I have said hitherto may have tended to disturb far more than to arouse the feelings of devotion, and may seem to have resembled political debate rather than an attempt to bring the subject matter of politics under the light of religious thought. But now, setting aside all questions of disputed facts, let me ask whether the apology as it stands is an adequate one? As honest men we are bound to bring face to face the maxims by which we act and the aspirations of our prayers, and what occasion could be more fit than this when we are called upon to thank God for enabling us by successful war to keep clear the quickest route to India? I would ask, then, in all earnestness, does the end justify the means in politics? Are we to say "The power of England is so beneficent that its maintenance is equivalent to the maintenance of right, and whenever we are fighting for English supremacy we are fighting for the kingdom of God?" In other words, is it an axiom that any state of things which directly or indirectly threatens more or less inconvenience to some part of the British Empire, or to the communications of one part with another, is to be put down? Are we allowed, are we required by justice, mercy and the love of God to interfere with and remodel the internal affairs of every State which may cause us inconvenience by its political blunders? Are we justified in invading such a State and subjecting it to military occupation in order to arrange its constitution according to our taste, or according to our views of what its subjects if they are not fanatics must inevitably prefer? If the maintenance of the British Empire intact is the first condition of the establishment of the Kingdom of God, if all communications between different parts of the empire are to be regarded as parts of the empire itself, if all contiguous countries are to be regarded as threatening the empire, if they are not governed in strict accordance with British ideas, and if in politics the end justifies the means, then, indeed, international morals are much simplified, and the Empire on which the sun never sets need never be at a loss for a reason for interfering with the affairs of any nation or for a "national feeling" that may be "directed to the throne of God," when its undertakings prosper. The Archbishop says that we have received our empire as a trust. Undoubtedly we have. If it is said that God gave us India, we need not have studied its history very deeply to understand that he gave it us in much the same sense as he gave the city of Laish to the Danites. "Ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land; for God hath given it into your hands; a place where there is no want of anything that is in the earth . . . and they came unto Laish, unto a people at quiet and secure; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire, and there was no deliverer"—but for all that India is ours, whoever gave it us, and we are bound to wipe out the stains of the acquisition by the mercy, the justice, the generosity of the maintenance of our rule. And yet year by year crime is heaped upon crime under the same pretext. It was necessary to invade Afghan in order to preserve our Indian Empire; it is necessary to perpetuate the infamous Opium Trade as a State-patronised and treaty-protected industry in order to preserve the finances of our Indian Empire. It is necessary to subject Egypt to a military occupation in order to protect the communications of our Indian Empire. How long is this to last? As Christian men do we or do we not hold that the end justifies the means in politics? Are we or are we not to be satisfied with the answer, "The maintenance of our Indian Empire demands it," and refrain from asking after that "Is it right?" Is the Empire of India or the kingdom of God to be sought first? Which is to be the gauge of righteousness? Which is to be hampered by the other in case of conflicting interests? This day we are asked to direct our national feelings to the throne of the Most High God; if in so doing we realise the fact that the coincidence of that "direction" and the "direction" of our Indian Empire, however complete, is not axiomatic, and requires demonstration in every several case before it can be accepted, we shall not, indeed, have solved any problems, but we shall at least have discovered a very weighty one, hitherto undreamed of in the philosophy of many of us.

Let each one solemnly ask himself whether the maxims and motives by which he is guided in this affair of Egypt will bear being taken—unvarnished, unselected, unpalpated—and placed side by side with the aspirations and principles he seeks to strengthen in this place. If not, then which is it that needs modifying.

THE LATE REV. W. A. POPE.

London, August 22, 1882.

The death of the late William Annette Pope by a fall on the Great Gable, Cumberland, on August 7, has left Mrs. Pope and her six girls (the youngest being only five years old) without any provision at all.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to make an immediate effort on their behalf.

During the last three years of his life Mr. Pope was the minister of the Domestic Mission, Spicer-street, Spitalfields. The Committee of the Mission, therefore, feel that in addition to the invitation to the general public already issued by private friends, they may especially call for the aid of their own supporters in assisting the widow and children of their late missionary.

Prior, however, to his settlement in London Mr. Pope had been for twelve years actively engaged in various localities, both in the neighbourhood of Liverpool and in the Eastern Counties, in the service of the Unitarian cause. In view of these labours, and of the sacrifices which his change of opinions involved, the Committee feel justified in enlarging the area of their appeal, and asking the help of members of the free churches generally.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD.

How shall we account for the religions of the world? This is one of the first questions suggested by that interesting volume of lectures, recently reviewed in these columns, entitled "The Faiths of the World." When we consider what different religions are held by mankind we are at once led to ask, How are we to account for their origin? We find that they have certain points of resemblance and certain other points of difference—much in common, and some things that are distinctive of each. Whence these features of resemblance, and whence these other features of difference? A writer in Blackwood, reviewing this book, has endeavoured to answer these questions, and as his reply is marked by candour, fairness, and largeness of thought, it is worth considering. The answers given to these inquiries before modern research had established other grounds were commonly these: On the one hand, "to many a theologian of the past the ethnic religions have appeared to be chiefly due to the promptings of the spirit of darkness, the old Deceiver, who out of his malicious hatred of mankind stimulated their diseased imaginations to frame and believe a tissue of soul-destroying lies. In every object of heathen worship a veritable demon has been discerned, in each article of belief some horrible parody or fatal delusion. Thus the ground on which the fiery TERTULIAN rested his denunciation of the Roman theatre was the idea that the spectacles were connected with a religion which the unclean spirits of the Devil had made their own. Thus by the more philosophical ORIGEN it was laid down as an axiom, that all the gods of the Gentiles were demons." But in truth we need not go so far back as TERTULIAN or ORIGEN. In very recent times Orthodox writers have suggested that the Devil is the author of all the idolatries of heathendom. It is just one illustration of the marvellous activity ascribed to Satan in working the ruin of mankind—an activity that is becoming less and less every day. On the other hand, a very different solution has been given by the Atheist or Freethinker, to whom all religions were obnoxious. "He cut the knot by substituting human priestcraft for diabolical inspiration, and attributed the world's faiths to the invention of scheming and dishonest adventurers, who invoked the terrors of an imaginary supernaturalism to establish their dominion over the minds of the ignorant and superstitious. Both religion and philosophy may be congratulated on the disappearance of these theories from the domain of candid and intelligent thought. Instead of supposing the priest to have manufactured the religion, we have now learnt to reverse the order and to perceive how much more truly it may be said that the religion originated the priest." These are rough and ready hypotheses, but they fail utterly to account for the universal prevalence and mighty influence of religion in the world. In truth, the moment we realise the fact that for ages the ethnic religions have retained their hold on the minds and hearts of great and populous nations, we are compelled to admit that there must have been more in them than the mere falsehoods of delusion or imposture. What so long nourished, however imperfectly, the soul of man, in its hunger for spiritual truth, cannot have been all empty husk or indigestible stone; it must have possessed some affinity to the soul's wants and aspirations, some power of satisfying the desires of the seekers after GOD. "No religion," says MONIER WILLIAMS, in a recent essay on the religion of ZOROASTER, "could have held its ground or acquired real influence over the mind, unless it attempted with some success to solve the problems which have ever perplexed the intellect or burdened the heart. To this view every increase of our acquaintance with the ethnic religions lends support, and renders it increasingly impossible to account for them either by human knavery or demoniacal perversion."

Another theory to which at least passing notice must be given is that which traces back religion in common with every other faculty and product of human nature to the properties of the atoms out of which, by physical processes, the universe is supposed to have evolved itself. The statement of this theory is its sufficient refutation. It ascribes man's spiritual consciousness to a purely physical origin, and reduces his whole religious faculty and experience under the operation of the laws of matter. "It is on this account that the Theist must protest against it. Not because in the formation of the physical universe it substitutes continuous evolution for discontinuous acts of creation, and includes even mankind under the same law, so far as their material form with its organic life is concerned—for Theism need have no quarrel with evolution, so long as a divine Evolutionist is presupposed, and the highest element of man's being is accepted from the physical order of nature; but Theism protests against it because it denies to man a spiritual self and a spiritual relation to his Creator, and leaves him nothing but what is material, nothing that is not shared with him by even the lowest of living things—so that the faith and devotion of the saint and the martyr must be assigned to the same category as the instinct of a mollusc and the appetencies of a vegetable. Well said PASCAL, 'Incrédules les plus crédules'."

The writer whom we have quoted dismisses this hypothesis as unworthy of further consideration, and then proceeds to point out that two theories yet remain to be considered, which, while they agree in attributing to the ethnic faiths a foundation in truth at the same time exhibit them under curiously opposed aspects. "According to one they were melancholy corruptions of a primitive revelation, and marked the downward course of human degradation; according to the other, they were the products of the unfolding human consciousness as it awoke to a sense of its relation to the supernatural—steps, however feeble and wavering, in an upward progress towards truth and morality. Which of these we adopt must depend on the attitude held by us towards the hypothesis of a definite revelation made originally to the undivided family of mankind, and carried with them by its various branches as they separated to occupy different tracts of the earth. Granted that every nation or tribe started with such a revelation, the inference that the several forms of heathenism must have been so many corruptions of it would be irresistible. But of the gift of such a revelation there really is no adequate proof forthcoming, no evidence that stands the test of critical examination. The earliest records of Genesis, even when taken as literally as it is now possible to take them, carry us but a very short distance in this direction, and the most primitive traces that are discernible of the heathen religions point with scarcely an exception in the opposite."

One more theory is thus thrown aside as inadequate and mistaken. Still another remains, and that leads us to find the source of the ethnic religions in man himself, and to regard them as the offspring under various conditions of that mysterious spiritual faculty which we believe to be his most distinguishing characteristic. "Perhaps, not in all cases, without stimulus from traditional fragments of knowledge, derived from intercourse with the favoured race to which the earliest revelation was granted; nor in any case without some secret indefinable leading by Him who made the human spirit for himself. But such limitations or conditions do not evacuate the conclusion to which we are brought—that the ethnic religions were originated and gradually wrought into their several shapes by the effort of the growing spiritual consciousness to find God, and to formulate its sense of relation to the supernatural. No other account of them seems to us to be in harmony with the facts ascertained by modern discovery and critical analysis, or to explain how what may be called natural religion has become variously embodied in ideas and practices manifestly due to the laws of human thought, controlled by the influences of environment and race. For fantastic, defective and erroneous in different ways as all the heathen faiths are, there is not one in which a considerable substratum of truth may not be found—not one which does not testify to the possession of the same religious and moral nature, and furnish some means of approach to God."

The writer proceeds to point out certain coincidences between Christianity and one or other of the ethnic religions. "It is more than curious, for instance," he remarks, "to find CONFUCIUS several centuries B.C. enunciating the golden rule of not doing to others what we should wish them not to do to us; and BUDDHA about the same time urging the precept, 'Let a man overcome evil by good, let him overcome anger by love.' The Biblical doctrine of judgment to come is remarkably anticipated in the Egyptian ritual of the dead; and the wide prevalence of sacrifice furnishes not a few points of resemblance—such as the Egyptian transfer of the penalty of transgression from the offerers to the victims—and the Brahmanical principle that the sacrificer himself is the victim. Still more remarkable are the traces of the idea that human deliverance must come through the self oblation or suffering of a divine personage—an idea which may be recognised under different forms in the ethnic religions. The Mazdeism of ancient Persia gives us the conception of a future Messiah, whose advent shall bring about the restitution of all things; and, to cite one more coincidence, infant baptism was a rite of the Mexican religion, by which the child was supposed to be born anew, cleansed from inherited defilement, and made partaker of a purer nature."

After pointing out other and broader features illustrating the connection between Christianity and the ethnic religions, the writer we have been quoting concludes:—"Our conclusion, then, about the great heathen faiths is this, that in their inmost essence they were not barely vain and false superstitions, instigated by Satanic delusion or imposed by priestcraft on the credulity of mankind, but genuine religions begotten of the spiritual element in human nature, and exhibiting the ways in which the soul dimly felt after God and in some measure found him; and that amidst all their defects and errors they have not been powerless for good, but in the absence of revelation have done something towards keeping alive faith, sustaining morality, and preparing the way for that one divine religion in which they all find their correction and completion."

All this is very liberal and a vast improvement on the old orthodox way of regarding the heathen religions of the world. It will be noticed, however, that a line is distinctly drawn between those religions and Christianity separating them by a wide and essential difference. Christianity is divine in its origin, the others are human—Christianity is perfect, they are defective; Christianity gives full assurance of faith, with the others "the soul dimly felt after God." Can this distinction be maintained? Does it rest on anything more than the partiality which a Christian naturally feels for his own religion? We very much doubt it. Would not investigation from a neutral standpoint show that all religions, Christianity equally with the rest, have a common origin—that as regards their origin one is not more divine than another? All are the outcome of certain elements in human nature, but some under favouring circumstances have attained to a higher and purer development. Christianity, the favouring circumstances in behalf of which have been the most marked, has made the greatest advance and stands now at the head of all the religions of the world. Its diffusion among the Western nations, its intimate alliance with modern civilisation, its having kept in the path of the world's progress, to which it was its good fortune to be introduced at an early period—all this, far more than anything specially divine in its origin, has helped it to become what it is to day and to do what it has done for the good of the world.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS AT DERBY.

THE Church Congress has been holding its annual sittings this week at Derby, under the Presidency of the Bishop of the Diocese, Dr. MACLAGAN, Bishop of Lichfield. It seems to have been a great success as regards the number and the enthusiasm of its members, and we cordially acknowledge to the breadth and liberality of many of the papers and addresses, which indicate an immense progress since the earlier days of these Congresses, when they bore closer resemblance to the traditional bear-garden, or to the "Robber Synod" of the early days of the Church than to an assembly of Christian ministers and gentlemen. We must reserve until our next number a fuller estimate of the tone and results of the Derby Conference, and content ourselves at present with recording a few of its conspicuous features.

The proceedings of the Congress commenced on Thursday with Church Services at the two principal parish churches of the town, wherein sermons were preached by the Archbishop of YORK and the Bishop of TRURO, the representatives respectively of the oldest and youngest sees in England. The Archbishop anticipated new trials for the Church. As one of the results of the Reformation the Church and the State were no longer regarded as enemies, but as two distinct powers working for the good of man; the one in the road of civil freedom, security, and happiness, and the other with the object of moral freedom, peace of mind, reconciliation, eternal hope for the people of God. Science was no enemy to CHRIST; secular culture and civil government were no enemies; but a modern spirit was making progress with a rapidity of which the Church had not yet realised the measure. Within a few years changes had come over the horizon, casting a shadow over every part of the field of the Church's teaching, which the Church had only just begun to discern, and was not yet prepared to deal with. The system of thought which the late Mr. DARWIN and other thinkers had introduced was leavening the popular belief far and wide. Of the development theory the Archbishop said:—

"The thinker who founded this system was an honest inquirer into the facts of nature, following where researches led him, with no controversial object, with no after-thought of its effect on religion, with no wish to shake one's faith in the Creator. That he shone more in research than in just inference from research it was competent for all to believe. That the so-called struggle for existence was no more a complete account of the present condition of the world of nature than that a thunderstorm was the cause of the river whose flood it helped by small degrees to swell they would see more and more clearly. The new induction made from physical facts had startled and depressed them, but it might be revised and superseded by other inductions. But as it was needless for the Church to urge Copernicus to revoke his astronomy, so would their children see that in that new voice of natural history there was nothing to kill the spirit or prevent it from turning to God for strength, comfort, or from conceiving greater hopes. If it be thought something new had been discovered, be it small or great, it was for them to seek the guidance of the Holy Ghost to teach them how and where the discovery touches the gospel that they preached. It was for them to recall under the same guidance the truths which they had to remember from their Master in no spirit of panic fear, but in humble trust in God approach the new difficulty that presented itself to them."

The Archbishop afterwards, as we learn from the account in the Daily News, took a somewhat gloomy view as to the spread of a utilitarian morality, and to meet the difficulties of the age counselled more learning and more cohesion among the clergy, a greater spirit of order, less of a feeling of caste, more feeling for those without the Church, and more devoted zeal. In token that the mystery of the Cross stirred men still he alluded to the way in which the wild march of the Salvation Army stirred the mind even though they might prefer greater order and less emotion. This was not the only time during the day that the Salvation Army was acknowledged as a power by the speakers at the Church Congress.

The sermon by Dr. BENSON, Bishop of Truro, founded on Isaiah xlii. 4,—"He shall not fail nor be discouraged until he have set judgment in the earth," struck a note of confident anticipation in the future of the Church. The Bishop talked of an ideal, as yet far from realised, when Christendom should lie not all lakelets and pools, but as one ocean bosom heaving with the one attraction and swayed by the one dominion of her Lord; and spoke of being pardoned some anxiety that the aims and hopes of such a Congress should be high enough and broad enough. The preacher contrasted the state of the Church fifty years ago, when CONNOP THIRLWALL said that it was so beset with anxiety about its relations to the State that it was powerless for good, and at the utmost only able to preserve itself from ruin, with its working strength of the present day. He claimed that within the Church there is a real tendency to solidification. "There is a knitting-up of ravelled edges. There is a gathering up towards old standards on the one side; on the other there is less inclination to cross the border. 'Rest in the Church' is not a mere yearning. The higher life finds satisfactions once undreamed of. Higher life, deeper teachings, are become dearer than watchwords."

The President, the Bishop of LICHFIELD, in the course of his opening address claimed that the practical results of these Church Congresses were found in a clearer grasp of truth, a deepened sense of responsibility, and not least in a feeling of closer brotherhood. He owned the divergencies of thought amongst them. He looked upon congresses as one most helpful means to neutralise these divergencies. They met face to face as brother men, brother Christians, brother Churchmen, not to oppose each other, but to understand each other; not to confirm their prejudices, but to adjust their differences. The President further took comfort from the diversities of thought as providing at once a safeguard and protest against any narrowing of the limits which defined the membership of that branch of the Catholic Church —a branch which he defined as the true Salvation Army.

The first, and one of the most interesting subjects for discussion, was "Unity of Belief in Relation to Religious Thought." Dr. PLUMPTRE, Dean of Wells, opened this discussion with a paper which, as the report to which we are indebted says, indicated that he was in favour of a very simple creed acknowledging in the Apostolic words "one body and one spirit and one hope of our calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all." "Was it not time," he asked, "for the Churches to issue forth from the tangled path of labyrinthine [subtleties in which they had so long wandered, and to return to the simplicity of their first faith, and of their earliest wisdom as well as to their first love?" The Thirty-nine Articles he included in the issue of these subtleties, though admitting that the latitude of interpretation which their construction allowed had led to their results being overruled for good. As to the pseudo-Athanasian Creed, "here also time had brought its corrective, and had blunted the edge that once seemed so pitiless and keen." Its dogmatic propositions could be "accepted as being in relation to the controversies out of which they grew closer approximations to the truth than those which contradicted them," and as for "the damnatory clauses" the Dean, while regretting that they were still retained and used, being, as they were, a stumbling block to the weak and ignorant, noted with satisfaction that they had received again and again at the hands of representative divines, from Dr. HEY to Dr. PUSEY, an explanation which robbed them of their sting, and, exempting from their range every form of involuntary error and invincible ignorance and insuperable prejudice, limited their application to that wilful denial of truth known and accepted as truth, which was not heresy, but dishonesty. In matters of rubric the Dean urged the acceptance of "unity," not "uniformity," as a watchword. What we need, he said, is not the red tape of obsolete and ambiguous rubrics, but the elastic band of a large and liberal tolerance. Warning his hearers that the Liberation Society—the bête noire of Churchmen—were rousing threatening echoes with the cry "Delenda est Carthago," he urged the Church to maintain the unity of the faith, not in the strife of parties, but in the bond of peace; to minimise differences, to welcome auxiliaries as one with them in the unity of the Apostolic faith, to be tolerant of many eccentricities, and show sympathy with much with which they could not agree.

Canon FURZE, in a second paper on the same subject, also maintained that unity of belief was consistent with diversities of thought, and deprecated the habit of men "facing each other from the vanishing point." The Rev. RANDALL DAVIDSON, one of the chaplains of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, also held that all Churchmen were one at heart, and gave expression to a telling phrase when he gave the advice to controversialists, "Reduce your fractions to the lowest terms."

Well, "these be brave words;" these sound like most liberal and comprehensive sentiments, and at first sight make us almost ready to believe that we Liberals and religious Rationalists have done our work, and might just as well hold and express our liberal opinions in the bosom of the all-embracing Mother Church, instead of still enduring the penalties of exclusion and the inconveniences of a sturdy nonconformity. When, however, we look at the utterances of the Bishops, who utter the real voice of the Church with high influence and authority, we find the Bishop of WINCHESTER pointed out that for true unity they must build on a basis of dogma, and by dogma he evidently means the more disputed and controversial points of the teachings of the Church, the Trinity, the Atonement, Biblical Infallibility, Eternal Punishment, to which all the Bishops, and an overwhelming majority of the clergy, gave their adhesion at the time of the "Essays and Reviews" controversy; and all the multitude of disputed dogmas embodied in the Thirty-nine Articles, to say nothing of the inscrutable mysteries of the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, and the doubtful historical statements of the falsely-named "Apostles' Creed." In the same tone another Episcopal speaker, Bishop PERRY, with apologies for disturbing the pleasing tone of harmony and agreement, which was manifestly hollow and superficial, insisted that some diversities of thought were so marked as to imply divergence and not unity of belief, and could not agree that the preacher of certain dogmas respecting the efficacy of the sacraments and auricular confession were united with him in belief. Even the amiable and large-hearted Dean PLUMPTRE, at the close of his address, bore testimony to "the power of the truth involved in the three-fold name;" and it is evident that by this he means the traditional dogma which defines the metaphysical attributes and relations of the three separate persons of a theological Trinity, and would reject from the breadth of his sympathies and religious communion the obstinate heretic who was conscientiously unable to believe in the Deity of JESUS CHRIST, and the separate personality of the Holy Ghost.

And so, when we read these enchanting and, for the most part, imaginary descriptions of the unity and liberality of the Church, and the delightful peace and harmony of all within its pale, and feel for the moment almost tempted to think that there is no further occasion for emphatic protest, no more theological errors to denounce, no longer any reason for enduring social ostracism, we call to mind that three Creeds and Thirty-nine Articles are still there which fetter the real liberty of the clergy and make inquiry and freedom of thought a mere delusion and mockery; that dogmas are embodied in the formularies which are the expression of more or less ancient traditionalism, and not of either Scriptural simplicity or of a reasonable and progressive religious faith. If the Church of England, in its ideal character, is the home of culture and refinement, the abode of those who love sweet gracefulness and moderation, as the author of "John Inglesant" has pointed out in his recent introduction to GEORGE HERBERT'S "Temple," we cannot forget that what Dean PLUMPTRE euphemistically calls "the subtleties of the Thirty-nine Articles" are still a trap to tender consciences, and lead to dishonest professions, notwithstanding the modification in the form of subscription; that the arithmetic puzzles and "the keen and pitiless" denunciations of the pseudo Athanasian Creed are still binding upon the clergy, and can be explained away by no plausible sophistries or pleasant equivocations of amiable and tolerant divines; and that uniformity of dogmatic opinion, not unity of spirit, is the real watchword of the Church of England.

MR. SWINBURNE'S "Tristram of Lyonesse" has passed into a second edition.

AFTER DEATH.—V.

THE writer will very briefly conclude these articles with a few words on two other theories that have been maintained of life after death.

The first is that of the final restitution of the souls of all men. This theory may or may not be according to the language of the New Testament. But if accompanied with a belief in purgatory or metempsychosis it certainly cannot be said to be unjust. In fact, it is infinitely more just than the common notion of hell fire. There is no need to consider these points, because the controversy has been so frequently and so thoroughly threshed out by able men and competent critics. If the writer on some future occasion recurs to the subject it will be because it has appeared to him that the argument is not between final restitution and the ordinarily conceived materialistic hell of eternal torments (in which case it would be necessary at once to declare for final restitution), but between final restitution and separation from GOD conceived of rather in accordance with the Swedenborgian vision. In this case, two reasonable views are presented, and, without data of observation and experience, all we can do is to suspend our judgment.

The second theory is that the soul of man, after having been purified and strengthened (if necessary) by æons of suffering and repentance, or after having been exalted by passing through countless existences, is at length re-absorbed into the divine essence, and rests for ever in the bosom of the eternal Father. We have already pointed out how difficult it is to conceive (arguing by analogy with the law of the Conservation of Form and the Conservation of Matter), that if the soul of man is immortal in the future it can be said to have been created in the past. But if the soul has not been created, either it must have had an eternal individual existence in the past, or it must be a breath from the Divine Essence. If, as most men believe, the soul has an eternal individual existence in the future, that would seem to imply that it must have had an eternal individual existence in the past, but this lands us on a mountainous shore of insuperable difficulties. If, again, as most men believe, the soul is a breath from the Divine Essence, then it would seem to imply that the soul would, after a greater or less interval, return to the Being who breathed it forth. On the whole, it would seem most consonant with reason to believe this—that the spirit of man is a breath of GOD and is finally reabsorbed by Him. But if this be so, it is probably a truth very unpalatable to and almost unthinkable by the human mind. To live without an individual existence would seem to be all one as not to exist at all. Individuality implies antagonism, emulation, aspiration, a thousand noble qualities without which our life here at least would seem flat and unprofitable. Who, with all his faults and misfortunes, would be other than himself? To be self-centered may be selfish, but surely it is not necessarily selfish. The true spirit of altruism does not go further than to love one's neighbour as oneself. It does not deny love to oneself. It is a long cry from the joyous pagan notion of a separate Deity in each oak and running stream, not greatly differing from our humanity, and the notion of one GOD without any human race at all. It is impossible for men whose best instincts have been fostered on the worship of heroes, and whose ideal of life is a dead level of mediocrity and conventionality with Mrs. GRUNDY in the background, to face the fact of eternity without individual life.

Probably this is nothing but a war of words. We who believe in a personal God are eager for the day when we shall see Him as He is, when we shall be satisfied with His likeness, when we shall be like Him. But we know so little, we can even guess so little of the contact of spirit with spirit—we who are always environed with gross flesh. Spirit is ubiquitous in space and instantaneous in action. May it not be that when we are at one with God we shall be one with God, and that the very conception of individuality in space and time and thought will cease to have a meaning?

These speculations have led us over a wide field. The days are past for dogmatic utterances about life after death. It is possible to reject some theories. It is possible to say of others that they are not unreasonable, so far as judgment guided by knowledge of the deepest sort is trustworthy. Further than this we cannot go. We are as infants crying in the night with no language but a cry. But there abide faith and hope. And if we are infants crying in the night, we believe there is a Father who hears our cry and will lead us into perfect day and give us articulate speech. The how and the when we may fairly let imagination dream of. But, when all is said that the wisest have brooded over and given utterance to, two things only are clear. On the one hand, that no traveller has ever returned to tell us the tale of his after life; on the other, that we cling always to the trust that all things work together for good for us men—the sons of God. H. C.

RELIGION AND LIBERTY.

[The following Address was delivered at the opening of the Session 1882-3 of Manchester New College, London, by JAMES DRUMMOND, LL.D., Professor of Theology.]

οὐ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα κυρίου, ἐλευθερία.

The session on which we enter to-day brings us together under somewhat changed conditions—conditions which, it is hoped, will add to the practical efficiency and public usefulness of the college, and will in no respect impair the fundamental principle upon which our work is based. If the closer alliance between Manchester New College and University Hall succeed in associating our divinity students more intimately with laymen of earnest character and scholarly habits, whether of the same or of various forms of religious belief, and in thus communicating to both classes a larger and more serious outlook over the world of thought, and a happier acquaintance with different types of human culture and tendency, we shall all rejoice in so desirable a result. But however this may be, the two institutions whose marriage, after so long an engagement, we now celebrate, rest upon the same broad foundation of religious liberty, and alike repudiate every attempt to fetter the intellect with chains of irreversible dogma, or to tie down the aspiring soul to any particular level of religious experience. Alike they would point out to the student the infinite universe of truth, and bid him pursue his researches with the generous ardour of youthful hope, not fearing to stand alone or to give free play to whatever of original tendency or acquired aptitude he may find within himself; only they would ask him to enter this sublime temple with the holy step of one consecrated to some high service, and to remember that freedom for himself logically involves respect towards others.

The demand for free inquiry in matters of religion may spring from two very different sources. It may arise from antagonism to the religious temperament, combined with an intellectual impatience which cleverly exposes the blemishes in an argument, but has no eye for those deeper problems that press upon the human heart, and still recur from age to age, though they may never receive from our limited thought a perfect and final solution. To one with this defective range of mind religion is synonymous with superstition. He views it only as an engine of oppression, and an obstacle to the advancement of individual culture and social improvement; and if he condescends to study its history, he discerns in its persistent vitality merely a human phenomenon, and in the various forms which it has assumed in the past nothing more than the ghosts of dead illusions. Its secret life is hidden from him; and, however acute may be his intelligence, he remains a shallow interpreter of the mysteries of faith. His zeal for liberty is consequently one-sided. He can recognise impartiality only in assaults upon venerable beliefs; and while he cheers on a destructive criticism, and applauds every crude innovation, he has nothing but contempt for the efforts of constructive genius or the holy calm of ancient piety. Nevertheless, his cry for freedom is good. Every mind has a right to the exercise of its own best powers, and, so long as it is honest, is capable of some divine work. Even a Secularist who blindly smites popular errors with the rude blows of vulgar declamation may be an unconscious instrument of God, and help to break up the soil for some new and fairer growth of religion. The eccentricities of heresy are largely due to the hardness and tyranny of established creeds, and the demon of intolerance is the parent of reaction and denial. One who is animated by the Spirit of God has room in the largeness of his heart for men of every tendency of thought, and, instead of arrogantly repelling the Agnostic and the Atheist into a defiant and irrevocable unbelief, would recognise in them too the children of God, and through the meekness of wisdom and love nurture them into faith.

There is, however, a demand for liberty which grows from a nobler root, and expresses not indifference or hostility towards religion, but a profound sense of its awful import. Religion is too inward and too sacred to be received as a matter of social custom, and its deepest life cannot be known till we enter into our own spirits, and exercise our own thought upon the visions, clear or shadowy, which we there discern. It is possible to assent to a whole system of dogmas, and yet never to have felt as a reality the touch of God upon our souls or the divine appeal of duty. The absence of doubt is often only a synonym for the absence of faith; and even he who with a reverent despair shrinks from turning into the articulate language of earth the echoes of the voice of God which he has heard in the inner sanctuary knows more of the spirit and power of religion than the stoutest defender of the creeds who has never got behind them, and explored for himself the truths which they represent. A half truth which lives is better than a whole truth which is dead; and experience seems to prove what we might anticipate from the general laws of mental growth, that where the hand of authority is heaviest religion is apt to be superstitious and intelligence to be sceptical. We ask for freedom, then, as the condition of religious vitality, and deny the right of any fellow-man to step between the soul and God, and mar with his bungling fingers the work of the Holy Spirit. We remember, too, that theology, the intellectual expression of religion, stands in relation to the whole circle of knowledge, and must therefore participate in the great movements of thought which arise from enlarged science and improved methods of investigation. The needed modifications cannot take place without a dangerous friction unless the theologian be as unshackled in his department of research as the man of science is in his. Extreme pretensions on one side beget extreme denials on the other; but where liberty of thought is revered, denial is only the reverse side of larger affirmation. We cannot stop the rising tide of knowledge and reason, though by our foolish interference we may break and fret its majestic flow; and we ask that it should be allowed to come on in undisturbed obedience to the heavenly attraction. The untrammelled exercise of our highest gifts cannot permanently dash any true ideal, but by presenting it in fresh form to the eye of thought will also transfigure it for the more reluctant spirit into a richer beauty and more commanding expression. Many a timid and pious worshipper may have wept for the departing household gods of Greece and Rome, and sighed that the earth had become profane when Olympus had lost its lord; yet the world did not sink into Atheism, and mountains were as sacred to Wordsworth as to Pindar. Nor will the universe become now the trampled and desecrated ruin of an ancient shrine because our limited conceptions have to stretch themselves to a newly revealed magnificence, and watch the unfolding of eternal thought across immeasurable space and through untold ages. But the theologian must be free in order to meet frankly the new conditions amid which he is placed, and by framing a theology in harmony with the conclusions of science save the religious sentiment from temporary eclipse. The cry for liberty, then, may be raised in the interests of religion itself. It may be the soul's response to a divine command to draw near and hear what the spirit says, its pledge of fealty to the God of truth. One who takes this view must defend his freedom of thought as an inestimable possession; for it is to him the condition of spiritual wholeness and intellectual sincerity.

It is on this higher ground that our college rests its "principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines," by either its professors or its students. It is not because it deems religion the hollow prop of unsubstantial fancies, but because it desires it towering into the infinite heavens, and holding on high the eternal truth and reality of things, that it asks to turn thither its own exploring gaze, and report simply what it sees. It has been described somewhere as a "free thought college;" and when we remember that freedom is the condition of the healthy exercise of thought, and that thought is the great instrument of human progress, we may regard this fictitious name as a compliment. Nevertheless, the designation is misleading, because it expresses only one side of our spiritual position, and is apt to suggest a divorce between thought and religion. But in reality our liberty is the offspring of our faith, which at the same time would keep itself open to the deepening lessons of experience, and is too firmly settled to fear lest God should be dethroned unless we stop the mouth of some fellow mortal who may have a message for mankind different from our own, or lest darkness should overspread the world unless we excommunicate some brother who is groping in temporary blindness of the spirit. Instead of imagining any antagonism between religion and intellectual freedom, our college perceives that each is essential to the highest life of the other. Religion, when deprived of the bracing air of discussion and criticism, and the power of modifying its organism to suit its environment, must either dwindle into a shrivelled sentimentality or harden into an unspiritual dogmatism; and free thought, when it owns no higher inspiration, is superficial and contracted in its judgments, and oppressed by those prejudices of self-love which only the fire of sacrifice can burn away.

We ask you, then, to come to the study of religion, not only as one of the most remarkable factors in human experience, but as a testimony to the reality of eternal things which transcend experience. Not that we are ignorant of the great evils which have dogged the steps of religion, or are unable to sympathise with the horror-struck and splendid denunciation of Lucretius, Religio peperit scelerosa atque impla facta."

"Saeplius illa

We can see the earth strewn with the shattered idols of superstition, and catch the dying mutter of cruel passions which religion, with its unnatural ethics, has seemed to foster, and civilisation with its strong secular hand to repress. We can shudder at the ghastly tale of blood, and wonder at the overmastering impulse of credulity, which the history of fanaticism unfolds. But in it all we can discern the struggle of the human soul towards a lofty ideal; above the clashing of contending creeds we can hear the deeper tones of a harmony unknown to the disputants themselves; and in the fantastic shapes of error we behold sublime and awful, though dim and distorted images of God. We learn that though science may map out our road, and provide the instruments needed for progress, yet the impelling motive lies elsewhere. There is a power which draws us up, and lures us on with glimpses of supreme holiness and beauty.

We feel its attraction even when it takes no definite shape in our thought, and prior to the activity of the speculative intellect a mysterious prompting turns our eyes towards the dawning light. In other words, the impulse of worship is laid deep in our nature; we are sensitive to something higher than physical forces; and the human heart yields such response as its ignorance and weakness will allow to a call which it clearly perceives to be other than the reverberations of its own voice.

It is owing to this inward source that religion survives the demolition of so many of its forms. The form is transient, but the spirit is eternal. First come the vaticinations of faith, afterwards the interpretations and proofs of theology. The latter are limited to the domain of the intellect, and are justly assailable by intellectual methods; but the former recur, and rise again like stars, in spite of every apparent refutation. Religion in its essential character belongs to the ideal realm. Its belief rests upon what eye has not seen nor ear heard; its search is for what the mind of man has not conceived. If it descended within the confines of outward experience, and placed itself on a par with scientific knowledge, it would lose its identity. It calls upon men not to be misled by sensible appearances, but to trust that more searching vision which it is impossible to verify experimentally. Thus, in a world where dependence upon earthly conditions, and the ultimate death and decay of every organised being, are the scientific facts, it proclaims the existence of an immortal life of communion with God. In the midst of so much inexplicable suffering, arising from disease, accident, poverty, or disappointment, it declares that infinite wisdom and love direct the troubled scene, and that not a sparrow falls unheeded to the ground. In presence of a universal experience of sin it summons man to the sinless and perfect, and bids him, in spite of demonstrated weakness and failure, look forward to a better day. Though tortuous policy often seems to triumph, and selfishness achieves its ends, while virtue bows the head in anguish and upright patriotism is reviled, it asserts that eternal justice rules, and that its light shall at last break from behind the cloud.

To one, then, whose whole habit of mind leads him to rely on external experience as the sole criterion of truth, religion must necessarily appear to be a cloud-land of dreams and visions, which not only has nothing substantial to support it, but shatters itself against the hard facts of nature and human life; and in an age like our own, in which the dominant intellectual movement is directed towards physical science, the truth of spiritual perception will be keenly contested, and the events which in all periods constitute the trials of faith will assume the rank of arguments for unbelief. The pleas put forward by religious men lose their thrilling touch, and are felt by the colder scientific mind as a dead man's hand; and even high philosophical argument, which has satisfied men of large intelligence, and seems to place the first truths of theology upon the solid basis of reason, fails to carry with it the old conviction. Man and God, the daily experience and the ideal hopes of humanity, are not united by the links of an argument; and even if the existence of God could be established in the same way as that of heat or electricity, a Deity who merely filled a gap in a chain of scientific reasoning would not be the Father whom our souls adore. Before there is religious faith there must be religious sensibility, and the conviction that holds us, and becomes a commanding power in our lives, is not drawn from without, as we learn the growth of a flower or the orbit of a comet, but wells up from the inner sources of our being, sources themselves unseen, and witnesses of unseen things. It is to those who have this inward impulse that the arguments of theology prove convincing; and these arguments, therefore, are not the creators, but rather the after-thoughts and defenders of faith.

But this being the case, must we admit the charge of special pleading which is brought against the theologian, and deny that he has any title to believe, because he cannot produce evidences which all rational men are compelled to accept? We cannot allow the relevancy of this charge or this denial, because it is not pretended that theology is a demonstrative or inductive science, like astronomy or chemistry, which can at will repeat its observations or experiments. The experiences on which it rests are not physical, but spiritual; and accordingly they are in their very nature incommunicable, and cannot be reproduced in obedience to our volition. A man can no more make himself a saint than he can make himself a poet or an artist. All high creative power is given, and cannot be bought with money or earned by toil; and we can as little command the voice of God to speak in our souls as we can waken our sensibility to the lessons of the "primrose by the river's brim," or cleanse our eye to discern the beauty of form and colour. But because we cannot communicate, or, when we will, renew our religious experiences, we are not to dismiss them as though they had no significance; for though, like other mental gifts, they come to men in very various measures, they mark a burning path through human history and encircle the earth with a garland of light. They are more vivid and profound than any physical experience, and gather power and glory as the ages pass. To one who interprets them from within, and can disentangle them from the aberrations of ignorance and the corrupting mixture of selfish passion, they alone seem to give to our nature its finished beauty, its richest harmony, its highest exaltation. View them as we may, they spring up within us from the fountain-force of the universe, claiming us with an authority we cannot resist, and breathing an ineffable peace and love amid the lower strife of intellect and will. You speak of their mean beginnings and the silly fancies of the savage mind; but why should the evolution of religion, starting from the humble seed of timorous worship, and gradually lifting on high its mighty aspiration and spreading abroad its grand ideals, end at last in the rot of irretrievable falsehood, while the senses and the intellect, in spite of an equally vulgar origin, continue to deserve our respect? In truth, there is nothing vulgar in the slow majesty of nature, and through all its range alike we may trust the power that draws us upward. The consciousness of divine possibilities which sleep within us may, indeed, paint only allegorical pictures of what is to be; still we must follow the light, nor believe it the less because we seem to behold changing and shifting forms amid the radiance, and know not yet what we shall be, or what vision will greet our sight when with perfect holiness we gaze upon the Holiest.

If it be contended that many men have no such experiences, and that it is sheer fanaticism to pretend to have any source of evidence which is not universally accessible, we must ask whether it is intended by this contention to deny the reality of the experiences in question, or to affirm that where they exist they are only a disease of the imagination. That they are real cannot, of course, be doubted by anyone who has them, and the only misgiving that can steal upon his mind is whether they may not after all be shapes of the childish fancy, which a more mature culture will in time dispel. There are, however, two sufficient reasons to convince us that it is not the spiritual vision, but the misgiving that springs from the weakness of our nature. If we do not look beyond ourselves, but consider simply the intrinsic nature of religious experience, we cannot but feel that the impulse which opens and widens our soul towards the infinite, which lifts us out of our selfishness with all its petty cares and mean ambitions, which renders intolerable to us everything that is perverse and disingenuous, and places us in sympathy with all that is lovely in character, sublime in thought, generous and heroic in action, belongs to our highest and not our lowest moments, and is the ripening promise of a golden future rather than the fetid excrescence of a stupid past. It is in communion with God that we are absolutely sane, and that every part of our complex nature escapes from the morbid growths of egotism. So it would be if we stood alone upon the mountain top; and the solitary Christ in the midst of an unbelieving generation could not, without falsity, have denied what he had seen and heard. But we are not alone. It is the men who know nothing of these things that are alone; and from amid the superficial fret and surge of life the deep undertone of worship rises up from the human heart, and the many accents of men blend into the acknowledgment of a goodness higher than their own. It is the apparent certainty of the intellect that is continually melting away before the advent of fresh knowledge; our alleged dreams and fancies indicate the permanent bent of our nature. The scientific speculations of an early age only excite a smile in the thinker of today; but the deeper utterances of the soul have no date. Just in proportion as men have been able to detach themselves from current modes of thought, and to sink into the eternal heart of things, have they spoken words for all time; and there are few so dull that they hear no inward echo of these oracles of the spirit. We need not, then, heed the taunts of the self-complacent rejecter of what is grandest and most permanent in man. There is no concealed assertion of self in maintaining the reality of that within us which we feel to be higher than self. The fanatic, indeed, may seek to appropriate the Divine Spirit; but it is treason against this spiritual light to glorify ourselves or to despise others. The truly spiritual will honour each man for his peculiar gift, and for himself will humbly fear lest he should defile what has been committed to his charge. We may gladly acknowledge that the man who can regard religion only critically renders it a valuable service by clearing away unwholesome accretions, and forcing it in self-defence to come nearer to its ideal; but not the less do we feel assured that one hour's conscious wrestling with the Spirit would alter his theory of the universe, and bring home to him the majesty and power of what now he misunderstands and, in his ignorance, decries.

Such, then, is the fundamental fact upon which theology reposes, and which gives it an indestructible vitality. But theology itself involves an intellectual process, and inevitably shares the uncertainty and liability to change which besets other intellectual pursuits. It has to interpret by the light of reason and knowledge the religious experiences of mankind; and the theory which at one period is perfectly reasonable because it apparently satisfies all the conditions of thought may become at another time unreasonable because it is inconsistent with newly discovered facts. That changes of this kind have taken place in the past, and that one affecting the very basis of theological belief is going on at the present time, are circumstances too familiar to require more than an allusion. But we would not dwell at present on the mutability of theological thought so much as on the fact that theology is demanded by the activity of the speculative reason. Just as the permanent sense of duty requires ethical theory, and remains unalterable in its nature however various may be the explanations which are given of it, so the abiding religious aspiration of mankind asks for some interpretation which it may at least provisionally accept, and is justly dissatisfied with any theory of the origin and nature of things in which it does not hold an honourable place. It is possible, no doubt, for religion and thought to stand apart from one another. As one may be virtuous who knows nothing of ethical philosophy, so one may have a living faith and piety who cares little for the labours of the theologian; and on the other hand speculation may pursue its course as though no sense of sin or longing after holiness had ever penetrated the human soul. But this separation between two of our permanent faculties cannot be healthy for either. Quietly to ignore one whole department of our mental life is the reverse of philosophical; and we may be sure that men will not finally accept any system against which the finer and deeper elements of their being continually chafe. But as little can religion be content with inarticulate cries when once the powers of thought have been awakened. We are then impelled to interpret the voice of the Spirit, and rationally to justify our interpretation; and in this way a multitude of problems arise which we cannot be satisfied to leave unresolved or without correlation both with themselves and with the entire organism of knowledge. In other words, theology springs from the union of religion and thought, and only when these are raised to their highest efficiency, and kept in health by their reciprocal action, can we feel sure of our ground. We refer now to theological theory in its widest scope, and not to those literary, historical, or exegetical questions which sprout up so plenteously on our path, and we see that, next to the spiritual experiences which furnish his data, philosophical aptitude and training are essential to the theologian who would rise above the mere critical and scholarly departments of his science, and attain those large and comprehensive views which alone can make it acceptable to men of varied and extensive culture.

The two factors in theology which we have here indicated are, however, seldom perfectly combined. The cold logic of the speculative reason does not easily consort with the instinctive enthusiasm of religious impression, and, though they do not wholly part company, one or the other generally preponderates. They indicate two contrasted methods of approach between God and man, methods of which we may take the Greek and the Hebrew as furnishing typical examples. The Greek sought for the Divine by the path of philosophy. There must, indeed, have been some secret inspiration to start him on his career; but the interest of which he was conscious was a speculative interest, and the movement of Hellenic thought may be described in the present connection as an attempt on the part of the human mind to rise to the apprehension of God. The Hebrew, on the contrary, felt, not that he was seeking after God, but that God was seeking after him. His faith, like all true faith, was the response to a divine appeal. Instead of thinking it hard to discover God, and impossible to reveal him to the multitude, he found his path beset by him on every side, and owned him as an encompassing presence from whom he could not flee. The profound truths which lay close to his experience he did not think out and logically establish, but uttered in words of poetry and prophecy, and called on all who would to hear. He felt that of himself he could not speak, and that the pure radiance of the eternal light might be dimmed in passing through the veil of humanity; yet he could not choose but cry aloud what came to him as the word of God, and he knew that his countrymen must in their inmost hearts confess the truth of what he said. Neither of these methods could by itself produce a theology; and, accordingly, theology in its strict sense is absent alike from the classical writings of Greece and from the Hebrew Scriptures. The systems unfolded in the former we more properly describe as philosophy; and in the latter, while great central truths are enunciated in words which with unrivalled power reveal the soul to itself and waken its dormant energies, there is little attempt to reduce these truths to a system and to place them upon rational grounds. These two movements of the human mind had to be brought into combination before theology could arise; and hence it was when, in Christianity, Hebrew inspiration transfused itself through Grecian thought that theology, as distinguished on the one hand from philosophy and on the other from the primary utterances of faith, became an acknowledged power in the world.

Now, if theology is to resume a worthy position, and once more command the respect of educated laymen, it must still unite these two factors. It must grow from the spirit and be shaped by thought. It is of course possible without any original force to hand down a traditional theology, which represents an ancient inspiration, and the knowledge of a bygone age. But, even granting that its doctrines are true, they cannot be understood unless the struggles of the soul out of which they sprang repeat themselves in us, and their relations to a constantly-advancing culture will require continually some fresh adjustment. A series of dogmas from which the soul has departed can only betray us into false professions of a religion which has never touched us; and the least perfect truth which comes to us with the thrill of a new experience has more regenerating power than the complete system which lies like a stone figure outside of our hearts. Admitting, then, for the moment that the form of theology has been permanently settled by supernatural authority, still its vitality can be maintained only by the fresh forces of inspiration; and if we respond no more to a living word which would take possession of us, and drive us with holy zeal against the world's falsity and sin, our creeds must die, and fail to arouse that vivid interest which is accorded only to original creations of the mind. But how few that mingle freely in the busy thought of our time, and attempt to estimate justly the recent discoveries of science, can accept the old theology without at least serious modifications? Dogma after dogma which formerly satisfied the most instructed intellect can satisfy no more. Once again, as in many a past crisis, God is teaching the world that a dead mechanical belief will not do instead of the living energies of soul and thought. Our sleepy traditionalism is being rudely shaken, and for my part I welcome the shock of battle, and think it better that men should, even for a time, cry out in agony, "O God, why hast thou forsaken us?" than tread the round of a spiritless routine, in which the awful reality of God is never recognised, and no sublime ideal disturbs with divine rebuke the petty self-complacency of an undoubting formalism. In such a crisis it is clear that the intellect must be wide awake, and seek for new interpretations of ancient problems; and to whatever extent it may borrow the forms of the past, it must fill them with the power of modern life. When heart and mind speak the language of to-day, and prove by their simple sincerity that they are not held back by the rusty fetters of professional custom, but drawn forward by golden links of faith and hope for the future, theology will once more obtain the respectful hearing which is given to every genuine expression of man's interior force.

Here, then, we rest our plea for freedom. To a theology thus conceived liberty is indispensable; and you might as reasonably look for the highest results in poetry, art, or science if you rigidly prescribed beforehand the path which they must take, as in religion if you refuse it any independent vision, and compel it to tread in time-worn ruts. It is not because we deem theology dead, but because we know it to be alive, that we desire to leave it unbound. If communion with God is a reality, we must allow the soul to hear for itself the divine voice, and, lifted above the world in the solitary exaltation of prayer, to receive that measure of light which the bounteous Giver has designed for it. If the great march of science and thought is a reality, we must allow the mind to mingle in the crowd, and press on towards a fuller and deeper interpretation of the world in which it lives. When these two movements are permitted to go on without unnatural checks, they escape the antagonism which has been artificially fostered between science and religion, and proceed with the harmony of mutual friendship. The higher thought responds to the higher feeling, and the truer theory is found to be a spiritual gain. But when through the terror of a secret unbelief which always trembles before a difference of opinion, or a presumption which supposes that its "views" are the final revelation of the Spirit, we chain up faith and reason, those two feet by which men climb to God, we degrade theology to a pale and shrivelled captive, whose eyes habituated to the dungeon cannot bear the light, and whose faltering tongue babbles an old-world language. Here, as in politics, unjust repression produces its own Nemesis in the shape of the very evils which we dread, and the mind, being refused the orderly progress of natural development, advances with the blind excesses of revolution.

It is a matter of unfeigned rejoicing that the principle of spiritual freedom which our college has consistently maintained since its foundation is obtaining such ample recognition at the present day. A new temper is coming over theological discussion, and religious questions are treated with a comprehensive knowledge, a manly understanding, and a power of spiritual appreciation, which promise the happiest results. This change is due to many circumstances, but not least to the progress of science, which has deprived the theologians of their old dogmatic confidence, and compelled them to reconsider their position. There are some to whom this process appears altogether painful. They lament the decay of faith; they become apprehensive of the freedom which they themselves have helped to foster; and though the iron bands of Rome have snapped under the pressure of human thought, they would endeavour to restrain by a silken thread the restiveness of speculation. But those of a more hopeful temperament think they can already discern two important spiritual gains. In the first place, men are being thrown back upon the inner resources and primary essentials of religion; in other words, they are more genuinely religious. Nothing is more certain than that men may make church or dogma a substitute for religion, and without conscious insincerity profess their allegiance to Christianity while they know nothing of its spirit. But when the form is temporarily obscured, they are driven to seek behind the form for that inward and spiritual essence which alone can vivify. In spite of many discouraging appearances, may we not see that while the theology of the sixteenth century is losing its hold upon men, the pure spirit of Christ is sinking deeper into the heart of the world, and preparing the way for a juster, holier, and more humane society? And, secondly, as a consequence of this, there is an increasing unity of the spirit. The nearer we are drawn to God, the more do we realise our brotherhood; and over the crumbling walls of partition which the sects have reared we are looking into one another's eyes, and finding that the sons of God are everywhere. More and more the differences which divide us are seen to be superficial, the imperfect pictures of fallible minds; and deep within the soul is that life of heavenly communion which flows from the creative energy of God. Our interpreting thoughts have many tongues, the language of the Spirit is one; and the time must be surely coming when, through the deeper wisdom of the chastened mind, the work of that Spirit will be complete, and human brotherhood be something better than a name.

We welcome you, then, to the joyous responsibilities of freedom. It is not for you to lift any sectarian flag, or feed men with the husks of party names and cries instead of the grace and truth of God. It is not for you to denounce as crimes what you deem the errors of truth-loving men, or, with sad forebodings, to mistake the blindness of your own hearts for the descending night of irreligion, but to be heralds of the dawn, and prophets of a kingdom of God which is slowly shaping itself out of the seeming chaos of human thought and passion. Only keep close to the central light, and remember that none but a pure and simple heart can reflect the divine ray, and none but an intellect which puts aside every personal claim can exercise a just judgment. If we have been right in our rapid survey of the nature of theology, the ideal theologian must have a lofty and serene soul, which "dwells apart," conversant with eternal things, and aiming at what this world can never give. He must have a sympathy which, itself untouched by the sinfulness of human passion, yet can reach and understand its lowest depths. He must have a mind well-stored, with power of insight to read the deep experiences of men, and quick to exercise the keen edge of thought. Few are called to stand upon this high level, but if our aim be ever upward, we shall not wholly fail or prove quite unworthy of that inheritance of spiritual liberty into which it has been our privilege to enter.

Before I sit down it is my pleasant duty to announce the following list of University and other distinctions obtained by our students since the opening of last Session:—

Mr. Moore, our present senior student, has gained a Hibbert Scholarship.

In London University Mr. Herford has passed the First Scriptural Examination in the First Class, obtaining a prize. Mr. Gow and Mr. Whitehead have gained the degree of B.A., having passed in the First Division, the former having won Third Class Honours in Philosophy. Mr. Tarrant and Mr. Drummond have both passed the Intermediate Examination in Arts in the First Division, the former taking Second Class Honours in English, and the latter Second Class Honours in Latin.

At University College Mr. Drummond has obtained the third certificate in the Senior Latin Class, with marks qualifying for the prize; Mr. Frupp has won a First Class certificate in English, also with marks qualifying for the prize; and Mr. Davies has been awarded a Second Class certificate in the Junior German Class.

STOCKPORT.—The Rev. Alfred Payne, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, has received and accepted an unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Stockton Unitarian Church, and will enter upon his duties the first week in February.

UNITARIANISM IN HUNGARY.

KOLOZVAR, SEPT. 18, 1882.

The annual gathering of the Hungarian Unitarians was just as large, and perhaps larger, this year than in previous years. This time the opening of the college was connected with the Consistory meeting. It was interesting to see the grey-headed members of the Consistory bringing up their sons to this home of the Muses, filled at once with much anxiety for their future, and with a deep interest for the subjects of the meeting. It took five days till the inscription of the students was done, and the proceedings of the meeting occupied nearly three. As for the results of both of them we may fairly feel satisfied, for the number of the applicants to the college was larger than could have been accepted, and the results of the discussions in the meeting were not less successful.

The opening of the meeting is always held on a Sunday, on account of its being connected with a regular Divine service. Sunday morning was as bright and beautiful as could be—most suitable for the occasion. Already at seven o'clock a full number of the consistory was standing before "the good old college," recalling in their mind the hard struggles and the great difficulties of those days when they were living in it. What a great difference there is between 1852 and 1882 they might have thought. Then everything Hungarian was in German hands, and not even the free use of the native tongue was allowed. Then students were obliged to study everything except what they most wanted—the Magyar tongue—while now not only the Magyar schools but all the others study it, and in most of them a large part of the students speak it. And how much easier it is for the poor Szekler's sons to study now when yearly more than ten thousand florins of stipends and other kind of supports is spent on them.

At eight o'clock, when the Bishop arrived, we entered the Consistory-room, where everybody was at once struck by the noble looking portrait of an American lady, Mrs. Anna Richmond, who was one of those noble souls who can give freely of what they earned wherever a good cause offers itself. Mrs. Richmond is one of the benefactors of the Hungarian Unitarians. Six years ago, under the influence of our good friend John Fretwell, she offered five thousand dollars for the salary of a professor of Theology, on the condition that it should be sent for him in yearly rates in the course of ten years. As our good friend the Rev. J. H. Allen, of America, informed us last year, at present four hundred dollars are obtained, to which he himself gave and collected a considerable sum, with the aim that it should be raised to such an amount the interest of which could run the sum of five hundred dollars yearly.

Last year, when, nearly a year after the sorrowful event took place, I heard of the death of Mrs. Richmond, I made inquiries in order to be able to give a short sketch of her life. I only received a short note relating to the dates of her birth and marriage, and an extract of the funeral sermon.

The short sketch appeared in our bi-monthly, The Christian Seedower, but I felt it from the first that it was not worthy to her. On that account I determined to get her portrait painted for the Consistory-room from a photograph of hers which we had. The picture was made ready for this meeting by a Unitarian painter, and as I saw and heard, everybody got the impression from it of a good-hearted and high-minded lady. So now the portrait of one of our great benefactors and American friends adorns the walls of the Hungarian Unitarian Council-room, with those of the great leaders and upholders of the Hungarian Unitarian faith, and with such English and American worthies as John James Tayler, Taggart, Martineau, and many Americans. With this, I think, there is done as much as could be done at present. Now, when a new member enters this room he will have to feel a greater reason to be ready to bring a sacrifice for his faith.

And really, as the Rev. Bishop Ferencz so beautifully said in his opening address, zeal, interest and warmth for our Unitarian faith must never be relaxed; for as in nature, without the heat of the sun all motion ceases, so in the moral world only the warmth of the soul and devotedness for the common causes can secure life and victory. Our life was a hard struggle till now, and if at present we happen to have a prosperous outlook, we must be just as ready for the work, and like the good sailor, seize the opportunity while a favourable wind blows.

The Bishop chiefly pointed out two things as most worthy of notice from this year. One was the opening of regular divine services at Budapest, which was the realisation of more than thirty years' desire. For though according to the decision of the Porzony Diet in 1848 Unitarians received perfect freedom to establish congregations and build churches in Hungary proper also, it could be effected only now and by the aid of the generous English and American brethren.

The other of the most remarkable points in the Bishop's speech and in the secretary's report was the deputation of Professor John Kovacs to the Saratoga Conference. He started away from us early in August with our best wishes, and is now amongst our brethren over the sea, to give personal expression to them of our deep regard for all those whom we had the pleasure to know personally, and to all brethren in faith who consider the progress of Liberal Christianity their common cause.

After the Bishop's address, a prayer being offered, the annual reports were read. From the Bishop's report we learnt that last year there were born 2,075, died 1,527, and 157 came over to our Church, while 55 left us. The total number of Unitarians this year increased by 317.

All the reports being read we went into the church, and heard there a fine sermon from one of the professors of the Keresztur Unitarian School.

In the afternoon, as usually, the Bishop invited all the consistory for dinner, where a good many toasts were drunk, of which we have to mention those for the English and American Unitarian Associations, and for the Budapest Unitarian Congregation.

On the following two days the meeting was engaged with many interesting questions relating partly to educational, to religious, and to financial matters.

On account of the great number of applicants for admission to the Kolozvar College it was decided that the building should be enlarged next year. If this decision be carried out, the College will be able to do better work, and with more success, than even hereto. We may hope that also the large and rich library will be so arranged that it shall fulfil its destination.

I cannot leave without noticing that the total of next year's bureau is altogether 19,000 florins (£1,900), from which the Bishop, sixteen professors, ten or twelve tutors, all the officers of the Consistory, and all the expenditure of the Colleges, and the support of poorer congregations are to be paid. To this sum are to be added yet the lodgings, which the professors get in natura.

GEORGE BOROS.

PADIHAM.—On Sunday, October 1, the service of song entitled "The Golden Sheaf," which had been rendered on the Harvest Thanksgiving Sunday, was repeated in place of the usual evening service. The Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., read connecting passages from Thomson's "Seasons." There was a large congregation present. On Tuesday, the 3rd inst., the Sewing Society and the Mutual Improvement Society held a united tea party to celebrate the commencement of their respective sessions. Over one hundred sat down to tea, and double that number was present at the meeting afterwards. The reports of the two societies were read and adopted, and they told of very hard and useful work during the past year. An encouraging address was delivered by the Rev. C. J. Street, who presided. More than thirty new members joined the Mutual Improvement Society, and twenty names were added to the Sewing Society. An excellent programme of music was rendered, and hearty votes of thanks were accorded to Mrs. Street, who provided the tea, and all who assisted in any way in preparing so enjoyable a meeting. Mrs. Street responded in appropriate terms.

MR. FRANK BYRON JEVONS, B.A., Master in Manchester Grammar School, and late Scholar of Wadham College, Oxford, has been appointed to the tutorship at University College, vacated by the death of Mr. W. E. Gabbett. Mr. Jevons obtained a First Class in Moderations, 1877, and a First Class in the Final Examination in Classics, 1879.

Occasional Notes.

ON Saturday last Mr. Matthew Arnold delivered the introductory address at the opening of the session of the Liverpool University College, on which occasion the Earl of Derby, who presided, gave the prizes. Our friend Matthew was strong in recommendation of his old phrase, "sweetness and light," as specially interesting to those interested in the advance of knowledge. He has also given us a new catchword, as we learn from a portion of his speech, in which he said that if he had to fix upon the great want at this moment of the three principal nations of Europe, he should say that the great want of the French was morality; that the great want of the Germans was civil courage; and that our own great want was lucidity. There was the negative lucidity, which was essentially Voltaire's, and also the positive lucidity, of which he hoped the college would be an exponent. Coming to our own want of lucidity, he asked his auditors to consider that movement, of which they were hearing so much just now—the Salvation Army and its operations. They saw energy, devotedness, excitement, conversions, but a total absence of lucidity. One title of lucidity would make the whole movement impossible. Referring to a very different movement, Mr. Arnold said they had all before their minds lately the long, arduous, devoted, influential, and pure life of Dr. Pusey, who had just died, and they had also, some of them, been reading Mr. Mozley's account of that great movement which took from Dr. Pusey its earlier name, its latter stage, Ritualism. They had seen it was a movement full of interest. It had in its ranks men to be respected, admired, and loved; men of learning, men of genius, men of goodness and of charm, and yet could they resist the proof that lucidity would have been fatal to it? He looked to one result of the increasing mental activity of the time—the operation in our minds of that indispensable agent in our intellectual progress, the spirit of lucidity. This is all excellent, but why could not Mr. Arnold, who is one of our great masters of style, have used the simple strong English word "clearness" instead of the Latinised "lucidity?" Clearness of mind, clearness of moral insight is what we all greatly need. "Clear your mind of cant, sir," said Dr. Johnson to the faithful Boswell.

BABU KESHUB CHUNDER SEN seems bent upon keeping the world in a state of perpetual astonishment. The most recent of his freaks has been a theatrical performance, which took place on Saturday, Sept. 2. The drama has been composed by one of Babu K. C. Sen's apostles, with a view to illustrate the signal triumph of the "New Dispensation." The significant fact in connection with this performance is that Babu K. C. Sen himself took part as an actor, and what is still more strange, he offered a prayer on the stage in his assumed garb. But Mr. Sen and his friends have not gone quite so far yet as some of our own teachers, who celebrate the anniversaries of their schools with "screaming farces" and dancing and uproarious merriment.

It is scarcely credible that at the present day persons occupying high official positions in a country where all religion is looked upon as a superstition by a very large number of people should give the authority of their position to a search for treasure by means of a divining rod. And yet this is what the Director of Fine Arts in Paris has done. He has authorized an old woman who claims to have a divining rod to dig in the vaults of the church of St. Denis for the buried treasure of the cathedral, which disappeared during the Revolution. She has deposited a sum of money as security, and is prosecuting her researches by the aid of what appears to be an ordinary divining rod. So far, although workmen have dug down to a depth of five feet, they have discovered nothing except an old rusty key, a tumbler, and some bones. Negotiations for this act of folly have been going on since 1880.

THERE is a curious newspaper published weekly in London, entitled British Israel and Judah's Prophetic Messenger, which expresses a burning desire to explore the Hill of Tara. It says "that is the only way to give peace to Ireland. 'This will settle all disputes.' Among other marvellous results of the exploration of Tara are the following:—It will Prove the truth of the mission of Jeremiah to Ireland, and his planting and building.

That the British nation is identical with the lost Ten Tribes of Ephraim-Israel.

That Jeremiah the Prophet brought the stone which is called Jacob's Stone: the Coronation Stone now in Westminster Abbey.

Open out a Divine way of deliverance to the Jews in all parts of the world.

Unite America with the British nation—Ephraim and Manasseh.

Open the way by which all our foreign enemies will be overcome.

Bring forth our evidences that we are Israel, and have the right to possess Palestine and Jerusalem—the Great Gate, the Gate of the Lord.

Sweep away the blindness and ignorance from the minds of the people.

God's people called out of Babylon, that is France (Paris).

And yet people write about "The Decay of Faith," and talk of this as an age of doubt and scepticism. Granting that the writer of the above has not recently been let out of, or is not rapidly tending towards Colney Hatch, there seems here a conclusive answer to all those disbelievers in the credulity of these times. We suppose subscriptions are required for the exploration, and we do not doubt for a moment that they will be forthcoming.

THE National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches has just been brought to a close at Saratoga, and we hope to give a full account in our next number. We hear that the attendance at the meetings was larger than in any previous year. The total number of persons present, including 600 delegates, amounted to 2,200. Amongst the resolutions passed was one for raising 50,000 dollars annually for the next two years for the support of the American Unitarian Association. At the usual nomination of officers the Hon. E. Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts, was elected president for the ensuing year.

HOWEVER "disappointing" the Atlantic may have proved to Mr. Oscar Wilde, it seems that he has been very favourably impressed with what he saw in the Southern States, where he observed the signs of progress and prosperity on every hand. The people and the social organisation of Virginia reminded him strongly of England. The people all over the South sang in his ears the old melancholy refrain, "You ought to have seen it before the war." "I was once sitting on the portico of a country house," he said, "with a young lady, admiring the beauty of a limpid stream under the rays of the moon, and I said to the young lady: 'How beautiful is the moonlight falling on the water.' 'It is beautiful, indeed,' she replied; 'but ah! Mr. Wilde, you ought to have seen it before the war.'"

WE are glad to see that a clear distinction exists in the minds of our Indian brethren as to the spirit shown by the Anglo-Indian, and that which we believe has a strong hold upon the minds of men in this country. The following story told by the Brahmo Public Opinion and its comments thereon clearly show this:—
